A: It's easy for me to say in hindsight that we should have had more troops, although I was saying it at the time. Here's the problem: I sat in literally hundreds of hours of meetings with our generals -- in Baghdad; out in their command posts in Mosul, Tikrit, Fallujah, down in the south in Basra; back in Doha, at the Central Command advance headquarters; here in Washington; classified video links in Baghdad -- I never heard a general ask for more troops. And the president always said if they asked for more troops, he'd give them to them. I can only tell you know what I know. That's what I know.

Q: Did the president ask if they wanted more troops, or did he wait for them to ask?

A: There probably were times when he was very direct and said: If you need more troops, I'll send them to you. I remember many times when they simply said: We have enough troops to accomplish our mission.

Back On Capitol Hill, Bremer Is Facing A Cooler Reception (WP)

By Rajiv Chandrasekaran

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

The last time L. Paul Bremer testified before Congress, he was lauded as an American hero. Rep. Ander Crenshaw (R-Fla.) congratulated Bremer, who was leading the U.S. occupation authority in Iraq, for a "tremendous success." Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) commended his "energy and focus." Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) praised his "brilliant analysis."

When Bremer returns to Capitol Hill today to appear before the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, he will receive a far less effusive reception than he did in September 2003. The now-ruling Democrats plan to pounce on him for disbanding Iraq's army, firing many members of the Baath Party, hiring GOP loyalists and not fully accounting for the spending of billions of dollars in Iraqi oil revenue.

Fellow Republicans have pointed questions for the first time in public as well.

"Had Bremer made better decisions, we would be in a very different place today," said Rep. Christopher Shays (Conn.).

"Some of the key mistakes in Iraq occurred on his watch," said Rep. Darrell Issa (Calif.). "I think there will be a tendency among Republicans to look very carefully and say, 'Who is this man . . . who made decisions that we're still paying for today?' "

Two and a half years after he left Baghdad, the steel-haired viceroy who wore combat boots with his navy-blue suits has emerged as an embodiment of reconstruction policy gone awry. The Senate began debate yesterday on a resolution condemning President Bush's troop buildup, and House members will have their sights on Bremer this week as they seek to assign blame for U.S. mistakes in rebuilding Iraq.

While deep divisions remain about Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq, there is near-unanimity among Democrats and Republicans that the United States needs to roll back key political and economic decisions that Bremer's Coalition Provisional Authority made.

Bremer has become something of a bipartisan-consensus candidate among those looking for officials to hold responsible for what has occurred in Iraq, eliciting that sort of opprobrium once reserved for Donald H. Rumsfeld, who as defense secretary was a chief architect of the war. For Democrats, Bremer is a particularly juicy target because he, along with retired Gen. Tommy R. Franks and former CIA director George J. Tenet, received the Presidential Medal of Freedom from Bush, who would shower Bremer with praise on his visits to Washington.

For many Republicans, who believe they must acknowledge mistakes if they want to increase public support for continued U.S. military involvement in Iraq, defending Bremer may be too much to ask. Even senior Bush administration officials who were once effusive in their descriptions of Bremer privately point to some of his decisions as key errors.

"With some of the major issues we're dealing with today, the roots of the problem go back to the days when Iraq was under Bremer's control," said Shays.

Some who worked for Bremer in Baghdad contend that he is a scapegoat for Bush administration decisions that were out of his control.

Bremer, they note, raised concerns about the number of troops in Iraq with Bush in the summer of 2003. And, they point out, Bremer wanted to capture Moqtada al-Sadr, a Shiite cleric and militia leader, in the fall of 2003, when he had far fewer supporters and the backlash would have been much smaller, but U.S. military commanders refused to act on the request.

Indeed, Democrats and Republicans have criticized others who have shaped the U.S. presence in Iraq, chief among them Gen. George W. Casey Jr., whom GOP senators lambasted last week for not trying harder to stem sectarian violence while serving as the overall military commander in Baghdad. Some have questioned whether Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, has done enough to push the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to promote reconciliation between Sunnis and Shiites. In military and intelligence circles, veteran staffers still seethe over decisions Franks and Tenet made.

But Bremer is unique in this environment of finger-pointing because of his former visibility: For more than a year, he was the symbol of the U.S. occupation. A frequent presence in front of the cameras, Bremer was the only American to have the dictatorial powers of an occupation administrator -- the ability to enact laws with the scribble of his pen, the power to hire and fire Iraqis, the freedom to spend Iraq's oil revenue. The Americans who followed him have all been advisers to a sovereign Iraqi government.

"We spent a lot of money in Iraq with very little to show for it," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee. "I think it's important to understand, going back to the CPA period, how we got into the position we are in."

Bremer did not respond to repeated requests to comment.

The criticism of Bremer is often indirect, but the implication is clear. When Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, now the top military commander in Iraq, testified before the Senate last month, he called the occupation authority's "de-Baathification" and dissolution of Iraq's army two of the most "significant mistakes the U.S. has made to date in Iraq." Bremer made both decisions in Baghdad without extensive consultation with the State Department, the National Security Council or other U.S. government agencies.

"Disbanding the Iraqi army . . . without simultaneously announcing a stipend and pension program for those in the Army, the future plan for Iraq's defense forces, and provisions for joining those forces undoubtedly created tens of thousands of former soldiers and officers who were angry, feeling disrespected, and worried about how they would feed their families," Petraeus wrote in a response to questions submitted by the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Other less-recognized Bremer policies have also come under scrutiny in recent months, particularly his formation of the Commission on Public Integrity to ferret out government corruption. As with many of the occupation authority's decisions, it targeted a problem of the old Iraq -- the endemic graft and cronyism that existed under Saddam Hussein.

But the result has been far from what the Americans expected: The commission's chairman has mounted so many investigations that Iraqi bureaucrats are afraid to spend government money even on crucial reconstruction projects, according to U.S. government officials. It is one reason the Iraqi government was unable to disburse $10 billion that it had budgeted last year. The Bush administration wants Maliki's government to spend that money on reconstruction this year, but it is still working on ways to mute the unexpected influence of Bremer's commission.

The administration is also pushing Maliki's government to modify Bremer's de-Baathification policy and his decision to transfer authority over the process to a commission headed by a controversial former exile, Ahmed Chalabi. David Satterfield, the State Department's Iraq coordinator, told the Senate last month that the U.S. government believes changes to the de-Baathification law are "a critical element in any meaningful national reconciliation."

Bremer has acknowledged that handing responsibility for de-Baathification to Chalabi's commission was a mistake. "The error was that I left the implementation of the policy to a political body within the nascent Iraqi government, where it became a tool of politicians who applied it much more broadly than we had intended," he wrote last year. "De-Baathification should have been administered by an independent judicial body."

The chief purpose of today's hearing is to focus on the Coalition Provisional Authority's spending of Iraqi oil revenue in 2003 and 2004. Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, issued an audit stating that the CPA engaged in "less than adequate" managerial and financial control of approximately $8.8 billion given to Iraqi government ministries.

"The CPA management of Iraq's national budget process and oversight of Iraqi funds was burdened by severe inefficiencies and poor management," Bowen wrote.

Bremer fired back with a blistering letter to Bowen. He argued that the audit incorrectly assumed "Western-style budgeting and accounting procedures could be immediately and fully implemented in the midst of a war." The CPA, he wrote, accepted that its payroll system was imperfect because "it would have been dangerous for security -- ours and Iraq's -- to stop paying armed young men."

Although Bowen issued his audit in 2005, the ruling party in Congress opted not to hold a hearing on the findings. "The Republicans chose to ignore it," Waxman said. "We believe examining what occurred during the CPA period is still relevant today."

Bowen, who is scheduled to sit at the same witness table as Bremer, will contend that there were basic steps the CPA could have taken to improve oversight of how the money was spent, according to an official familiar with his plans.

Bremer may get the benefit of the doubt from Republicans with regard to the expenditure of Iraqi oil money. "Mistakes have clearly been made," said David Marin, director of the Oversight Committee's Republican staff. "But every time we talk about money being spent without appropriate internal controls, we also need to remember the importance of getting money out quickly to get Iraq up and running."

But Shays indicated that GOP committee members are inclined to take a dim view of decisions other than the expenditure of oil money, particularly the dissolution of the Iraqi army and de-Baathification.

In those cases, "it's hard to imagine a lot of members coming to his defense," one congressional GOP official said. "He's got to defend himself."

Dozens Killed As Baghdad Crackdown Nears (AP)

By Robert H. Reid

AP, February 6, 2007

Bombings and mortar attacks killed dozens across Baghdad on Monday as Iraqi troops set up new checkpoints and an Iraqi general took command — indications that the much-awaited operation to restore peace to the capital is gearing up nearly a month after it was announced.

With little sign of an end to the carnage, many Iraqis have begun complaining that the security drive has been too slow in starting, allowing extremists free rein to launch spectacular attacks that have killed nearly 1,000 in the past week.

Monday's death toll supported their frustration. At least 74 people were killed or found dead across the country — all but seven of them in Baghdad.

With so much at stake, U.S. commanders have moved methodically to plan the operation and assemble the force, eager to avoid the mistakes that accompanied two failed crackdowns last year.

The U.S. military officials said Monday they consider the operation to have been under way ever since Bush signed the order last month to start moving troops to Iraq. U.S. officers offered assurances that once the operation gets rolling, Iraqis will begin to see a difference.

"It's going to be much more than this city has ever seen and it's going to be a rolling surge," Col. Douglass Heckman, the senior adviser to the 9th Iraqi Army Division, said of the operation.

But Iraqi politicians — Shiite and Sunni alike — urged the government to speed up implementation of the plan, which President Bush announced Jan. 11. The operation would put thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops on the street to protect civilians against sectarian bombers and death squads.

In a sign that the crackdown is near, Iraqi troops manned a major new checkpoint Monday at the northern gate to Baghdad, searching cars and trucks heading to and from Sunni insurgent areas to the north. Soldiers and police said the checkpoint was set up as part of the security plan.

Elsewhere, Rahim al-Daraji, a senior official in Sadr City, said police were already moving into the capital's sprawling Shiite slum, stronghold of the notorious Mahdi Army militia.

Gambar, who was taken prisoner by U.S. troops in the 1991 Gulf War, will have two Iraqi deputies, one on each side of the Tigris River, which flows through the center of the capital. The city will be divided into nine districts, each with as many as 600 U.S. soldiers to back up Iraqi troops who will take the lead in the security drive.

In announcing the plan, Bush said he was sending 21,500 additional American troops mostly to Baghdad in what is widely seen as a last chance to quell the sectarian violence ravaging the capital and surrounding regions.

About 3,000 paratroopers from the 2nd Brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division arrived in Iraq in late January and were expected to begin operations in the coming days. But the last of the U.S. reinforcements are not due until May.

Monday's slaughter killed 15 people in back-to-back car bombings at a gasoline station in Sadiyah, a mostly Sunni neighborhood of southwestern Baghdad, police said. Eight people were killed when a bomb exploded in a garbage can in a Sunni enclave in central Baghdad, according to police.

Four mortar shells exploded about sundown in a Shiite part of Dora, killing seven people, police said.

The U.S. military reported the deaths of two American soldiers, both killed on Sunday north of Baghdad.

With violence roiling the capital, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has come under strong pressure from fellow Shiite politicians to speed up the operation because most of the recent victims of Baghdad attacks have been Shiites.

They were joined in their appeal by Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashimi, who said the government needs to move fast "because people cannot tolerate ... this sort of chaos and the killing around the clock."

"I am very much interested in fact to speed up the implementation of this plan in fact," al-Hashimi told the British Broadcasting Corp. Two of his brothers and one sister were assassinated last year in separate unsolved murders.

U.S. officials believe the previous crackdowns faltered because the Iraqis were unable to bring enough of their own troops to the capital. Some units in southern Iraq refused orders to move to Baghdad.

This time, the Iraqis have promised up to 8,000 new troops, including well-trained Kurdish units from the north.

While Iraqi units have been arriving on schedule, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said last week they were at only 55 to 65 percent strength and that "probably isn't good enough."

"There is no specified time for starting the security plan, but preparations and deployment of the forces including the checkpoints inside and surrounding Baghdad has begun," Deputy Prime Minister Salam al-Zobaie told Al-Jazeera television.

Al-Zobaie, a Sunni, said the government had great hopes for the success of the security plan although the Iraqi military contribution would be "less than expected."

Public anger, especially among Shiites, has welled up since a huge truck bomb Saturday devastated the Sadriyah market in a mostly Shiite part of central Baghdad, killing 137 people. It was the fifth major bombing in less than a month against Shiite targets in Baghdad and southern Iraq.

Such attacks have discredited Iraqi security forces at a time when the government is urging people to put their trust in the army and police — rather than sectarian militias.

Under American pressure, Shiite politicians persuaded radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr to pull his Mahdi militiamen off the streets to avoid a confrontation with the Americans.

But many Shiites complain that the move effectively handed the streets to Sunni extremists before U.S. and Iraqi forces were ready to assume control.

"This delay in the implementation of the security plan is not good and has had negative consequences for Iraqis," said Falah Hassan, a spokesman for al-Sadr's movement. "We demand that the plan be executed as soon as possible because the terrorists are going too far in their vicious attacks."

In Washington, Bush said he understood that the Iraqis are eager to see improvements in security.

"We'd like to do it as quickly as possible," he said. "The success of that plan is going to depend upon the capacity and willingness of the Iraqis to do hard work. We want to help them do that work."

Much of the sectarian violence has been blamed on forces loyal to al-Sadr, a close political ally of al-Maliki.

Last weekend, two key members of al-Sadr's organization were killed, one in the southern city of Basra and another in a confrontation with U.S. troops northeast of Baghdad.

Ali Khazim, who ran al-Sadr's political organization in volatile Diyala province, was killed Sunday by American soldiers at his home 12 miles east of Baqouba, according to Saleh al-Ageili, a spokesman for the Sadr Movement's parliamentary bloc.

The spokesman said Khazim was stabbed with a bayonet.

"What has happened to Khazim is part of the series of provocative acts by the occupation forces against the Sadr movement. The occupation forces know well who are the terrorists and their whereabouts, yet they are targeting our people," al-Ageili told The Associated Press.

The U.S. military said in a statement that Iraqi troops backed by Americans had shot and killed the leader of a rogue Mahdi Army group but did not name Khazim as the victim.

The second Sadr organization official, Khalil al-Maliki, was killed by three gunmen in a drive-by shooting on Sunday in Basra.

U.S. Unit Walks 'A Fine Line' In Iraqi Capital (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 5 -- The camouflaged American soldiers, weary from hours of struggling to talk with Iraqis during a patrol in eastern Baghdad, laughed with relief after an Iraqi army major's wife met them at her door. The soldiers had no interpreter. She had a master's degree in English translation.

"Do you want to work for the Americans?" asked U.S. Army Lt. Anthony Slamar, 26. "Do you want a job as a translator?"

The woman stepped back into her darkened doorway.

"With you? No. Not with you. Do I want to die?" she said. "I am afraid of you, I'm sorry."

The American and Iraqi plan to pacify the capital rests on the assumption that U.S. troops can win the trust of a wary population by protecting civilians trapped amid sectarian warfare. Each day, U.S. soldiers go door-to-door in the city, searching bedrooms and bathrooms, cabinets and closets, for unauthorized weapons. The operations also offer a chance to cultivate Iraqis as sources of information about the violence entangling their neighborhoods.

But soldiers in a task force from the 1st Battalion, 26th Infantry Regiment, who have patrolled Baghdad for months, say that trying to gain cooperation from Iraqi civilians is a thankless struggle. They say they feel powerless to prevent the city's slide into wider war and that Iraqis seldom open up to them with detailed intelligence. Since the task force of more than 800 soldiers arrived in August, 15 of them have been killed.

Although their commanders argue otherwise, the extent of the challenge led some soldiers to express doubt in interviews that the additional 17,500 American troops slated for Baghdad can make a lasting difference.

"I don't think the infantry or pretty much anyone in the United States Army are properly trained to deal with the guerrilla tactics these guys use against us," said Spec. Jeffrey Steele, 22. "This is a policing thing, you know. It needs more investigation into how these guys work, where they're located. I don't think we can do any better."

At 7:30 a.m. Thursday, under a drizzling rain, Slamar gathered his unit in a circle in a gravel lot on their base to brief them on the day's mission. He passed around a photograph of a tire filled with explosives, a new type of roadside bomb found in the sector they patrol.

"They are filled with rifle ammunition, nails and pieces of iron to increase the intensity of the explosion and increase its fragmentation effect. Lovely," Slamar said. "Make sure you're . . . scanning, okay? Hey, now's not the . . . time to give up, all right? We've still got a long deployment ahead of us. Keep on going."

The five-Humvee convoy rumbled out of the camp gates and drove south to Qahira, a mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhood in northeastern Baghdad caught between the Shiite militias in Sadr City to the east and Sunni insurgents in Adhamiyah to the west.

The first goal was to identify potential rooftop sniper positions for a future operation. The troops, armed with M-4 assault rifles, fanned out and soon found a resident, Ahmed, to lead them into a house they wanted to inspect. When the soldiers entered, past plates of orange peels and half-eaten bread in the kitchen, nervous children came down a marble staircase in their pajamas and stood next to their barefoot mother.

"We're just in the area to secure the area, so we're visiting people," said Capt. Andrew Jasso. "There's been a lot of explosions, like on the road here, the bombs."

"No, no, no, no, okay, okay," Ahmed said, motioning toward neighboring houses. "Friend and friend and friend, okay, no problem."

"So this area is pretty good?" Jasso said, sounding dubious. A single bullet hole was visible in the wall above the stairway.

"No problem," Ahmed said.

The lack of an Arabic interpreter -- a chronic problem, the soldiers say -- made communication more difficult. But even when Americans and Iraqis can understand each other, U.S. soldiers said, many Iraqis do not speak openly because they are afraid of being perceived in their neighborhood as collaborating with the Americans.

The Iraqi army major with the English-speaking wife begged the Americans not to reveal his profession to his neighbors, and said he would be risking his life even going outside with them.

"If the people see me with you, they do this," he said, shooting an imaginary gun with his hands. "Okay? Understand? They come and kill me: 'You work with the U.S.A.' "

The American troops took some care to be polite when entering Iraqi homes. During Thursday's six-hour patrol, they handed out Iraqi newspapers and packets of gum and attracted an eager following of young children. But machine-gun-toting Americans rooting through bedrooms, inspecting weapons and demanding identification cards clearly unsettled some residents.

Inside the Iraqi major's house, Jasso tried to put the major's wife and her relatives at ease by telling stories about his two young children. She interrupted him. "Sorry, I have to ask you. Why didn't you just knock at the door? Why did you just jump in?"

A soldier explained to her that the Americans avoid standing in the street in front of houses because of the threat of snipers.

"Just trying not to give everyone a bad impression of Americans is the hardest thing," said Staff Sgt. Andrew McKay, 27. "Being courteous, being nice to the kids, being nice to the families, but still maintaining your military bearing and doing your job -- it's a fine line to walk."

Faced with an often distrustful, frightened populace, members of the task force said they doubted that adding thousands more U.S. troops would change this frustrating dynamic. One soldier, on his second tour in Iraq, said the attitude of the Iraqi civilians toward the Americans continues to deteriorate.

"Whatever new plans they come up with, it won't work out here. It's getting worse and worse," the soldier said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he worried about a reprimand from his superior officers. "I was here last time, in the beginning. Now it's totally changed. They don't even respect us anymore. They spit at us, they throw rocks at us. It wasn't like that before."

Higher-ranking officers with the task force said they see encouraging signs that cooperation with Iraqis will improve as the new security initiative in Baghdad begins.

The unit's acting commander, Maj. Clay Padgett, said the influx of U.S. troops and changes in tactics would generate more intelligence about insurgent and militia activity. He said the troops would move onto smaller bases to increase their presence in violent neighborhoods.

Within the past month, Padgett's task force has set up one office known as a joint security site, or JSS, that brings together representatives from the Iraqi police, army and coalition forces to coordinate information and operations. The new security plan calls for about 35 more such sites spread over Baghdad's nine security districts.

"When you hear the stories about soldiers who say the local Iraqis don't want us to be here, you would be amazed at the amount of tips that have come in just from us establishing inside of the JSS," Padgett said. "And because we're right there" with the Iraqi police, "we're right there inside the community. All of a sudden the community feels as though here's another window of opportunity to come up and talk to coalition forces."

Sgt. 1st Class Luis Enrique Gutierrez Rosales, 38, said most of the Iraqis he has met say they are pleased that the Americans patrol their neighborhoods. "They said they always feel safe when we're around. People stop on the road and say thank you. They say, 'If it wasn't for you, I probably wouldn't be alive,' " he said.

But some of his soldiers saw less reason to be hopeful about either their relations with the Iraqis or the troop increase. After the patrol on Thursday, Sgt. Michael Hiler, 26, stepped down from his Humvee and described the day's effort as "stupid."

"We should have pulled out a long time ago," Hiler said. "It's going to take the hand of God to change anything about what we do here, which is nothing. This country's going to fall apart sooner or later, and at this point I say, 'Good riddance.' "

Sitting on bunks while waiting for an evening patrol, a group of soldiers discussed the enemy and the latest security effort, described by Padgett as "the last best hope for Iraq."

"All these extra troops start coming into Baghdad, you'll start reducing the anti-American violence. That way, it will show quick results for the Bush administration. And that way, 'Hey, we won the war, let's get out of here,' " said Pfc. Daniel Gomez, 21, a medic. But he said of the forces opposing the Americans: "They're like the Viet Cong, they can wait it out. We're not going to be here forever, and they know that. And then we're gone, and it's all theirs."

Anti-violence Push Begins In Baghdad (WT/AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

BAGHDAD -- An Iraqi general took charge of the security operation in Baghdad yesterday as Iraqi police and soldiers manned new roadblocks -- initial steps indicating the start of the anticipated joint operation with American forces to curb sectarian bloodshed.

Stung by continuing violence, Iraqi officials urged the United States to implement the plan as quickly as possible, particularly as some militias -- which had offered the only protection in certain neighborhoods -- have disappeared from the streets.

At least 38 persons died in bomb and mortar attacks across the city yesterday, 15 of them when two car bombs blew up in quick succession as they waited to buy gasoline in southern Baghdad. Seven persons died after nightfall, when four mortar shells struck a Shi'ite neighborhood in southern Baghdad.

The command center for the joint operation, staffed by Iraqis and Americans, opened yesterday inside the fortified Green Zone next to the prime minister's office.

U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Christopher Garver said the Baghdad command center was manned but "not yet up and running."

"It'll take a few days to get things organized," he said.

A spokesman for the Sadr Movement, an important Shi'ite bloc in parliament, complained that the security crackdown has been too long in coming, leaving a security vacuum that has allowed suicide bombers to devastate several Shi'ite marketplaces over the past few weeks.

An estimated 135 persons died in a truck bombing Saturday in the Sadriyah market, the deadliest single bomb attack since the war began.

Falah Hassan, the Sadr bloc lawmaker and spokesman, said the delay "has negative consequences for the lives of the Iraqis."

"We demand that the plan be executed as soon as possible because the terrorists are going too far in their vicious attacks," Mr. Hassan said on behalf of the lawmakers loyal to renegade anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Two senior members of Sheik al-Sadr's political and military organization were killed outside Baghdad yesterday, a sign that leaders of the organization are being targeted by Sunni insurgents as well as U.S. and Iraqi forces.

Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashimi, also called on the United States to speed up its the deployment of extra troops, telling the British Broadcasting Corp. that he wanted the plan in place "as soon as possible, because people cannot tolerate in fact this sort of chaos and the killing around the clock."

The White House said the new strategy was going about as well as could be expected.

"This is not a problem that's going to be solved overnight," spokesman Tony Fratto said. "This plan is intended to bring long-lasting security to Baghdad. It's going to take some time to put all of the elements in place."

The security sweep will be led by Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar, who was named to the top position under pressure from the United States after it rejected Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's first choice, Lt. Gen. Mohan al-Freiji.

Gen. Gambar will have two Iraqi deputies, one on each side of the Tigris River, which splits Baghdad north to south. The city is to be divided into nine districts, and as many as 600 U.S. forces in each district are to back up Iraqi troops.

The security drive, for which President Bush has dispatched 21,500 additional American forces, was seen by many as a last chance to quell sectarian violence in and around the capital.

Two security operations over the past nine months -- Operations Together Forward I and II -- have failed to halt the violence, in part because Iraqi authorities failed to produce the number of troops promised.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said last week that Iraqi troops who arrived to augment the newly assembled Baghdad force were only at about half strength.

US Prepares For Baghdad Crackdown (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

A new command centre for US-Iraqi operations aimed at restoring security in Baghdad will be operational “within days”, US officers said on Monday, paving the way for a planned offensive in the capital.

US advisers to Iraqi forces predicted that the scale of the operations – designed to contain both Shia militias and Sunni insurgents – would be larger than previous sweeps of the capital.

However, a weekend of violence – including an explosives-rigged truck that killed at least 135 in a Baghdad market on Saturday – may undercut Shia support for the operations, particularly as many believe the US is focusing too heavily in its new offensive on Shia militias, such as the Mahdi army associated with Moqtada al-Sadr, the radical cleric.

Saturday’s attack – possibly the most deadly single bombing since the US-led 2003 invasion – could feed perceptions that Shia have become more vulnerable as their militias take a low profile for fear of a crackdown by US forces. The deaths of two Sadrist leaders at the weekend – one in a raid by the US military and another by gunmen assumed to be Sunni insurgents – may reinforce Shia perceptions that they are being unfairly-targeted.

The new Baghdad offensive will be backed by reinforcements that are part of the “surge” pledged by US President George W. Bush last month.

US troops reportedly intend to move into Baghdad neighbourhoods in greater numbers than before and establish a more lasting presence in the form of small combat outposts that will prevent insurgents and militias – once forced out of districts – from returning.

US officers have in the past suggested that the surge is intended to be a sustained, months-long effort, and Iraqis will not feel the full impact in their neighbourhoods until the late summer. Previous US offensives have often led to a short-term fall in violence, with bloodshed escalating again as forces move elsewhere.

However, supporters of the surge – both US and Iraqi – argue that a sustained period of stability may allow Iraqi state institutions to become more confident and more established on the neighbourhood level, with citizens putting their trust in government forces rather than militias or insurgents.

The deployment of additional US troops is predicated on support from the government of Nouri al-Maliki, prime minister, which is implementing its own security clampdown.

"What we're trying to do with this reinforcement of our troops is to provide enough space so that the Iraqi government can meet certain benchmarks or certain requirements for a unity government to survive and for the country to be strong," Mr Bush said on Monday.

U.S. Advisers Find Joint Patrols With Iraqis Don't Go As Planned (USAT)

By Jim Michaels

USA Today, February 6, 2007

MAHMOUDIYA, Iraq — In the pre-dawn chill, 1st Lt. Seth Reimers briefed his men. A joint patrol of about 60 soldiers equally divided between Iraqi and U.S. forces would storm a compound outside of town and grab a suspected insurgent financier.

"The Iraqi army is taking the lead," Reimers, 24, explained to the U.S. troops before they climbed into idling Humvees. "We're there to support."

It didn't quite work that way. A couple hours after the briefing, the combined patrol broke through a gate surrounding a compound and burst into the main house. The American soldiers immediately took the initiative. They stormed through, searching rooms and looking for suspects. With their weapons raised to their shoulders, the Americans moved deliberately up the stairs, calling to each other as they cleared rooms.

Meanwhile, many of the Iraqi soldiers hesitated, waiting for someone to tell them what to do. They stood to the side watching the action, their weapons at their sides.

Outside, two American Apache attack helicopters clattered overhead, tracking the locations of suspects who fled across surrounding farm fields. U.S. officers kept in radio touch with the pilots and directed the search.

Capt. Ian Perry, 26, executive officer of Battery A, Task Force 2-15, said later of the Iraqi soldiers, "They hung back a little bit. That's not common. Usually they're really into it." Perry said the Iraqi troops might not have been fully briefed about the mission or the pre-dawn start may have been a little early for them.

Getting Iraqi forces trained, motivated and taking the lead in the fight against insurgents and illegal militias has been a struggle for the U.S. military.

"This is occurring slower than we originally projected," Gen. George Casey, the outgoing top U.S. commander in Iraq, acknowledged last week in congressional testimony.

A major U.S. intelligence report released last Friday said that Iraqi security forces lack the training, equipment and skills necessary to replace U.S. troops. The National Intelligence Estimate said that, if U.S. troops were withdrawn in the next 12 to 18 months, "this almost certainly would lead to a significant increase in the scale and scope of sectarian conflict in Iraq."

To improve the performance of Iraqi forces, the U.S. military is boosting the number of advisers and American units training and living with Iraqi forces, says Maj. Gen. Carter Ham, commander of a new school for training military advisers at Fort Riley, Kan.

Raids such as the one Reimers led illustrate the complexity of their mission. Even the best of Iraqi units still have trouble operating without American assistance. "In my opinion it will take three or four years" before Iraqi forces are capable of functioning without any U.S. assistance, says Sgt. Olan Aldrich, 25, part of the American advisory team here.

It's a risky mission. Since the first military and national police advisers came to Iraq in September 2004, 33 have been killed, according to the Iraqi Assistance Group, which oversees U.S. advisers. Almost half the deaths occurred in the past six months as Iraqis have played a more prominent combat role.

That has exposed advisers, as well as Iraqis, to greater dangers. "The Iraqi security forces are truly more in the lead, and the transition teams are with them," says Brig. Gen. Dana Pittard, commander of the Iraqi Assistance Group. "They're out there in harm's way constantly." There are about 5,000 American advisers in Iraq now.

Since 2004, the U.S. Army and Marines have placed about a dozen advisers with each Iraqi battalion of about 500 troops.

Reimers' unit is part of an experiment to take the partnership a step further, by placing an entire American battalion, in this case about 400 soldiers, with an Iraqi brigade of 3,000 soldiers. Col. Mike Kershaw, 45, says the move puts "more people against the problem."

The brass are watching the experiment closely. "That's the future," Pittard says. "We will see more and more of that."

Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, the No. 2 ranking U.S. commander in Iraq, says the Iraqi brigade based here, the 4th Brigade, 6th Army Division, is successful largely because of the decision to place more Americans with the unit.

Advising is not a role that comes naturally to American officers and non-commissioned officers. Advisers are told to take a back seat during operations, allowing Iraqi leaders to take charge. "We've taken officers and NCOs who for their entire time in the Army were encouraged to be aggressive," Ham says. "Now we're saying, 'Don't do that. I don't want you to lead from the front.' "

Reimers, from Ogden, Iowa, coached his Iraqi counterpart, Maj. Dhamad Shaiah al-Musawy, as the raid unfolded. Reimers and al-Musawy began questioning a suspect found in the compound. He wasn't the man they were looking for, but he might have been related.

Reimers turned to the Iraqi officer. "What do you want to do?" Reimers asked. "It's your call, brother. I recommend we detain him, but it's up to you." The Iraqi officer ordered the suspect detained.

After leaving the compound, the soldiers took off across fields in pursuit of men who had fled the compound moments before the soldiers arrived. Reimers yelled "Yallah," or "Let's go," as he encouraged Iraqi soldiers to keep up as the group dashed across muddy farm fields and jumped across irrigation ditches in pursuit of the men.

Overhead, one of the Apache helicopters dropped flares over locations where the pilots saw fleeing men. The stink of a nearby chicken coop hung in the air, and stray dogs barked at the running soldiers.

After the initial raid, Perry said the Iraqi soldiers did a thorough search of the compound and helped scour the surrounding farm fields for men who fled the compound. "With some guidance from Lt. Reimers, they performed to standard eventually," he said.

About a dozen men were detained during and after the raid. All were later released. It turned out the two informants who told U.S. forces about the suspect were not able to provide enough specifics to hold any of them, including a couple brothers of the suspect. Nor was anything incriminating found in the home.

In order to keep suspects in custody, U.S. and Iraqi forces have to provide evidence to hold up in Iraq's court system, where they are eventually tried. "The evidence was insufficient," Perry says.

Planning for the Americans started days before the raid. But most Iraqis going on the raid learned about the target only hours before it was launched. The Americans say they don't brief their Iraqi counterparts until the last moment to avoid a leak that might tip off a suspect. Iraqi troops often have ties to the community or can be intimidated by insurgents who regularly threaten the families of Iraqi soldiers.

"There are some leaks," Perry says. "That is recognized by everyone."

Still, the Americans work hard to develop relationships with their Iraqi counterparts. Sipping sweet tea and eating flat bread, American and Iraqi advisers gathered at an Iraqi base here to review satellite photos and discuss details of the plan before heading out on the raid.

"I work with this group (of Americans) like my family," says al-Musawy, 35, who has spent most of his adult life in the Iraqi military. "They're my brothers. They work hard. They know military science."

When the Iraqi brigade commander's father fell seriously ill, his American adviser, Lt. Col. Bob Morschauser, saw to it that he received treatment at an American military hospital.

DOJ_NMG_0128153

"The American adviser is not in command," says Col. Timothy Reese, director of the Combat Studies Institute at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., which has studied past U.S. adviser missions in Vietnam, Korea and elsewhere. "Your authority is limited to the personal rapport you develop with your counterpart."

U.S. advisers are encouraged to read the works of T.E. Lawrence, the legendary British author who helped lead an Arab revolt during World War I and became known as Lawrence of Arabia. "Do not try to do too much with your own hands," Lawrence wrote in a 1917 article in The Arab Bulletin. "Better the Arabs do it tolerably than you do it perfectly. It is their war, and you are to help them, not to win it for them."

"You can't go into this job thinking they're the American Army," says Maj. Matt Zimmerman, the operations officer of the 2-15 Task Force, which advises the Iraqi brigade. "They're not."

During a joint patrol in Mahmoudiya, one Iraqi officer strolled down the road without body armor or a rifle, a violation of normal operating procedures. He carried a handheld radio.

Reimers said he notices improvements and cannot correct every transgression he sees. Before a foot patrol got underway, the Iraqi battalion sergeant major, the top enlisted man, was hustling to get the Iraqi troops prepared when it was clear they were running late. In the past, only Iraqi officers had exercised any leadership. Reimers noted that non-commissioned officers were now taking initiative. "They feel like they're letting us down if they're not ready," Reimers said, watching him scramble after his troops. "That's more progress."

The Iraqi forces are not nearly as well-equipped and protected as their American counterparts.

The lack of equipment and logistical support is the largest problem facing Iraqi forces, say U.S. advisers.

The 566-man Iraqi battalion here in Mahmoudiya, just south of Baghdad, has only 11 Humvees that work. Four were disabled by roadside bombs and are waiting to be fixed. They have five pickups, used in part to ferry troops.

The Iraqi battalion is equipped with AK-47s and machine guns but has no mortars or artillery support.

A U.S. battalion of similar size has about 55 Humvees. American troops travel only in Humvees or other armored vehicles when they drive outside their base. Iraqi and U.S. troops here are regularly attacked by roadside bombs.

Iraq's Defense Ministry has struggled to support its troops. "There is a big problem with the Ministry of Defense," says Lt. Col. Abdul Muhsin Falei Jabar, the Iraqi battalion commander here.

"Iraqis need a little help in getting the wherewithal to run a large army," Ham says. "That is probably the next major undertaking" for the U.S. effort to build up the Iraqi military.

One advantage of placing an entire U.S. battalion with an Iraqi unit is that the Americans can plug the gaps left by Iraq's Defense Ministry. Instead of waiting on the ministry, the Americans fixed the Iraqi Humvees. The U.S. government has paid for new barracks on the Iraqi base here.

"They're trying to get flashlights for their weapons," Aldrich says. "They can't get them, but I can."

Aldrich, an armorer, sat on a wall eating a bowl of rice and meat given to him by Iraqi colleagues.

Pvt. Saif Saad sat next to Aldrich, watching him eat. "We're like brothers," Saad said. "We feel safe when we go with Americans."

Well-fed and equipped American troops are often a source of wonderment to Iraqi soldiers. Iraqi troops who eat at the U.S. mess hall are often amazed at the quantity and variety of food available to Americans.

A couple of Iraqi officers visiting the nearby U.S. base carried trays piled high with food. Chips, pastries and packages of small snacks were balanced precariously on their trays. One of the Iraqi officers expressed surprise, however, that smoking wasn't allowed in the mess hall.

Part of the idea behind having the Iraqis work closely with U.S. forces is to have American military values rub off on Iraqis.

In the former Iraqi army, "all the officers were like dictators," Jabar says.

"There were no good relations between officers and soldiers. We understand stuff now," he says.

"They strive to be like we are," Reimers says.

But not all the time. The American military has a tradition of officers serving enlisted troops in the mess hall during holidays. The sight of American officers at a Christmas dinner behind the serving line with small white hats appeared strange to Iraqi officers accustomed to a different, more autocratic, style of leadership.

Troops In Iraq Kill Official Who Worked For Shiite Cleric (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 5 — The director of the political office in Diyala Province for the powerful anti-American Shiite militia leader Moktada al-Sadr was shot and killed by troops during a raid on Sunday, a Sadr political spokesman said Monday.

A statement by the United States military did not identify the official who was killed. It said Iraqi troops had killed a leader of "rogue" and criminal elements of Mr. Sadr's Mahdi Army in Diyala who had directed attacks on American forces as well as "kidnappings, assassinations and other violence targeting Iraqi civilians and Iraqi police."

But a spokesman in Baghdad for Mr. Sadr's political movement, Salah al-Agaili, identified the official as Ali Khazim al-Hamdani. The spokesman said that Mr. Khazim had been the chief of Mr. Sadr's political office in Diyala and that he had not turned rogue or otherwise distanced himself from the Sadr movement. The spokesman also termed the death a "provocation."

Some American officials familiar with Diyala, a volatile province north of Baghdad, have said that Mr. Khazim provided intelligence to the American military, beginning last summer. In one instance, they said, Mr. Khazim supplied information that led to the capture of Shiite militiamen who had killed three American soldiers with a powerful roadside bomb near Baquba last fall.

One American official said that at one point last year Mr. Khazim sought to reduce the Mahdi militia's emphasis on attacking American and Iraqi forces, but that the effort had helped put Mr. Khazim in conflict with other more militant factions associated with the Mahdi Army, including forces allied with Abu Dera, the feared Shiite death squad commander.

In an interview last year, Mr. Khazim explained that Mahdi militiamen were pouring into Diyala to protect Shiites being terrorized by Sunni insurgents. "If my brothers are killed, we have to react to that," he said.

Sunni insurgents have overrun much of Diyala Province and killed or driven out thousands of Shiites. They often attack the province's Shiite-dominated security forces, whose commanders, American officials have said, include officers with close ties to Shiite militias and death squads.

2 Key Members Of Mahdi Army Killed (AP)

Two key members of radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's political and military organization were gunned down just days before the U.S. and Iraqi forces planned to open a massive security drive in Baghdad.

Ali Khazim, who ran al-Sadr's political organization in volatile Diyala province northeast of Baghdad, was killed Sunday by U.S. forces at his home in Howaider village, 12 miles east of Baqouba, Saleh al-Ageili, a spokesman for the Sadr Movement's parliamentary bloc, said on Monday. Provincial police confirmed al-Ageili's account.

"What has happened to Khazim is part of the series of provocative acts by the occupation forces against the Sadr movement. The occupation forces know well who are the terrorists and their whereabouts, yet they are targeting our people," al-Ageili told The Associated Press.

The U.S. military did not immediately respond to telephone and e-mail requests for comment.

The second official, Khalil al-Maliki, a key figure in al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia in Basra, was killed by three gunmen in a drive-by shooting on Sunday in the southern city of Basra, police reported. He survived an assassination attempt in the city last year.

As many as seven key figures in the al-Sadr organization have been killed or captured in the past two months, at least three of them by U.S. forces, after Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, also a Shiite, dropped his protection for the organization — a crucial backer in his rise to power.

The coming security drive, to which President Bush has dispatched 21,500 additional American forces, was seen as a last-chance effort to quell the sectarian violence ravaging the capital and surrounding regions.

Security Crackdown In Capital Takes Shape As Attacks Kill Dozens (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

DOJ_NMG_0128155

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 5 -- Bombs and mortar shells killed more than 37 people in Baghdad on Monday, as U.S. officials said that the command structure for the new security crackdown in the capital was ready.

In the deadliest attack, a small truck rigged with explosives was detonated near a gas station in the Bayya neighborhood, killing 15 people and wounding 58, according to Col. Fakher Hussein of the Interior Ministry. A car bomb that exploded in an industrial area of central Baghdad took the lives of 13 people, he said.

The U.S. and Iraqi militaries have for months been preparing a massive security initiative aimed at quelling the daily killing in the capital. A spokeswoman for the U.S. military, Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, said Monday that the command structure and choice of personnel to head the effort have now been established.

Iraqi forces in the capital will be led by Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar, a former naval commander in the military of deposed president Saddam Hussein. Gambar was taken prisoner by U.S. forces during the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

A Shiite from the southern city of Amarah, he will report directly to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, whose viability as Iraq's leader hinges on his ability to temper the violence in Baghdad.

The selection of Gambar, a relatively unknown officer, was greeted with skepticism by some Iraqi and U.S. officials. But an aide to Maliki said the prime minister remains confident in his choice and that Gambar has the support of coalition commanders. During a meeting last month between Maliki and Lt. Gen. Graeme Lamb, the senior British general in Iraq, Lamb pronounced Gambar a "good man," the aide said.

Gambar will have deputies in charge of the east and west sides of Baghdad, which is divided by the Tigris River, and will oversee the nine security districts recently established in the capital. President Bush plans to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq, and thousands of them have begun arriving in Baghdad.

The troop increase "changes the dynamic by adding an air of confidence to operations that we do in conjunction" with Iraqi forces, said Maj. Clay Padgett, acting commander of the 1st Battalion, 26th Infantry Regiment, a task force that patrols northeastern Baghdad.

"Quite frankly, we have had difficulties with areas inside of Baghdad that do not have a coalition forces presence. Because it's almost like putting your finger on a dot of mercury. You hit it and it goes all over the place. And unfortunately, you didn't have enough hands doing the same thing."

Also on Monday, Iraqi followers of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr reacted angrily to the killings of two alleged leaders of the Mahdi Army, the powerful militia that is largely controlled by Sadr. One Sadr follower, Ali Kadhum al-Hamdani, 38, was shot dead by Iraqi soldiers, backed by U.S. advisers, during a raid on his home in the insurgent hotbed of Baqubah, in Diyala province north of Baghdad.

The U.S. military did not name the dead man but identified him as a "rogue" leader of the Mahdi Army.

"The suspect is believed to have facilitated and directed numerous kidnappings, assassinations and other violence targeting Iraqi civilians and Iraqi Police. He is reportedly responsible for several attacks against Coalition and Iraqi Forces in the area," the military said in a statement.

A spokesman for the Diyala police, Ali al-Khaiyam, said Hamdani was killed near his home. He owned a flower shop in the main Baqubah market and handed out candy to children to celebrate the fall of Saddam Hussein.

The second Sadr official, Khalil al-Maliki, from the Mahdi Army in Basra, was killed in a drive-by shooting on Sunday, according to a Sadr spokesman.

Abdul Razzaq al-Windawi, the spokesman, said he viewed the killings as part of an increased effort by Americans "and their agents" to target Sadr's followers. The Iraqi government has been widely criticized for not doing enough to target violent followers of Sadr.

The U.S. military on Monday also announced the recent deaths of two U.S. soldiers. On Sunday, one soldier was killed and two were wounded by a roadside bomb during a patrol north of Baghdad. A soldier in Diyala province died during a small-arms attack by insurgents, the military said in a statement. The Americans' names were not released.

At least nine other people were killed in Baghdad on Monday, at least one in a mortar attack, officials said.

US Eases Tone On Iran's Role In Iraq (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON

In an atmosphere of sharp skepticism about intelligence and heightened sensitivity to saber rattling since the Iraq invasion, the Bush administration is signaling a more cautious tone toward Iran.

Less than a month ago, President Bush used a speech on a way forward in Iraq to present fresh accusations against Iran and roll out a more aggressive approach to the regime in Tehran. Now, the Iran debate is sounding markedly different.

Senior officials from the White House, State Department, and Pentagon are playing down the evidence the US possesses of "nefarious" Iranian involvement in Iraq's spiraling violence – in particular against US forces there. They're also insisting the US wants to work out problems with Tehran diplomatically.

A repeated delay in a promised presentation of evidence against Iran reflects the administration's desire to get things right, and to neither overplay nor underestimate involvement, officials say.

Explaining why the rollout of facts on Iranian involvement has been delayed, Stephen Hadley, Mr. Bush's national security adviser, told reporters Friday that "the truth is, quite frankly, we thought the briefing overstated, and we sent it back to get it narrowed and focused on the facts."

But the moderated tone also suggests an administration still smarting over memories of the earlier botched campaign to justify taking on Saddam Hussein, some experts say. And with some military officials cautioning against the risks of an "accidental escalation" resulting from a mishandling of the new aggressiveness toward Iran, the administration may have decided to pull back, they say.

Yet others with experience in similar situations involving both policy and intelligence motivations believe some evidence linking Iran to recent acts of violence is in US hands – but that intelligence officials have resisted its release for fear of compromising a fruitful information channel.

"What we've seen so far suggests information from somewhere in the Iranian government, perhaps from the Quds force of the Revolutionary Guard, but the intelligence people don't want to let it out for fear of tipping off the Iranians or losing a source," says Wayne White, a former Middle East analyst with the State Department's bureau of intelligence and research.

"Cat fights" are common, Mr. White says, between "policy people" who want to get the information out, and the intelligence side that is more focused on long-term effectiveness. "I suspect there was quite a lot of friction last week over Iran," he says.

The charges against Iran so far appear to stem from the following incidents:

•On Jan. 11, the United States raided the Iranian mission in the Kurdish city of Arbil, detaining six people and seizing what it said was material suggesting Iranian involvement in the supply of more powerful and sophisticated arms used in attacks on US forces.

•In late December, other Iranians, including two diplomats, were detained in Iraq and questioned. The diplomats were later released.

•Five US soldiers were abducted and killed in a sophisticated operation Jan. 20 in the Shiite city of Karbala. US military officials in Baghdad suspected the attackers, who wore US-style uniforms, of either being Iranian or benefiting from Iranian training. US military sources said they had never seen so sophisticated an attack from Iraqi insurgents.

•For more than a year, US armored vehicles, including the M1 Abrams battle tank, have been the target of increasingly powerful and sophisticated weaponry.

Last August, Brig. Gen. Michael Barbero cited "irrefutable" evidence that Iran was providing the technology for advanced explosive devices being used against US forces. In a Pentagon briefing, he said Iran was funding, equipping, and training "Shia extremist groups." But British forces patrolling Iraq's southeastern border with Iran reported last fall encountering more hearsay than evidence of such activity.

Zalmay Khalilzad, US ambassador to Iraq, said after the Arbil operation that some of the detained were from the Quds force and that one detainee was a director of operations for the Quds force.

But last week, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said that information he had seen from the Karbala attack was "ambiguous" as to an Iranian role, adding that it was too early in the investigation to be conclusive.

Also last week, Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of State for political affairs, said it was "not possible to say exactly who" was responsible for the Karbala attack.

One issue the Bush administration faces is that it is seen to be focusing on Iran when Iraq's civil war – and Iraqi sectarian violence – is reaching a new intensity. Even the National Intelligence Estimate released last week minimized the Iranian role in Iraq, saying internal factors are more significant contributors to Iraq's instability.

"The involvement of [Iran and Syria] is not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability because of the self-sustaining character of Iraq's internal sectarian dynamics," the report says.

That conclusion mirrors the view of experts like White, who believe Iran is involved in Iraq, but not in any decisive manner. "Yes, I believe the Iranians are doing this, but at a level that doesn't matter very much. Compared to the magnitude of the Iraqi-on-Iraqi violence, they are really playing a bit part in all of this," says White, now an adjunct scholar at the Middle East Institute in Washington.

Focusing on Iran now would risk suggesting the administration was trying to put up a smoke screen, some observers say. It would also not appear to be the right time to amplify accusations that Shiite Iran is providing material and personnel to target Sunni neighborhoods, given that the horrendous bombings of the last week have all hit Shiite neighborhoods.

As to why the Bush administration is choosing to verbally confront Iran now, White sees three reasons beyond a desire to stop suspected arms supplies. "I suspect they want to push Iran back a little to give the troop surge a slightly better chance of success," he says. "But I also think they are setting up a target to blame for if and when the surge fails. And then it is part of a steady vilifying of Iran, so that if they do go after them over their nuclear program, the US public is that much more prepared for it."

Iranian Diplomat Kidnapped In Baghdad By Iraqis With Official ID (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

BAGHDAD, Tuesday, Feb. 6 — An Iranian diplomat was abducted Sunday evening when his convoy was stopped by men with official Defense Ministry identification in the Karrada neighborhood here, senior Iraqi and American officials said Monday.

Iraqi security forces captured several suspects after pursuing their vehicles through the streets of Baghdad, two of the Iraqi officials said.

The vehicle with the diplomat was not caught, though.

Bombings killed at least 29 people and wounded 90 more in Baghdad as preparations for the latest attempt to secure the city were under way. Those preparations are part of the American-led troop buildup that some American and Iraqi officials view as a last-ditch effort to keep violence in the capital from degenerating into an all-out sectarian war between Shiite and Sunni Arabs.

The abduction of the Iranian took place in a largely Shiite section of the city not far from where a truck bomb killed at least 135 people on Saturday and where residents have complained that the slow pace of the increase in American troops has left them open to attacks.

The men captured in the chase by Iraqi forces on Sunday were Iraqis with Defense Ministry identification, Iraqi and American officials said, raising serious questions about whether government forces themselves were involved in the abduction.

A senior Iraqi official said that the credentials initially appeared to be genuine but that investigators later received conflicting information about whether the men had been dismissed from the ministry but somehow kept their identification.

When asked about indications that an Iranian diplomat had been abducted in Baghdad, Mohammad alHosseini, an Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman in Tehran, said: “We need to investigate, because we have been receiving a lot of news like that these days. I cannot confirm it yet.”

If the kidnappers’ credentials turn out to be genuine, there will be enormous pressure on the Iraqi government to recover the diplomat and capture all of those involved. The Iraqi government has been critical of recent raids by American forces in which Iranians working with diplomatic offices in Iraq have been detained.

The Americans have accused some of those Iranians of supporting illicit armed groups in Iraq, but the raids have been embarrassing to the Iraqi government, which has been encouraging foreign diplomatic missions — in particular Iran's — to increase their presence here. Iraqi officials have distanced themselves from the American raids, while Iran has simply termed those operations kidnappings.

In fact, the American position on those raids was weakened after American forces in Baghdad first announced that they would formally present evidence on illicit Iranian activity in Iraq, then pulled back amid indications that officials in Washington were not persuaded that the case was strong enough.

Tensions between the United States and Iran have recently soared over the issues of Iran's nuclear program and statements by its ambassador to Iraq that his country planned to increase its economic and military ties with Iraq substantially.

The Iranian Embassy has not publicly acknowledged the kidnapping. But in an indication of how high tensions between Iran and the United States have risen over the American raids, the embassy privately voiced suspicions that the kidnapping of its diplomat might have been done at the behest of American forces in Baghdad, an Iraqi official said.

American Embassy and military spokesmen did not immediately respond to requests for comment that were made after midnight on Monday in Baghdad.

Beyond the unsubstantiated suspicions about the involvement of the United States in the kidnapping, there were no clear indications of whether the Iranian diplomat might have been taken by insurgents seeking to cast doubt on the stability of Iraq's government, or simply for ransom.

But in videos, Sunni insurgents claimed responsibility for a series of attacks on Arab embassies in Baghdad in 2005, when the top diplomats from Egypt and Algeria were kidnapped and killed.

Also on Monday, the United States military reported that two American soldiers had been killed the day before.

One soldier from Task Force Lightning was shot by insurgents during combat in Diyala Province. Another soldier, assigned to the 13th Sustainment Command (Expeditionary), was killed by a roadside bomb during a patrol north of Baghdad.

A British soldier was killed Monday by a roadside bomb in Basra, the 100th British military combat death in Iraq, according to British news reports.

Another 31 members of the British military have died in Iraq from accidents or other causes.

U.S. May Seek Sanctions Against Iran (AP)

AP, February 6, 2007

The United States will push for more U.N. Security Council sanctions against Iran if Tehran continues to ignore council demands for suspension of the country's uranium enrichment program, the State Department said Monday.

Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Iran appears to be continuing "down the path of isolation" by its recent announcement of stepped up installation of centrifuges that process uranium gas into fuel that can be used for weapons or generating energy.

McCormack said the U.S. would seek "incremental" sanctions at the U.N. should the standoff continue, though he did not specify what they might be or the exact timing of any action.

The U.N. Security Council approved economic sanctions on Iran on Dec. 23 due to its refusal to halt uranium enrichment. If Tehran fails to comply by the end of a 60-day deadline that the U.N. imposed, the Security Council will consider new measures.

Tehran already has cascades of 164 centrifuges installed above ground at Natanz, and has announced plans to operate 3,000 centrifuges below ground there, enabling it to speed up production of nuclear fuel.

Defying U.N., Iran Installs Centrifuges (WP/AP)

VIENNA, Feb. 5 -- Shrugging off the threat of tougher U.N. sanctions, Iran has set up more than 300 centrifuges in two uranium enrichment units at its underground Natanz complex, diplomats and officials said Monday.

The move potentially opens the way for larger-scale enrichment that could be used to build nuclear warheads. Iranian leaders have repeatedly said the Natanz facility would house 3,000 centrifuges at first and, ultimately, 54,000 of the machines.

It also poses a direct challenge to the U.N. Security Council, which late last month imposed limited sanctions targeting programs and individuals linked to Tehran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs.

The uranium enrichment process can be used to fuel nuclear power plants. But at higher levels of enrichment, uranium can be used for the core of nuclear warheads.

Time To Act On Iran Is Now (USAT)

By Dr. Richard Saccone

USA Today, February 6, 2007

An objective look at the ominous threat from Iran provides a clear solution to the policy the United States must pursue. Iran is easily the most significant source of terror worldwide, providing financing, training, advice, support and supplies to its proxy Hezbollah as well as other groups as far away as Asia. That makes it a major opponent in the war on terror.

In addition, Iran has increased efforts to undermine the U.S. mission in Iraq through operations in the south as well as in Baghdad. It has dared to confront the United States, stirring Shiite sectarian violence and providing Shiite militias with advanced weapons and knowledge of constructing sophisticated explosive devices for use against U.S forces. Iran has consistently followed its goal of becoming a regional power while secretly hoping to gain control of combined oil reserves (in Iran and southern Iraq) that reportedly would stand second only to Saudi Arabia's.

Iranian officials have showed almost no inclination of pausing in their efforts to acquire nuclear weapons, even openly cooperating with the North Koreans to expedite the process. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad routinely threatens to wipe out our closest ally in the region, Israel, and drive the United States from the Middle East.

And what have our multilateral efforts of diplomacy accomplished so far? Almost nothing. Iran has defied United Nations deadlines, played Europe and China against U.S. interests and deceived U.N. inspection teams with false reports on storage, processing and importing of nuclear materials.

Even more troubling, we are dealing with a president who firmly believes in an apocalyptic vision that the 12th Imam will return to Earth to establish a worldwide Islamic caliphate. Ahmadinejad told a cleric that he felt the "hand of God" mesmerizing world leaders as he spoke at the U.N. General Assembly in September.

The stakes are far too high to allow Iran to buy any more time through feigned receptivity to diplomacy. Iran must be confronted quickly and persistently, and the growing dissent within the country fanned so that it challenges the current regime. The clock is on the side of Ahmadinejad. Dealing resolutely with Iran is the only option that promises to yield tangible results.

USA Today, February 6, 2007

With each passing week, tensions between Iran and the United States seem to escalate. Iran announces another step toward going nuclear; the United States presses for sanctions. Iraq helps Shiite militias in Iraq; the Bush administration detains Iranian agents and sends ships into the Persian Gulf. Iraq funds Mideast terror groups; the United States struggles to curb their influence.

All the while, Iran's extremist president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, rants in denial of the Holocaust and predicts apocalypse.

By any measure, Iran and the United States are in a long-term contest for power and influence that carries stakes even higher than those in Iraq, and there is little certainty as to how that contest will unfold.

What is certain is that the United States needs a fresh approach. So far, it has inadvertently been the primary enabler of Iran's ambitions to reclaim its historic role as a regional power. America toppled the two players who had kept Iran in check: Saddam Hussein in Iraq and the Taliban in Afghanistan.

How best to keep Iranian ambitions in check without incurring a new conflagration? A historical analogy, inexact but apt, offers important lessons.

In 1947, as Europe lay in ruins from World War II, a similar U.S. struggle for influence was taking shape with the Soviet Union. The novel approach the United States devised, the brainchild of diplomat George Kennan, came to be known as

"containment." It sought to isolate and pressure the Soviets militarily and diplomatically, while relying on the power of the U.S. economy and the appeal of U.S. ideas to win allies. It was a high-stakes chess game and, in the long term, it worked.

An emerging U.S. strategy in the Middle East looks a lot like containment. Rather than direct military confrontation or outright appeasement, the administration has been building up points of leverage to isolate and pressure the Iranian regime.

President Bush has been talking tough. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been lining up Sunni allies — Saudi Arabia and other Gulf Arab states, plus Jordan and Egypt — that are concerned about Shiite Iran's rising power. The United States has sent two aircraft carriers to the Persian Gulf as well as missile defense systems. It has disrupted Iranian international financial dealings.

All are reasonable steps. But a vital part is missing: dialogue. Through the Cold War, there was always a dialogue — sometimes just at embassy levels, sometimes at full-scale summits. Talking to Iran (and Syria) was a core recommendation of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. But the administration insists Iran first suspend uranium enrichment.

Rather than insisting on a precondition, why not try to open regional or bilateral talks focused only on Iraq, where Iran and the United States have more converging interests than is usually recognized? Neither wants war spilling over Iraq's borders. And both want to combat al-Qaeda insurgents.

Perhaps the biggest irony in the current confrontation is that Iran is the Middle East country most ripe for the democracy Bush says he is fighting to bring. The present religious extremism is not the historic norm. Iran has elections. Women vote. Most Iranians are under 30 years old and tend to look westward. Even the tame U.N. sanctions on Iran have created a backlash against Ahmadinejad. He and the ayatollahs who hold real power are the problem, not the entire nation.

Iran, like the former Soviet Union, has caused much mischief and needs to be checked. But confrontation alone risks once again uniting nationalistic Iranians behind Ahmadinejad's extremism. It also risks igniting sectarian conflicts between Shiites and Sunnis across the Middle East.

Containment has more chance of forcing the regime to collapse from within. The wisdom of Kennan's approach is as relevant today as it was 60 years ago.

Syria Urges Talks On Iraq (WT/AP)

By Lee Keath

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

CAIRO -- Syrian President Bashar Assad said cooperation -- and negotiations -- between Syria and the United States could be the "last chance" to avoid full-scale civil war in Iraq.

However, in an interview on ABC's "Good Morning America" aired yesterday, Mr. Assad said he wasn't optimistic that President Bush would seize the opportunity and talk to Damascus.

He said the Bush administration does not have the vision to bring peace in Iraq.

"This administration is not willing to achieve peace; they don't have the will, and they don't have the vision," Mr. Assad said in the interview from Damascus.

In contrast, he praised Mr. Bush's father, who sponsored a 1991 Arab-Israeli peace conference that included Syria. Mr. Assad said the first President Bush had the "will to achieve peace."

The interview was the strongest attempt yet by Mr. Assad to overcome President Bush's rejection of dialogue with Damascus over Iraq. Syria has been trying to break its international isolation and win a resumption of peace talks with Israel, with the ultimate hope of getting back the Golan Heights, seized by Israel in 1967.

Mr. Bush has stepped up criticism of Syria, accusing it of fueling the crises in Iraq and Lebanon. In recent weeks, Iraq's Shi'ite-led government also has increasingly spoken out against Syria, accusing it of harboring fugitives who finance and support the Sunni insurgency.

Mr. Assad said Syria could play an important role in Iraq, contending it has the trust of all sides, including those who "oppose [Iraq's] political process" -- a reference to Sunni insurgents.

DOJ_NMG_0128161

"We're not the only player; we're not the single player. But we are the main player in this issue," he said. "Our role is going to be through supporting the dialogue between the different parties inside Iraq with support from the other parties, like the Americans and any other country in the world. So that's how we can stop the violence."

Mr. Assad said the Syrians were not optimistic that the Bush administration would pursue diplomatic contacts despite pressure from Congress to do so.

"After nearly four years of occupation, [the Americans] haven't learned their lesson; they haven't started the dialogue," he said.

"I think it's too late for them to move toward that. It doesn't mean we can't turn the tide. But [it may be] too late because Iraqis are heading toward civil war. So maybe [this is] the last chance that we have now to start."

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended in December that the Bush administration make diplomatic overtures to Syria and Iran to use their influence with Sunni and Shi'ite extremist groups to curb the violence and prevent the conflict from spilling over into the rest of the Middle East.

But the White House rejected the recommendation, instead deciding to send 21,500 more U.S. troops mostly to Baghdad for a major security crackdown.

Mr. Assad criticized Washington for trying to solve the Iraqi crisis with more troops. "They only talk about troops and power, not about the political process," he said.

Iraqi Shiite Calls For U.S.-Iran Talks (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

TEHRAN, Feb. 5 — A senior Iraqi Shiite leader said Monday that his country had urged Iran to hold talks with the United States and that such talks were important for the security of the region.

“Given the special conditions in the region, talks between the United States and Iran are of the utmost importance,” Abdel Aziz al-Hakim, one of Iraq’s most powerful Shiite leaders, said at a news conference in Tehran after meeting with the chief of the Supreme National Security Council, Ali Larijani according to the ISNA news agency.

“Negotiations between Iran and the United States are useful for the whole region,” added Mr. Hakim, who lived in exile in Iran during Saddam Hussein’s rule in Iraq and who has close ties with Iranian leaders. But Mr. Hakim said he did not have any specific messages on the subject.

Other Iraqi officials have also urged Iran to hold talks with the United States. Iran has said it is open to the idea. The United States has refused to hold direct talks with Iran over Iraq or over Iran’s nuclear program.

Mr. Hakim also held talks on Monday with Iran’s supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

The details of the discussion in Tehran were not disclosed. Mr. Larijani said only that the two sides discussed “security, economic and bilateral ties,” ISNA reported.

However, analysts speculated that they might have discussed the fate of six Iranians who were arrested by American forces in a raid on an Iranian consulate in Erbil last month. Mr. Hakim said the Iraqi government was continuing its efforts for their release.

Numerous diplomats have traveled to Iran in the past month as tension has grown over its nuclear program and its role in Iraq. The visitors have included the foreign ministers of Qatar and Syria, an envoy from Saudi Arabia and Iraq’s security minister, Shirwan al-Waili.

European diplomats said Monday that Iran had set up two cascades of 164 centrifuges each in its underground nuclear plant, laying a basis for full-scale enrichment of uranium and increasing the stakes in its standoff with the West over its plans to enrich uranium, [a news agency] reported.

President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan visited Iran on Monday, meeting with Ayatollah Khamenei and President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. ISNA reported that the two sides discussed a natural gas pipeline between Iran and India, which would cross Pakistan. The United States has been critical of the proposal. ISNA said the men also discussed Iraq and the Israeli-Palestinian situation.

India's foreign minister, Pranab Mukherjee, is expected to be in Tehran on Tuesday to discuss the proposed pipeline.

Iraq Allies Dawdle On Aid For Rebuilding (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

Foreign countries are billions of dollars delinquent on their pledges to help Iraq rebuild, and four years after the war began, the international reconstruction effort is still mostly funded by the United States.

Some of the biggest deadbeats are Iraq's oil-rich neighbors, such as Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, which are both about a half-billion dollars in arrears, and the United Arab Emirates, which has failed to make good on one penny of a $215 million promise, according to Iraqi government statistics.

The poor fundraising is another blow to President Bush, who in June assigned a special team to try to get other nations to meet their pledges -- but eight months later has little to show for it. Of $15 billion in initial pledges at the Madrid donors' conference in 2003 and in follow-up conferences, foreign donors have made good on about $4 billion.

Italy, Canada and the United Kingdom are all more than $100 million delinquent, as is Japan, which has finalized only $1.5 billion of its $5 billion pledge. And momentum has waned -- the international donor committee that oversees Iraqi reconstruction funding hasn't met since 2005 -- even as other demands pile up for international aid, such as the nearly $8 billion countries pledged last month to help Lebanon.

The Iraqi statistics also show that the United States is the most delinquent of any nation in nominal terms, with $6.4 billion still outstanding on the U.S. pledge of $18.4 billion, although the $12 billion the United States has sent is far and away the most of any country.

The Defense Department's Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, Stuart W. Bowen Jr., in a new report last week, said international funding is reaching a turning point where those bilateral foreign donations will become more critical as the existing funds managed by the World Bank and United Nations become exhausted.

"Assistance from other international donors is likely to play an increasing role in financing reconstruction in Iraq," the inspector general said.

Congress is also looking at reconstruction, with House Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry A. Waxman, California Democrat, holding hearings today and tomorrow on the U.S. role in the process and the use of private military contractors.

The issue has been an on-again, off-again priority for Mr. Bush. Back in June, as he prepared to meet European leaders before the U.S.-EU summit, the president demanded other nations come through, noting that just $3.5 billion of the $13 billion in non-U.S. pledges had been paid at the time. He named a team of top officials, including Deputy Treasury Secretary Bob Kimmitt and State Department Counselor Phil Zelikow, to travel the world to secure support.

The White House has been reluctant to name the delinquents, with National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley telling reporters in June he didn't want to "get into specific names." But Iraq has now named them, establishing a Web site to track pledges, contributions and projects at www.mop-iraq.org.

Calls to the Iraqi Embassy in Washington went unanswered, as did an e-mail seeking information.

House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos said nations in the region, particularly Saudi Arabia, have benefited from oil prices but have not stepped up their commitments to help out neighboring Iraq.

"The countries in the region are not indifferent bystanders to the events in Iraq. They must engage, at a minimum, by sharing the financial burden of this enterprise," said Mr. Lantos, California Democrat, calling on Mr. Bush to lean harder on others. "The administration must do a better job at applying effective diplomacy to engage other partners who have a stake in the outcome in Iraq."

At a hearing last month, Mr. Lantos asked Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice why neighbors such as the Saudis have not come through. Miss Rice said they have had to try to convince the Saudis that a failed Iraq would be a problem for them.

"I think they are getting there," she said of the Saudis' thinking.

Earlier reports by the inspector general also said the dangerous security situation in Iraq was making some nations wary of committing funds.

This week the State Department official told The Washington Times there are several avenues countries are working through, including debt forgiveness. The official also said the United Nations is trying to launch a new International Compact with Iraq (ICI) that would bind Iraq to an economic-restructuring program "in return for increased political and financial support from the international community." The compact has been negotiated but not finalized.

The official said some countries and multilateral organizations have fulfilled their pledges: The European Commission met its initial $235 million pledge and provided an additional $269 million by the end of 2006, with more on the way in 2007.

And the official said that Japan, the second-largest pledged nation, is giving much of its money as soft loans that have long-term durations, which take longer to set up. In December, Japan announced two new loans totaling $738 million.

In addition to international funds, the U.S. inspector general identified $50.45 billion the Iraqi government has had from oil sales, frozen or seized funds and new government spending that has gone to its own reconstruction.

US Sets Up Task Force On Iraqi Refugees (AFP)

AFP, February 6, 2007

The United States set up a task force to tackle the mounting Iraq refugee crisis, after Washington came under criticism for not doing enough to help millions of people displaced by the war it unleashed nearly four years ago.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced the creation of the task force, to be headed by Undersecretary of State Paula Dobriansky and including the State Department's top Middle East and Iraq officials.

The team will coordinate US assistance for Iraqi refugees and internally displaced persons and "devise strategies for Iraqis at risk because of their work with the US government," Rice spokesman Sean McCormack said.

According to the United Nations, about two million Iraqis, some eight percent of the pre-war population, have fled the country to escape the war and mounting sectarian violence.

Another 1.7 million have been forced to flee their homes to safer areas inside Iraq, and the number of these "internally displaced persons" is growing by 1,000 every day, the International Organization for Migration reported last week.

The United States has come under growing criticism for taking in fewer than 500 Iraqi refugees since leading the 2003 invasion which toppled the government of Saddam Hussein, and for failing to sufficiently fund UN efforts to help the displaced.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack last week said Washington was prepared to take in "a fairly significant number" of Iraqi refugees, but he declined to provide figures and said the government had to follow UN procedures for determining who is eligible for asylum.

While he said the State Department and military were looking at specific cases of Iraqis who could be in danger for having worked with the United States occupation, McCormack expressed concern that offering asylum could unleash an exodus of trained people needed to help rebuild Iraq.

"Certainly we want to do everything we can to encourage those Iraqis who are going to be critical to help rebuilding their country stay in Iraq and invest in their future," he said.

"At the same time, you also want to honor the service of those individuals who in many cases have risked their lives to help us out."

100th British Soldier Killed In Action In Iraq (AFP)

AFP, February 6, 2007

A British soldier was killed by a roadside bomb in southern Iraq, the 100th to die in military action in the violence-scarred country, the Ministry of Defence said.

The bomb exploded near the US consulate in the main city of Basra, a spokesman said, adding that the soldier was part of a patrol in Warrior armoured vehicles.

"It is with deep regret that the MOD must confirm that the soldier who was killed by a roadside bomb today was a member of 2nd Battalion The Duke of Lancasters Regiment," said an MoD statement.

"The roadside bomb detonated targeting a ... Warrior patrol manoeuvring on routine duties in the Al Ashshar district of Basra city. A number of civilians were also injured," it added.

His death brings to 131 the number of British soldiers who have died in Iraq since the US-led invasion was launched in March 2003 to topple Saddam Hussein, and the 100th death in action or as a result of injuries sustained in action.

The soldier's next of kin were informed, and requested a period of 24 hours before any further details were released, the ministry added.

Some 7,100 British soldiers are currently deployed in Iraq, mainly in and around Basra, although London says it hopes to withdraw "thousands" by the end of this year.

There has been criticism in the past that British troops deployed in both Iraq and Afghanistan have not been sufficiently protected by their existing armoured vehicles.

Britain was the United States' key ally in the controversial 2003 invasion of Iraq, and its main supporter in the multi-national coalition deployed since in the country.

Trial Starts For Officer Who Refused To Go To Iraq (NYT)

By William Yardley

FORT LEWIS, Wash., Feb. 5 — A court-martial started here on Monday against an Army officer who refused to serve in Iraq last summer because, he has said, the war is illegal.

The officer, First Lt. Ehren K. Watada, was charged in July with missing a movement and conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman after he refused to join his unit, the Third Brigade, Second Infantry, when it was deployed. Before and after his unit left, Lieutenant Watada gave interviews and made other public comments denouncing the war.

Lieutenant Watada has said the Bush administration has falsely used the 9/11 attacks to justify the war. He has said that the war has been proved unjust because unconventional weapons have not been found in Iraq and that American soldiers have mistreated the Iraqis.

Many enlisted soldiers have faced discipline for refusing to serve in Iraq. Lieutenant Watada is the first officer to refuse to do so publicly. He could face up to four years in prison and be dishonorably discharged if convicted on all counts.

The case has become a rallying point for antiwar groups, and scores of Lieutenant Watada's supporters waved signs on Monday at a highway overpass outside Fort Lewis.

His prospects appear uncertain. The judge, Lt. Col. John Head, reinforced on Monday an earlier ruling that Lieutenant Watada could not base his defense on his contention that the war is illegal.

Lieutenant Watada has pleaded not guilty but he has not disputed that he missed the deployment or that he commented against the war.

"From what I understand, that under military law those in the military are allowed to refuse — in fact, have the right to refuse unlawful orders — a duty to refuse," Lieutenant Watada said last month at a forum featuring war opponents, according to a transcript distributed on Monday by Zoltan Grossman, a professor at Evergreen State College who helped organize the forum.

In the transcript, Lieutenant Watada said being denied the chance to argue the legality of the war in his court-martial was "a violation of our most sacred premises of due process and, indeed, is un-American."

"We will fight it," he said. "I will always flight. We will try to appeal to the highest court."

Lieutenant Watada, of Honolulu, asked to go to Afghanistan instead of Iraq but he was denied. He also tried to resign but was denied. He has been working in an administrative office here. Experts expect the trial to last much of this week.

On Monday, Army prosecutors and a defense lawyer, Eric Seitz, interviewed potential jurors drawn from a pool of officers on this post. Under questioning, several officers said it was "odd" that Lieutenant Watada refused to go because, as one put it, officers "should support our leadership and our tent command."

Opening arguments could begin on Tuesday.

Outside the base, arguments were well under way. A woman held a sign reading "Lying and Bullying = Conduct Unbecoming a President." A man a few feet away held one that said "Jail Weasel Watada."

Specialist Pleads Guilty to AWOL

FORT BLISS, Tex., Feb. 5 (AP) — A soldier from Minnesota pleaded guilty on Monday to being absent without leave and missing a flight to Kuwait in July.

The soldier, Specialist Melanie McPherson, 28, told a military judge that she had left for Minnesota the day before her Army unit was to leave for Kuwait because she was afraid that she would be sent to Iraq as a truck driver or a military police officer. Specialist McPherson is trained as a photojournalist.

The Taliban In Pakistan (WSJ)

By Said T. Jawad

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

Pakistan's recent proposal to fence and lay landmines along its 1,500-mile Afghanistan border is impractical, ineffective and irrelevant to the problem of terrorism and the Taliban. Terrorism will be contained only if we end the institutional support for extremism and strengthen traditional leadership in our region.

On Jan. 11, National Intelligence Director John Negroponte testified before the Senate Intelligence Committee. He identified Pakistan as "a major source of Islamic extremism" and said that al Qaeda leaders enjoy a "secure hideout" in Pakistan, while rebuilding their terrorist network and pursuing WMD. These statements reflect a growing consensus among political and military leaders. In his recent trip to the region, Secretary of Defense Robert Gates noted a "significant increase in cross-border attacks." Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley has stated that Jalaluddin Haqqani and other Taliban leaders are in Pakistan, and in Congress Rep. Frank Pallone urged President Bush and Condoleezza Rice to "work with President [Pervez] Musharraf to eliminate extremist training camps in western Pakistan." The Taliban are currently training and preparing for a bloody spring operation against Afghan, U.S. and NATO troops. Neither exchanging barbed comments nor concealing and misrepresenting the threat is the solution. Frank discussions and constructive engagements are necessary to contain the impending surge of Taliban violence.

The Afghan government values the high price the people of Pakistan are paying to restrain extremism. We appreciate that President Musharraf, a crucial ally of the U.S. and NATO in the war against terror, has recognized the threat posed by cross-border terrorist excursions into Afghanistan and is intending to do more. However, the border is not where the problem lies. Terrorist sanctuaries in Pakistan are the real threat to regional stability and global security. Such sanctuaries are breeding grounds for extremism and violence.

We share the concern of Canada, European countries, the U.N. and human-rights organizations such as Pakistan's Human Rights Commission that new mines will take the lives of many more innocent civilians in one of the most heavily mined regions in the world. In 2005, 825 new landmine casualties were recorded in Afghanistan. The tribes along the border demand and deserve peace, prosperity and human security. Expanding the benefits of development and trade and providing economic aid for the Federally Administered Tribal Areas and the North-West Frontier Province will be the best means of achieving these goals. Mining the border will neither stop trained terrorists nor deter suicide bombers. Rather, these measures will divide nations, tribes and communities with a shared culture and common heritage.

In the past, Pakistan has rightfully objected to the fencing of the Kashmir border as ineffective. The most secure fence becomes useless if the border guards at the crossing points are corrupt or accomplices to the extremists. Laying mines along some of the most mountainous terrain in the world is not only impractical but also irrelevant. If the sources of terror remain untouched we will continue to face this threat, even if the border were to become impenetrable.

Afghanistan remains the original front of the war on terror and the chief victim of the Taliban's safe havens in Pakistan. The international community must help Pakistan take additional steps to ensure that the terrorist threat posed by these havens is contained or eliminated. A concerted plan to close down sanctuaries for training, command, control, regrouping and supply will eliminate cross-border incursions. Such a plan should be accompanied by a dismantling of the Taliban's organizational structure in Quetta, Balochistan and Miranshah, North Waziristan. Our allies in the war against terror should work with Pakistan to shut down those madrassas that have become factories of hatred, as well as sources of recruitment and financial and logistical support.

Strengthening the traditional leadership in the tribal areas will yield valuable dividends. The majority of Pashtuns in our region are victims of extremism. Talibanization is a threat to their identity and culture; extremist groups must not be allowed to suppress nationalist leaders who seek "enlightened moderation," traditional values and secular rule. Tribal elders and civic institutions should be provided effective resources to strengthen civil society and empower moderate political parties. Lifting the ban on political parties in the tribal areas will help fend off extremism. The proposed Joint Peace Jirgas in Afghanistan and Pakistan by President Hamid Karzai are intended to empower the border region's traditional leadership through an honorable and time-tested mechanism of conflict resolution.

Afghanistan is in favor of friendship with all its neighbors, through trade and commerce and people-to-people contacts. The people of Afghanistan and Pakistan demand constructive engagement, and the sincere cooperation of our governments. Since reconstruction began five years ago, Afghanistan has followed global trends to open borders and break down the boundaries, physical or otherwise, between peoples. If we must lay land mines and build fences to prevent attacks against Afghan and Coalition forces, it should be around the terrorist sanctuaries and training grounds, not along the border. We must isolate terrorists, not divide tribes and communities.

Mr. Jawad is the ambassador of Afghanistan to the United States.

Turnover In US Attorneys 'Disruptive' (FT)

By Brooke Masters

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

The current mid-term turn-over in US attorneys is unprecedented and could seriously disrupt pending investigations, witnesses plan to testify at today's Senate judiciary committee hearing on whether the Bush administration is politicising the appointment process for top prosecutors.

Traditionally, US attorneys are named by the president and confirmed by the Senate, although "interim" appointees could serve for 120 days without confirmation.

Last year a little noticed amendment to the Patriot Act reauthorisation allowed the president to make "interim" appointments that lasted indefinitely.

Since then, 13 of the 93 US attorneys have left and at least seven of them were asked to leave by officials in Washington. The departures include the top lawyers in New Mexico, San Diego, Arkansas, Nevada, Washington state and Arizona, according to senators and Justice Department sources.

Democrats have described most of them as respected prosecutors who enjoyed the esteem of their subordinates and were reportedly asked to leave to make room for politically connected insiders.

Senator Chuck Schumer, the New York Democrat, will chair a hearing this morning on the issue. He said: "The highly unusual recent flurry of firings of many well-respected US attorneys not only raises some flags, but also requires some explanations."

Mark Pryor, Democratic senator from Arkansas, planned to testify about the recent appointment of a protege of Karl Rove as interim US attorney in his state. Several other witnesses gave advance copies of their written testimony to the Financial Times.

"We have never seen the type of turnover now in progress, where the attorney-general, not the president, is asking mid-term that demonstrably capable US attorneys submit their resignations so that Washington insiders may be appointed in their place," Laurie Levenson, a Loyola law professor, planned to say.

Mary Jo White, a former US attorney from New York, wrote that turnover has a price. "Changing a United States attorney invariably causes disruption and loss of traction in cases and investigations," she planned to testify.

Justice Department officials declined to make deputy attorney-general Paul McNulty's testimony available. But they have said the Bush administration is not trying to circumvent the traditional appointment process and will seek Senate confirmation for all replacement US attorneys.

DOJ_NMG_0128167

The Bush administration has nominated five permanent replacements for the 13 departed US attorneys and three have been confirmed by the Senate. Nine of the last 11 interim appointees are career prosecutors, the Justice Department said.

Justice IT Funding Appears Flat (GCN)

By Wilson P. Dizard III, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, February 6, 2007

But State's IT spending could rise amid centralization

Domestic agencies generally fared poorly in the 2008 budget proposal, and law enforcement technology spending appeared to reflect that reality.

But the State Department's technology arm appears to have both gained control over IT money formerly managed by other agency organizations and bumped up some of its systems spending.

The draft Justice Department IT spending plan calls for increases in various FBI and department technology projects seeded throughout the department's overall discretionary funding request of $21.8 billion, according to the department's press release.

Detailed funding proposals point to flat or declining funding levels for several flagship programs, such as the Justice Information Sharing Technology program. That project, which covers IT investments across the department, is set to see its total new budget authority dwindle from $103 million in fiscal 2007 to $101 million next year.

The JIST account covers signature programs like the Joint Automated Booking System, the Justice Consolidated Office Network, the Litigation Case Management System, the Law Enforcement Information Sharing Program and the Unified Financial Management System that help hold the department's largely independent bureaus together.

Justice's CIO, Vance Hitch, controls the JIST account and is in position to use it to harmonize the various bureaus' operations.

But Justice's press release touted a $514 million boost to Interpol's links with state and local agencies. Using different yardsticks for the department's IT spending, Justice claimed that the draft budget, when taken as a whole, included $74.5 million in funds for new IT projects.

Justice claims a total IT program increase figure of $133.2 million for new IT projects including projects affecting several department components. That statement in the department's press materials was not reflected in detailed budget documents.

Federal accounting methods, which include various types of transfers between programs and often redirection of funds among renamed projects, can render the analysis of such claims a matter of debate.

The FBI is slated to receive $7.1 billion in newly obligated funds in fiscal 2008, in contrast to a 2007 figure of $6.4 billion.

The bureau's 2008 IT work will partly fall under a $315 million proposed increase in projects to boost information sharing and communications as well as related systems work, according to budget documents.

One section of Justice's budget publicity materials referred to 2008 funding of "$47.5 million to advance the FBI's data intake, information sharing, and IT project management mechanisms, as well as $11.5 million to improve the organization's data storage and work facilities." That statement could not be immediately correlated with detailed budget accounts.

The State Department is slated to receive $10 billion overall in 2008, according to budget documents. Technology spending will account for about $905 million of that figure, State said.

Budget tables indicate that State's Information Resources Management arm is set to control about $848.2 million of that figure. The IRM organization appears set to gain control over significant IT operations of other parts of the department, officials said.

For example, $509.3 million of IRM's budget kitty will flow from diplomatic and consular program accounts, $70.7 million from the department's Capital Investment Fund and about $270 million from various passport and visa fees.

State's IT Central Fund, another method of slicing the diplomatic technology apple, reflects a planned increase to $313 million in technology spending for more than a dozen projects, up from a comparable 2007 figure of $289 million.

Budget Proposal Includes 2.6 Percent Increase For IT (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, February 6, 2007

The Bush administration's fiscal 2008 budget proposal contains a 2.6 percent increase for information technology, but offers few new governmentwide technology projects.

The budget includes about $65.5 billion for IT, up from the $63.8 billion requested for fiscal 2007. Because Congress has failed to finish up the fiscal 2007 spending bills, a detailed breakdown of the request traditionally available upon the budget's release will wait until the spring. In fiscal 2006, the administration sought $65.2 billion for IT.

Jonathan Breul, a senior fellow at the IBM Center for the Business of Government, said the increase in IT spending is not unexpected, "but there was reason to worry that [IT spending] was not going to increase as much."

"My bet is that a good deal of all that is money that's going to national security and homeland security," Breul said. "In many cases, you can count your program several ways. Budget guidance as I understand it was that the war, defense and homeland were going to get 'all that was needed.' So anyone was going to try to frame their activities that way."

The 2008 budget proposal stated that the percent of "well planned and managed" major IT investments went down 17 percent from fiscal 2007 to fiscal 2008, from 594 to 494. Meanwhile, the number of "not well planned and managed" major IT investments rose 32 percent, from 263 to 346. The overall number of major IT investments declined from 857 to 840.

As previously reported, the budget identified agencies that will provide information security services to others as part of the Office of Management and Budget's "lines of business" effort to consolidate back-end IT systems across government. The Office of Personnel Management, U.S. Agency for International Development and the Defense Department will provide shared service centers for security awareness training, and the Environmental Protection Agency and the Justice Department will offer centers for meeting the reporting requirements in a federal law -- the Federal Information Security Management Act.

OMB did not announce new lines of business consolidation projects, as it has in previous budget proposals.

Ray Bjorklund, senior vice president of McLean, Va., Federal Sources Inc., said the lack of initiatives is likely because OMB is still trying to achieve stability for the existing ones.

The budget proposal's update to the lines of business consolidation initiative lists the adoption of uniform governmentwide best practices under its accomplishments. A section on next steps does not include the creation of more shared service centers.

The budget proposal has a heavy emphasis on information security. The proposal stated that the percentage of certified and accredited IT systems rose from 85 percent in fiscal 2005 to 88 percent in fiscal 2006. But certification and accreditation processes deemed "satisfactory" as determined by agency inspector general offices decreased from 68 percent in fiscal 2005 to 60 percent in fiscal 2006 and the number of agencies that can demonstrate an effective process for correcting security weaknesses fell from 19 to 18.

In addition, the budget release included a document evaluating the effectiveness of agencies' IT management and e-government processes, a list of the number of agency IT investments on OMB's management watch list and updates on the e-government initiatives.

Analysis: Bush's Federal Budget Proposal (FRESBEE)

By Michael Doyle, Bee Washington Bureau

Fresno Bee, February 6, 2007

President Bush on Monday proposed a $2.9 trillion federal budget for Fiscal 2008. The new budget year starts Oct. 1, giving Congress the next eight months to work out the details.

WINNERS:

Yosemite National Park would receive an additional $3,259,000 for operational costs, a 14 percent increase. The money would pay for an additional 28 seasonal rangers to combat marijuana growing.

Sequoia and Kings Canyon national parks would gain an additional $1,410,000 for operations, a 10 percent increase. The money would pay for an additional 13 seasonal rangers.

The administration adds $1 billion to construct fences and other protective measures along the U.S.-Mexico border, and provides more money to hire an additional 3,000 Border Patrol agents.

Some of the roughly 2 million Californians now receiving Food Stamps could benefit, under an administration proposal to exclude retirement savings when calculating eligibility.

The Army Corps of Engineers would spend an additional $42 million on Oakland Harbor to improve commercial navigation.

The Corps of Engineers would spend an additional $18 million on safety improvements for the Success Dam on the Tule River.

The Agriculture Department would spend $200 million on the Market Access Program, the maximum allowed for the grant program that California farm groups use to assist with overseas ads and promotions.

LOSERS:

Cal-Fed, the joint state and federal plan to restore and protect the Sacramento-San Joaquin Delta and other state waterways, would receive a total of $155.6 million. This represents a 44 percent decrease from the Fiscal 2007 total of $199 million.

The State Criminal Alien Assistance Program would be eliminated. Currently, the program receives about $660 million, with the funds provided to states like California that incarcerate large numbers of illegal immigrants.

The Community Oriented Policing Services grant program would be slashed to $32 million, down from the current level of $500 million.

The Justice Department would eliminate a number of other programs, including ones to assist Southwest border prosecutors, stop prison rape and protect Alzheimer's patients.

A Migrant and Seasonal Farm worker training program would be eliminated. This year, the Labor Department is spending $80 million on the program.

Head Start, which serves about 106,000 California children, would bet cut to $6.79 billion, down from $6.89 billion this year.

Attorney General Speaks To Law Students (SMUDC)

By Kelsey Jukam, News Editor

SMU Daily Campus, February 6, 2007

Law students flocked to the Underwood Law Library Friday at noon, and not just for the free lunch. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who was in town this weekend to receive a distinguished alumni award, spoke to a lecture hall filled with students to discuss the responsibilities of the judicial branch and other topics related to law.

Although Gonzales initially emphasized that each of the three branches of government would affect law students' lives, his speech focused primarily on the role of the judicial branch and the characteristics of good judges. According to Gonzales, judges need to understand their role in the government.

"I am concerned that some judges have lost sight of the goal of the judicial branch," Gonzales said. "It is not the role of judicial branch to make policy."

Gonzales said that judges could maintain the judiciary's independence by making decisions based on neutral policies and respecting precedent. He also believes that the Constitution wasn't intended to address every legal and policy issue, and that by making certain issues constitutional, decisions are then taken out of the hands of the people.

"I'm concerned about judges who think they see a constitutional solution to every societal ill," Gonzales said.

During a question-and-answer session, Gonzales spoke extensively about the USA Patriot Act. The Patriot Act, passed after the attacks of Sept. 11, gave law enforcement more authority to fight terrorism.

"Shortly after the attacks of 9/11, we were looking for additional tools to protect the country," Gonzales said. "The Patriot Act has been extremely helpful in allowing the U.S. government [to] collect information about threats to the government."

Although the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (FISA) prescribes the procedures for requesting judicial authorization for electronic surveillance and physical searches of those who are engaged in espionage, the Bush administration decided that FISA wasn't enough.

DOJ_NMG_0128170

"I will say that we really believe FISA was not sufficient to get what we needed," Gonzales said. "So we said let's be creative, let's make this happen."

Gonzales also discussed how the Bush administration selects judges.

"The President and I think it's so important to select judges based on their philosophy of the judiciary's role," Gonzales said. "We do not ask about political views, as they're irrelevant."

Gonzales said that he looks for judges with a general philosophy of restraint, "judges who respect the rule of law, respect the right of the legislature to frame the law," he said.

According to Gonzales, the decision to put certain judges on the bench is the most important of the administration's decisions.

"It's the president's most lasting legacy," Gonzales said.

"The decisions the president makes today impact people around the country for years to come," he added.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Proposed SEC Budget Edges Up (AP)

AP, February 6, 2007

SEC Budget Would Rise 3.2 Percent Under Bush Proposal

--The SEC's budget, after nearly doubling in 2003 under anti-fraud legislation enacted amid the wave of corporate scandals early in the decade, is roughly flat for the third straight year under President Bush's 2007 proposal.

In fact, the administration asked for nearly the same amount last year, $904.8 million. But the agency has been operating at an estimated level of $877.1 million for the budget year ending Oct. 1 because, as is the case for most federal agencies, Congress hasn't yet approved 2007 spending levels.

The budget proposal doesn't call for any new programs at the market watchdog agency. But it is "sufficient for the (SEC) to do its job and do it well," agency Executive Director Diego Ruiz told reporters in a conference call Monday.

It is the second budget under Chairman Christopher Cox, who became head of the agency in August 2005 after 16 years in the House as a Republican from California. Reflecting Cox's interest in technology, the spending plan provides $130 million for information technology, up from $118 million, including improvements in the SEC's online corporate disclosure system.

"American taxpayers can be confident that they will receive an excellent return this year on their investment in the agency as we pursue vast improvements to corporate disclosure and vigorous enforcement of our securities laws," Cox said in a statement.

--The budget also includes $321.2 million for investigations and enforcement actions, higher than estimated 2007 spending of $310.1 million but slightly below last year's original request of $328.1 million. The SEC plans to open 925 new investigations, compared with 960 the previous year.

The SEC and the Justice Department are investigating suspicious timing of stock options grants at more than 100 public companies -- with backdating of options awarded to executives having become corporate America's biggest scandal last year. SEC officials say the agency is focusing on cases of serious fraud -- with elements such as deliberately lying, forging documents or deceiving directors or investors.

In backdating, stock options are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price, fattening profits for options recipients when they sell their shares at higher market prices. Backdating options can be legal as long as the practice is disclosed properly to investors and approved by the company's board. In some cases, however, the practice can violate federal accounting and tax laws.

The SEC also plans to continue enforcement efforts against serious accounting fraud, investment scams preying on seniors, market manipulation and insider trading.

--Also included is $45.1 million for mutual fund and hedge fund oversight, up from $43.6 million in estimated spending for 2007 but below last year's original request of $53.5 million. A program to make mutual funds' disclosures more useful to investors is among the priorities.

--The SEC is funded from fees it charges companies to register and issue securities and for stock trading, though its budget still is subject to congressional approval.

In line with a 2002 federal law, the fees are being reduced by $1 billion starting in the 2007 fiscal year that began last Oct. 1. The reductions will not affect the amount of money available to fund the agency, the government says.

Banks Appeal Ruling Allowing Enron Investors To Sue As Class (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Feb. 5 (Bloomberg News) — Two investment banks, Merrill Lynch and Credit Suisse, asked a federal appeals court yesterday to end a class-action lawsuit by Enron investors seeking $40 billion that they lost when the energy trader collapsed in 2001.

The banks argued that a Houston judge was wrong to allow Enron investors to sue as a group and contended that they could not be sued because they did not participate directly in the accounting fraud that led to Enron's bankruptcy.

The investors argued the court could address only whether the plaintiffs could sue as a group. Trial is set for April in Houston.

"This class certification is putting enormous coercive impact on my client, facing a possible $40 billion exposure," a lawyer for Merrill, Stuart Baskin, argued yesterday before the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans.

A ruling that invalidates class status may reduce any liability the banks might face for Enron losses. In June, Judge Melinda Harmon of Federal District in Houston said investors who bought Enron securities could combine their claims. The decision gave investors, who would otherwise be forced to sue individually, the possibility of a much higher recovery and more leverage in negotiating any settlement.

Other former Enron lenders, like Citigroup, JPMorgan Chase and Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, have settled with investors for more than $7 billion.

Merrill and Credit Suisse argued that Judge Harmon's ruling was based on the mistaken theory that the banks were individually responsible for investor losses because they took part in a scheme run by Enron.

That theory, the banks argued, unfairly allows shareholders to hold individual banks liable for the entire fraud, regardless of whether they knew or participated in the entire scheme.

Enron investors said the appeals court was limited to determining whether Judge Harmon properly combined their claims, not whether the claims had merit. They argued that Merrill and Credit Suisse could be sued under federal securities laws because they both knowingly engaged in the scheme.

"The conduct was directed at the Enron shareholders," Patrick Coughlin, a lawyer for the investors, argued. "That's when I say you've stepped over the line. That goes beyond aiding and abetting."

S.E.C. Is Looking At Stock Trading (NYT)

By Jenny Anderson

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

The Securities and Exchange Commission has begun a broad examination into whether Wall Street bank employees are leaking information about big trades to favored clients, like hedge funds, in an effort to curry favor with those clients, executives at Wall Street banks said.

The inquiry, these people said, seems aimed at determining how pervasive insider trading, or the illegal use of market-moving nonpublic information, may be on Wall Street. Knowledge about a large trade, like the sale of a big block of stock by the mutual fund giant Fidelity, would tell a trader which way the stock would move.

Trading ahead of client orders, or front-running, has long been an issue on Wall Street. Large mutual fund companies have often complained in the past that Wall Street brokerage firms were front-running their trades, using information about the funds' plans to buy or sell to make a risk-free bet on a stock's direction.

But the latest S.E.C. investigation appears to have a new twist: Rather than examine whether a bank is trading ahead of its own client by using knowledge of the customer's trade, the scope of the investigation will allow regulators to see if banks tip their valued customers who then go trade at another bank, making the paper trail harder to detect.

The commission sent out letters in mid-January to the major Wall Street banks, including Merrill Lynch, Morgan Stanley, UBS and Deutsche Bank. The commission, according to one Wall Street employee, is requesting a wide swath of information: all stock and option trading data, for themselves and their customers, for the last two weeks of September. Those weeks are the close of the third quarter and investigators may be looking to see any pickup in trading activity as money mangers sought to dress up their returns.

Representatives for the Wall Street banks declined to comment on the investigation.

"Mutual fund traders have long complained that their big trades may be being front-run by market participants with inside information about their trades, and they believe the price on those trades suffers as a result," said Lori Richards, the director of the Office of Compliance Inspections and Examinations at the S.E.C. "We are looking into these allegations in a systemic way. It is fact-finding and too early for any conclusions."

The S.E.C. confirmed the existence of the investigation but declined to comment further.

Concerns about insider trading have escalated as mergers and buyouts have boomed and the use of complex derivatives has soared. Studies of various markets — including those for stocks and credit default swaps — have pointed to an unusual amount of trading ahead of announcements for deals.

The growing power of hedge funds — and their opaqueness and the wide range of trading strategies they employ — is feeding those concerns. Hedge funds control an estimated 30 percent to 50 percent of trading on most major markets. They are also Wall Street's best customers. Hedge funds trade, borrow and finance more, on average, than other clients And as more hedge funds enter a crowded field, the premium on information has never been higher.

With data on millions of trades from most major Wall Street banks, the S.E.C. will try to examine whether outside traders like hedge funds or internal traders like those inside the firm who are trading with the bank's money may be getting tips from the bank handling the mutual fund's trade and using the information to place a trade elsewhere.

"If an investment bank is tipping a hedge fund on a trade we are doing on Dell, those people all need to go to jail," said Andrew M. Brooks, vice president and head of equity trading at T. Rowe Price, the mutual fund company. "We are absolutely concerned and worried and paranoid about information leakage, information that would allow someone to know about our trades and run ahead."

If the commission finds any evidence of possible insider trading, it would then commence a formal investigation. The S.E.C. could ultimately bring civil charges against individuals or firms.

Regulators and law enforcement officials have pursued other cases related to the sharing of information about trades. In what became known as the squawk box case, brokers from institutions, including Merrill Lynch, Citigroup and Lehman Brothers, were accused of allowing traders to listen in on the public outcry system — the squawk box on the trading floors — to glean tips about customer orders coming in.

The S.E.C. sued the A. B. Watley Group and 16 people in the case. Next month, the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn will bring to trial a case against seven people. Two have pleaded guilty to insider trading. While the accusations in the squawk box case involve an obvious dissemination of insider information, detecting whether traders were illegally tipped in huge, fast-moving markets is much harder.

When Linda Chatman Thomsen, head of enforcement at the S.E.C., testified before Congress in September about insider trading, she outlined some of the problems inherent in such cases.

"Piecing together an insider trading case can be a complex and painstaking process," she said. "It is rare to find a 'smoking gun'; virtually all insider trading cases hinge on circumstantial evidence. It is quite common for insider traders to come up with alternative rationales for their trading — rationales that the staff must refute with inferences drawn from the timing of the trades, the movement of the funds and other facts and circumstances."

There are many gray areas. If Mr. Brooks of T. Rowe Price wants to sell stock in the XYZ Company and he hires a bank to do that, the bank has to call clients to gauge interest in the stock. That is not tipping, but legitimate work for the bank to do.

And detecting any trades will be difficult. If a trader received a tip about a stock whose price was set to rise, that trader could enter into trades that are harder for regulators to detect — like derivatives transactions that are not traded on any exchange and whose value may be linked to a change in a stock price rather than the stock itself or an option on the stock.

Here's how a questionable trade might take place: If Fidelity asked brokerage firm X to sell a large part of its stake in I.B.M., and traders at that brokerage firm told its favorite clients to expect a drop in I.B.M.'s price as a result, that favorite client could go to another brokerage firm — or group of banks or trading venues — and sell I.B.M. shares short, betting on a decline and making money when Fidelity's order went through. The trader could pay back the source of the tip by directing more business to his bank.

"The information is going to the bank as an agent, and the bank is only supposed to use the information for the mutual fund's benefit," said Larry E. Ribstein, a professor of law at the University of Illinois. "If it uses it for someone else's benefit, you might have a concern."

The hedge fund business has long argued that it is unfairly tarnished with suggestions of insider trading. Amid increased scrutiny by regulators into hedge funds' use of information in the loan market, the Managed Funds Association said in a statement last year, "We reaffirm our collective commitment to promote fair and competitive markets in which inappropriate use of material nonpublic information is not tolerated."

Some money managers disagree.

"Hedge funds pay a lot in commissions," said Mr. Brooks of T. Rowe Price. "They are smart and work hard, but they can't be that smart and work that hard to get some of the advantages they have gotten."

"There are too many conflicts of interest between those who serve hedge funds and hedge funds themselves."

Hyundai Motor Chief Gets Three Year Jail Term (FT)

By Song Jung-a In Seoul

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

Hyundai Motor was thrown into disarray on Monday when Chung Mong-koo, its chairman, was sentenced to three years in prison for embezzlement and breach of trust, raising the possibility of a management vacuum at South Korea's largest carmaker.

The punishment was harsher than expected and compounded the woes at Hyundai, which was already grappling with the strong local currency, flagging profits and a disruptive labour union.

But the sentence was welcomed by corporate governance campaigners, who said it showed Korea would no longer tolerate chaebol owners using their companies to pursue their personal interest.

The court found Mr Chung guilty of embezzling about $100m of company funds and inflicting about $224m of damage on group affiliates during rights issues.

He was also convicted of using deals to boost his financial gains and those of his son, Eui-sun, who runs affiliate Kia Motors.

"The defendant's act of secretively setting up massive slush funds and using them wilfully, using his status as the Hyundai Motor group's chairman, undermines the soundness and the autonomy of corporate management," said Kim Dong-oh, the Seoul central district court judge.

"The court decided a strict execution of law was necessary to eradicate illegal and anti-market practices in the past and help South Korea build a more advanced economy," he said.

The 68-year-old hairman was freed on bail to "guarantee his defending rights and to minimise its impact on the economy" while he appeals the conviction, the court said.

Hyundai and Kia together make up more than 70 per cent of South Korea's auto exports – and about 7 per cent of the country's total exports – but has been buffeted by the strong Korean won and a series of strikes. It reported a 34 per cent slump in last year's profit.

The court also handed a two-and-half-year jail term to Kim Dong-jin, Hyundai's vice-chairman. Two other Hyundai executives were also given jail terms. The sentences were suspended.

Hyundai Motor shares fell more than 3 per cent after the verdict but ended the day flat at Won69,800.

The company said it was “greatly disappointed” by the ruling but added it would not affect the group’s operations.

“Chairman Chung retains full operational control and decision-making authority for long-term strategic issues affecting Hyundai Motor and its affiliates,” Hyundai said, adding that Hyundai and Kia operations would continue to function as normal.

But the ruling cast a cloud over the company, analysts said, although they said it was unlikely Mr Chung would spend any time in a prison cell. The appellate court was likely to suspend his sentence, they added. The appeal could take up to a year.

Fannie Mae's Former Chief Wants Earlier Hearing Date (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

Former Fannie Mae chairman and chief executive Franklin D. Raines, accused of manipulating the housing finance company's earnings, is challenging regulators to make their case against him beginning Feb. 16 instead of waiting until the end of the year.

Attorneys for Raines have argued that the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which issued administrative charges in December, is required by law to begin a hearing on the evidence within 60 days of that event.

The agency, however, has proposed a schedule that would have the two sides file pretrial statements in December. The agency's proposal did not say when the hearing should begin.

"It's a fundamental issue of fairness," said Mark Fabiani, a spokesman for Raines. "Frank Raines is ready to disprove OFHEO's allegations starting this month, and OFHEO is seeking to delay the proceedings until 2008."

A spokeswoman for OFHEO declined to explain the agency's reasons.

"We will respond in an appropriate filing as part of our routine communications in the administrative proceeding," spokeswoman Corinne Russell said.

The agency previously expressed concern about being overwhelmed by litigation related to Raines and the accounting scandal. In a lawsuit shareholders brought over Fannie Mae's accounting, the agency stated that complying with Raines's document requests could pose such a burden that it could divert regulators from their mission.

Raines's trial before an administrative law judge would be the culmination of a process regulators set in motion more than two years ago. In fall 2004, after an extended probe, OFHEO issued a report alleging that Fannie Mae used improper accounting. The Securities and Exchange Commission later agreed.

The ensuing storm drove Raines, a former federal budget director, into premature retirement.

District-based Fannie Mae, chartered by the federal government to promote affordable housing, ultimately determined that it overstated past profits by $6.3 billion.

In December, OFHEO issued administrative charges against Raines and two other former executives seeking to recoup more than $115 million of compensation they allegedly received while the earnings were misstated. The agency also is seeking penalties that could exceed $100 million.

All three former executives have denied the charges. The other executives, former chief financial officer J. Timothy Howard and former controller Leanne G. Spencer, back Raines's effort to force an administrative trial this month, their lawyers said.

At the trial's conclusion, an administrative law judge is to make a recommendation to the OFHEO director.

The three former executives say that the OFHEO director has prejudged the matter. An attorney for Raines has argued that the director, James B. Lockhart III, is using Raines as a prop in a campaign to persuade Congress to expand the powers of Fannie Mae's regulators.

As Raines seeks to begin the administrative trial sooner rather than later, he and the other former executives are seeking to move the case to federal court.

Probe Amplifies Conflict-of-Interest Questions For Chamber Of Commerce Chief (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

As president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Thomas J. Donohue has long been obliged to talk tough against federal regulation, especially by the Securities and Exchange Commission. But now, it's personal.

For 12 years, Donohue has been a board member (including serving on the audit committee) of Sunrise Senior Living, a publicly traded company being probed by the SEC.

Sunrise co-founder Paul Klaassen started as Donohue's driver while still in college and later was a Chamber speechwriter. Donohue, 68, believed in Klaassen so strongly that he allowed Klaassen and his wife to live in his house while they started Sunrise more than two decades ago. He then helped finance the firm's prototype facility by taking out a second mortgage and becoming one of the company's first big investors.

Recently, the SEC opened an inquiry into allegations that the Klaassens and other insiders, including Donohue, may have improperly cashed $32 million in stock options before Sunrise in May announced an accounting problem that caused its stock to drop. Donohue calls the allegations meritless and says they were drummed up by labor unions that want to organize the company. He said that he has not been contacted by the SEC and that its inquiry will amount to nothing.

Nonetheless, the controversy adds fuel to complaints that investor activists have leveled at Donohue ever since he took over and revived the Chamber, the nation's largest business lobby, in 1997.

They have questioned how Donohue could serve on boards at all. After all, they point out, an independent director is supposed to represent stockholders, not management, which is Donohue's constituency. They have also worried that Donohue might tilt the Chamber's potent lobbying to favor the companies he serves. Donohue is a director of Union Pacific, the country's biggest railroad, and XM Satellite Radio as well as Sunrise.

And now that Sunrise is being scrutinized by the SEC, critics are adding a new complaint. They say Donohue has diminished the value of his own arguments against certain regulations because he has a personal stake in curtailing them.

"It undercuts his credibility as a critic of SEC enforcement and regulation," said Barbara Roper, director of investor protection for the Consumer Federation of America. "He undermines any claim he might have to objectivity."

Donohue disagrees. He said the Chamber's board encourages him to serve as a director because it allows him to see firsthand the harm that overregulation causes.

"That I serve on corporate boards gives me a better understanding of what goes on in a boardroom," he said. "The better you understand something, the better you can figure out how to deal with it."The Chamber Fights Back

The Chamber faces a far more hostile Congress with Democrats in charge. But it is not retreating.

"We refuse to wring our hands and say, 'Oh, we have new chairmen, we have a president who's not as strong as we'd like. Oh, woe is me, what are we going to do?' " Donohue said. "We're going to saddle up the horse and get going."

The Chamber will soon launch its third anti-trial-lawyer newspaper. It already owns two legal periodicals, the Madison County Record in Illinois and the West Virginia Record in Charleston, which publish stories that highlight what it considers trial lawyers' abuse of lawsuits against businesses. It will shortly open a yet-unnamed newspaper in southeastern Texas, which it calls a hotbed of anti-business legal actions.

In addition, the Chamber plans a huge new effort to "manage" government's reaction to global warming. The tentatively named Institute for Energy Security, Competitiveness and American Jobs will raise about $20 million from oil companies, electric utilities and automakers to try to temper Washington's regulation of greenhouse gas emissions.Donohue vs. Airlines

A travel industry coalition called the Discover America Partnership unveiled a proposal last week to ease the entry of foreign visitors into this country and to promote tourism in the United States abroad. To pay the plan's $300 million tab, the group suggested that a modest fee could be imposed on airplane travelers leaving this country -- an option that the Air Transport Association opposed.

Donohue ridiculed the airlines' position. Nobody cares "about a $2 fee on the ticket or something, they just don't want to get in another line to pay it," he said. "Would your El Salvadoran maid, legitimately in the United States, who is going home to see her family, care about a $2 fee? If she does, she shouldn't go."

People will be miffed at that statement, he added, "but I don't care."Winners and Losers

Low-income people and small-business owners were the big winners in legislation the Senate passed last week that would boost the minimum wage and expand tax breaks for small businesses that would be hurt most by the change.

Yet buried in the bill were write-offs not just for small firms but also for restaurants and retailers of any size. Score victories for the National Restaurant Association and the National Retail Federation, which lobbied hard for the measure.

The legislation's losers include the Chamber and the National Association of Manufacturers, which tried and failed to block the bill's elimination of tax-free deferred compensation for highly paid executives.

A major thumbs down also goes to the AFL-CIO, which called the Senate's action "disgraceful" because of the business benefits, even though it has fought for a minimum-wage increase for years.Hires of the Week

African Americans are vastly underrepresented among lobbyists. The Washington Government Relations Group, a trade association of black lobbyists, has about 100 members and a database of black federal lobbyists that tops 200 names. That compares with 31,000 registered lobbyists overall.

But the Democratic takeover on Capitol Hill has thickened the ranks of black lobbyists quickly, thanks in part to the new prominence of the Congressional Black Caucus. African American staffers who have recently joined the lobbying ranks include: Paul Brathwaite, former executive director of the caucus, now with Podesta Group; Joyce Brayboy, former chief of staff to Rep. Melvin Watt (D-N.C.), now with Glover Park Group; Richard R. Boykin, former chief of staff to Rep. Danny K. Davis (D-Ill.), now with Barnes & Thornburg; Jennifer Fisher, ex-aide to Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.), now at the American Dental Association; and ex-caucus aide Myra Dandridge, now at the National Association of Broadcasters.

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Acknowledges Gaps In Notes On Libby (USAT)

By Richard Willing

WASHINGTON — An FBI agent acknowledged today that investigators' notes from an October 2003 interview with Lewis "Scooter" Libby differed from the agent's testimony last week.

FBI agent Deborah Bond testified on Friday that Libby "adamantly denied" that he discussed the identity of a covert CIA officer with other administration officials before July 10 or July 11, 2003. That's when Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, said he learned the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame from NBC reporter Tim Russert.

Plame is the wife of former State Department official Joseph Wilson. Wilson accused Cheney and the White House of exaggerating claims that Iraq was trying to buy uranium from the African nation of Niger.

Libby made the denial during an October 2003 interview with Bond and other agents, she said. The agents were investigating whether administration officials had violated the law prohibiting the disclosure of a covert officer's identity.

This morning, however, defense lawyer Theodore Wells pointed out that the FBI agents' notes of their interview with Libby don't use the words "adamant" or "denial."

Wells read from agents' notes that "Libby probably talked about the Wilson matter but does not recall talking about Wilson's wife" during a July 7, 2003, lunch with then-White House press secretary Ari Fleischer.

"He says he does not recall having discussions; he does not deny them, correct?" Wells asked.

"That's true," Bond replied. But she qualified her answer by saying that in other answers during the interview, Libby had effectively "denied" the allegation, even if he never used the precise word.

Wells was attempting to buttress the defense's argument that Libby never deliberately misled investigators or grand jurors about how and when he learned the CIA employee's identity. At worst, Wells has argued, Libby was a victim of poor memory.

Libby faces federal charges of perjury, obstruction of justice and lying to investigators about when he learned Plame's identity and with whom he discussed her. Since testimony in the trial began last month, eight government witnesses, including two reporters, have contradicted Libby's account of learning Plame's identity from Russert.

The government contends that Plame's identity was leaked as part of a plan by Cheney's office to undermine Wilson. On July 6, 2003, in two newspaper stories and on Meet the Press, Wilson had accused Cheney's office of ignoring Wilson's report that Iraq was not seeking uranium in Niger.

Before Bond's testimony, U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton ruled that audiotapes of Libby's grand jury appearances in 2004 will be made public after the tapes have been played in court.

Another Libby lawyer, William Jeffress, had opposed releasing the tapes, arguing that the airplay and commentary that "sound bites" are likely to produce could prejudice jurors against his client.

"This is great stuff" from the media's standpoint, Jeffress argued.

Nathan Siegel, representing several media organizations including USA TODAY, argued for making the tapes public. He said that because jurors already will have heard the tapes in court, they are unlikely to be tainted by any sound bites or commentary they accidentally hear.

Walton, who instructs jurors every day to avoid coverage of the case, reluctantly agreed. He said case law in the District of Columbia supports the "right to access" and "gives me no choice."

Walton warned media organizations not to "cause mischief" by quoting segments of Libby's testimony out of context.

Libby's Grand Jury Tapes Are Heard In Court (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5 — Prosecutors in the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. on Monday played audio tapes in which Mr. Libby was heard testifying under oath before a grand jury that he had not discussed the identity of a Central Intelligence Agency operative with fellow administration officials in the summer of 2003.

The sound of Mr. Libby's disembodied voice coursing through the courtroom vividly underlined the contrast between his sworn account and the testimony of the parade of prosecution witnesses presented to the jury in the last two weeks.

Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is charged with lying to that grand jury and to F.B.I. agents who were investigating the leak to reporters of the identity of the C.I.A. officer, Valerie Wilson.

The jury on Monday listened to 90 minutes of Mr. Libby's grand jury testimony from March 5, 2004, in which he was questioned in a straightforward, almost friendly manner by the chief prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald. Mr. Libby was heard responding in earnest tones.

On the tape, Mr. Libby was heard saying repeatedly that he could not recall any conversation he ever had with Marc Grossman, a State Department official, about Ms. Wilson.

Mr. Grossman, who was then the under secretary of state, has already testified about two such conversations. Mr. Grossman told the jury that Mr. Libby anxiously asked him that summer about news that a former ambassador had traveled to Africa to investigate reports that Saddam Hussein was trying to buy uranium there for his nuclear weapons program.

Mr. Grossman recounted his conversations with Mr. Libby, even noting that one occurred just outside the White House situation room after a meeting of senior officials.

Mr. Grossman told the jury that he had reported back to Mr. Libby at their second meeting that the former ambassador was Joseph C. Wilson IV, and that he had been sent to Africa by the C.I.A. He also told Mr. Libby that Mr. Wilson's wife worked at the agency and appeared to have had a major role in choosing him for the assignment.

The audio tapes, which were played with a synchronized running transcript on television screens in the courtroom, seemed to hold the attention of the jurors, who also followed the dialogue printed in loose-leaf binders.

Monday's tapes were only the first part of what is to be a total of eight hours that the jury will hear. Judge Reggie B. Walton warned jurors to ask for a break if their attention was flagging.

As the tapes were played, Mr. Libby sat mostly motionless and expressionless.

Judge Walton denied a defense motion arguing that the tapes should not be given to the news media to play to the public. The entire eight hours will be released after the jury has heard all the tapes.

The remaining grand jury testimony, which will include Mr. Libby's second appearance on March 24, 2004, is certain to include denials from Mr. Libby about conversations with other officials who have already testified that they spoke with him about Ms. Wilson.

Ms. Wilson's name was first disclosed in a July 14, 2003, column by Robert Novak, only days after The New York Times published an Op-Ed article written by Mr. Wilson asserting that the Bush White House had willfully distorted intelligence about Iraq's efforts to obtain uranium in Niger.

To demonstrate that Mr. Libby lied to the F.B.I. as well, which is charged in the indictment, prosecutors put Deborah S. Bond, an agent, on the stand. Ms. Bond, who was present at the two interviews of Mr. Libby in his office in October and November of 2003 completed her testimony on Monday but acknowledged she may have testified incorrectly last Thursday.

Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's chief defense lawyer, was magnanimous with a purpose when he pointed out her error over a conversation between Mr. Libby and Karl Rove, the deputy White House chief of staff.

"I can't believe I said it," Ms. Bond said when shown last week's testimony. Mr. Wells then prodded her to say that she must have answered in good faith but simply forgot, a proposition to which she readily agreed.

It was a reminder to the jury that one of the pillars of Mr. Libby's defense was that if he spoke inaccurately to the grand jury and investigators, it was only a case of faulty memory.

Jurors Listen To Libby's Grand Jury Tapes (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby told a grand jury in 2004 that Vice President Cheney did not encourage him to provide information about an undercover CIA officer to the media, but Libby also said he did not believe that the information was secret and had to be safeguarded, according to audiotapes of Libby's testimony played in court yesterday.

Testifying to the grand jury in the probe that eventually led to criminal charges against him, Libby, Cheney's then-chief of staff, said he remembered Cheney telling him in June 2003 that the wife of a prominent war critic worked at the CIA. Libby said it was the first time he had heard that, but that Cheney said it in "sort of an offhand manner, as a curiosity."

Libby also testified that he "could not recall" details of events and conversations he had that summer with Cheney and other administration officials regarding the war critic, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV. Wilson that summer accused the administration of twisting intelligence he had gathered about Iraq's efforts to develop a nuclear weapons program as the White House launched the invasion of Iraq and sold it to the public.

The eight hours of audiotapes, most of which are to be played today, are intended to back up the government's claim that Libby lied to investigators about his role in disclosing the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame, Wilson's wife. Prosecutors have alleged that Plame's name was leaked as part of a campaign to discredit Wilson by spreading the idea that his CIA-sponsored trip was the result of nepotism.

Libby is charged not with the leak but with five felony counts of perjury, making false statements and obstruction of justice. He has pleaded not guilty, contending that he inaccurately remembered events when he said he learned of Plame from NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert and forgot he first heard of her from Cheney.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton agreed yesterday that the audiotapes should be released to the media after they are played for the jury, despite strenuous arguments by Libby's defense attorneys that they not be released during trial. Defense lawyer William Jeffress Jr. said the news generated by the tapes -- and the public buzz about them -- could be so widespread that there was a risk jurors could accidentally encounter it, perhaps while riding buses or the Metro.

A consortium of news organizations, including The Washington Post, sought the tapes, arguing that they were no different from other evidence in the trial, which is being released publicly the day it is introduced. They successfully argued that Libby's testimony is far less sensational than other tapes that have been released in court, such as 911 emergency phone calls from inside the World Trade Center after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and FBI tapes from the Abscam investigation.

Inside the courtroom, the idea of listening to eight hours of Libby testimony had some jurors' mouths dropping open. But they listened keenly late into the afternoon.

On the tapes, Libby's voice became noticeably softer and trailed off on some questions. He paused often, never rushing his answers. Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald, who posed the questions, warned Libby he could face perjury charges if he did not tell the grand jury the truth.

On the tapes, Libby said that Cheney did not tell him Plame's CIA identity was "super-super-secret" and that he used a "curious" tone unlike his regular voice, which "was much more matter-of-fact and straight." Libby said he did not remember Cheney speaking harshly of Wilson or suggesting nepotism was the reason for his mission. He said Cheney made the reference to Wilson's wife in the middle of advising Libby on how to respond to claims that Wilson had been sent on the mission because of questions from the vice president's office.

Libby said a column by the New York Times's Nicholas Kristof in May 2003, which suggested Cheney's role, "caught my eye." But Libby said he did not "have any recollection" of Cheney or President Bush taking note of the article.

Libby also said he could not recall ever asking then-Undersecretary of State Marc Grossman in late May 2003 about Wilson's trip to Niger. Grossman testified two weeks ago that he directed some of his staff to produce a report about Wilson's CIA mission after Libby called him urgently trying to learn more about how and why Wilson was sent to investigate whether Iraq was trying to purchase uranium from the African nation.

Late last night, Libby's defense began laying the groundwork to keep Libby from having to testify. Walton had warned that Libby would have to take the stand in order for the court to allow his lawyers to claim his misstatements to investigators were caused by a faulty or overtaxed memory.

In court papers filed last night, though, Libby's attorneys argued that he should be allowed to present evidence of the "crush of his duties," including by having Cheney describe them on the witness stand, without being forced to testify on his own behalf.

Court Hears Grand Jury Testimony (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby told a federal grand jury three years ago that he did not believe he had discussed the wife of an administration critic with officials from the CIA and the State Department, contradicting sworn testimony by the officials at Libby's perjury trial here.

The revelation came Monday as prosecutors began playing audiotapes of Libby's eight hours of testimony before a grand jury investigating how the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame became public.

The transcript of Libby's two grand jury appearances in March 2004 also shows that special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald explored early on whether President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney were involved in the circumstances leading to the disclosure of Plame's identity as a CIA employee.

Libby told the grand jury that Cheney was the first to tell him, in June 2003, that the wife of former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV worked in the arms-proliferation division of the CIA. But the vice president's former chief of staff denied that his boss had instructed him to pass on information about Wilson's wife to anyone else.

Fitzgerald then asked Libby whether he or Cheney had ever discussed with Bush the criticism from Wilson that was beginning to surface in media reports. He said he had not.

Plame's identity was revealed in a syndicated column by Robert Novak on July 14, 2003, eight days after an opinion article by Wilson in the New York Times charged that the Bush administration had twisted intelligence reports about then-Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's interest in obtaining uranium yellowcake from the African nation of Niger.

At the CIA's request, Wilson had investigated those claims the previous year. Although he found them to be without merit, a 16-word section of Bush's 2003 State of the Union address asserted that Iraq was seeking nuclear material in Africa.

In May 2003, a New York Times op-ed columnist disputed the accuracy of that section. He wrote that "the vice president's office had asked for an investigation of the uranium deal" more than a year earlier, and that an unnamed ambassador had traveled to Africa and reported that the allegations were baseless.

Prosecutors contend that Plame's identity was disclosed as part of an effort to discredit her husband by suggesting that the trip to Africa came only because his wife worked at the CIA.

Under federal law, it can be a crime to intentionally disclose the status of a covert CIA employee, and Fitzgerald was asked by the Justice Department to determine whether that law had been broken. No one has been charged with that crime. The only charges filed have been against Libby, on perjury and obstruction of justice counts.

The audiotape of the grand jury proceedings is the first time that the jury in Libby's trial has heard from the defendant in any form. His words directly contradict the testimony last month of former CIA official Robert Grenier and former State Department Undersecretary Marc Grossman. Both said they had told Libby that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA.

On the audiotape, Libby told the grand jury that he could not recall discussing Wilson's wife with either official.

"I, I don't recall," he said, asked specifically by Fitzgerald whether Grossman had told him about Wilson's wife.

"You have no memory of that whatsoever?" Fitzgerald said.

"Sorry, sir, I don't," Libby replied.

Fitzgerald also quizzed Libby about a series of notes he took while talking on the phone with Cheney on or about June 12, 2003.

Libby said that Cheney was giving him a series of talking points on rebutting Wilson's contentions, including a suggestion that the vice president had authorized the trip and should have known what was learned.

Cheney did mention that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA, Libby told the grand jury, adding that he did not attach much significance to the disclosure.

The vice president "said to me in sort of an offhand manner, as a curiosity, that his wife worked at the CIA," Libby testified.

"Was he curious about it in a sort of negative way?" Fitzgerald asked. "Did he think that was sort of odd that a former ambassador's wife worked … at the CIA?"

"I wouldn't say negative, but I would say it was a fact … not everybody's wife works there," Libby responded. "So it was a new fact, that's all."

Libby said he did not believe that Cheney wanted him to leak word about Wilson's wife to the press.

"Was there a reason?" Fitzgerald asked.

"No. It just wasn't a particularly powerful point compared to the other points. I didn't understand it to be a point worth mentioning in that context," Libby replied.

Fitzgerald has said that Libby lied to the grand jury and to federal investigators to cover up his concern that he had leaked classified information about Plame to reporters.

Libby has said that he first learned about Plame from Tim Russert, the moderator of "Meet the Press" and the Washington bureau chief of NBC News. Russert, who is expected to testify on Wednesday, has said he did not give Libby that information. Libby has said that at the time he spoke with Russert he had forgotten that Cheney had told him about Plame.

Fitzgerald said he would play the rest of the grand jury tapes today and complete his case Wednesday, at which time Libby's lawyers will begin their defense.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton ruled Monday morning that the tapes, along with the transcripts, would be made available to the public after Fitzgerald introduces them into evidence.

Libby's lawyers had fought to keep them secret because of concerns that the jury might hear them out of court and because the tapes included prejudicial statements.

Fitzgerald agreed to delete a portion of the transcript in which Libby recorded notes from a conversation with a Cheney media aide who described Wilson as "a snake."

Walton also ruled that the government could introduce two newspaper articles found in Libby's files discussing Plame's "clandestine" status at the CIA.

News Media Cheer Ruling On Libby Tapes (AP)

AP, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - News organizations praised a judge's decision Monday to release tapes of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's grand jury testimony, saying it would open a window into court proceedings.

U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton said he would make the eight-hour recordings public even though he was worried that jurors could be influenced by outside media buzz.

Federal law supports the public release of evidence presented to a jury. But judges in high-profile cases occasionally have released only written transcripts or have delayed public disclosure until the trial's end.

"This is a victory for the public's right to know," said Karen Magnuson, president of the Associated Press Managing Editors and editor of the Democrat and Chronicle newspaper in Rochester, N.Y.

"Audio adds a layer of information that citizens can use to become more informed about the way government operates," she said.

Walton's ruling is a bit of a rarity in a federal court system that generally bans tape recorders and cameras in the courtroom. In the Libby trial, the impact also could be magnified due to the growing influence of Internet news.

The tapes took up part of Monday and are expected to run through Tuesday, as well, with public release afterward.

"This is a blogger's dream," said Jim Angle, chief Washington correspondent for Fox News, who has been covering the trial and plans to use at least some audio snippets in his reports. "What was previously secret grand jury testimony, you now get a public window into the process."

"You get to hear over and over remarks on which he was indicted and you get to make your own judgment," he said.

Other major networks, including ABC, CBS, CNN and NBC, said they would go through the audiotapes and determine how much to broadcast.

"Federal courts are difficult and tricky things to cover. It's one area where the electronic media is really not as able to cover as well as print media," said David Bohrman, CNN's Washington bureau chief. "To be able to have some access to these electronic recordings will make our coverage more realistic."

C-SPAN will also review the recordings and anticipates they may be used on television, radio and its Internet site, said spokeswoman Jennifer Moire.

Libby is charged with perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI in an indictment that focuses in part on his statements to a federal grand jury investigating the leak of the CIA identity of Valerie Plame.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald successfully fought to enter the tapes into evidence and planned to play about eight hours of Libby's closed-door testimony.

Although quotes from Libby's testimony would be widely distributed anyway by reporters who are covering the trial, his lawyers had argued that the audio was too sensitive to be released until the trial ended.

Nathan Siegel, an attorney representing The Associated Press and more than a dozen other news organizations, contended that Libby's own words were far less prejudicial than evidence released in other cases, including 911 calls from inside the World Trade Center, FBI tapes in the Abscam investigation and mob wiretap tapes.

In a telephone interview, Siegel said Walton's ruling could have significant impact for future cases at a time when audio and videotaping of statements for trial are becoming more common.

"It certainly helps the broadcast media," he said. "But it helps other outlets, too, now that you've got newspaper Web sites, with opportunities for greater use of audio and video."

In the tapes, Libby discusses conversations he had regarding Plame, whose identity was leaked to reporters in 2003.

Jane Kirtley, a media ethics professor at the University of Minnesota, said Walton's decision pointed to a "new generation of judges more comfortable" with removing roadblocks to public access to trial evidence.

As an example, Kirtley noted that the Supreme Court under Chief Justice John Roberts has shown some flexibility by releasing audio recordings of its own arguments in high-profile cases.

While there could be distortion of news accounts of the grand jury tapes, the same could be said of transcripts of grand jury proceedings that are routinely released during trials, she said.

Mr. Cheney, Tear Down This Wall (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

At the Republican National Convention in 2000 that nominated him for vice president, Dick Cheney told a rapturous crowd that Democrats “will offer more lectures, and legalisms, and carefully worded denials. We offer another way, a better way, and a stiff dose of truth.”

So, Mr. Cheney, now that the Scooter Libby trial is raising doubts about your own integrity, you owe the nation an explanation. Here are a few questions to help frame your explanation of your activities:

Mr. Vice President, did you push Mr. Libby to dig into Joe Wilson's background and discredit him? Mr. Libby made such a major effort to gather materials from the C.I.A. and State Department about Mr. Wilson — both before and after you told him on June 12, 2003, that his wife worked at the C.I.A. — that it seems likely that you commanded the effort. True?

What did you mean when you wrote, in a note to Scott McClellan that has been entered into evidence, "not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy the Pres. that was asked to stick his head in the meat grinder because of incompetence of others."

First, you wrote that it was "the Pres." who had asked Mr. Libby to do this, and then you crossed out those two words. Did President Bush indeed ask that Mr. Libby take charge of the effort to discredit Ambassador Wilson? And is it true, as was hinted at in the trial, that the White House tried to block the release of this document?

When you discussed Joe Wilson with Mr. Libby on Air Force Two on July 12, 2003, what instructions did you give him?

Trial testimony indicates that on that flight, Mr. Libby looked over some questions a reporter had sent in about Mr. Wilson and then said: "Let me go talk to the boss and I'll be back." After consulting with you, Mr. Libby later called reporters to feed them a skewed version of Mr. Wilson's trip.

Mr. Cheney, on that plane, did you specifically tell Mr. Libby to leak to reporters the fact that Mr. Wilson's wife worked at the C.I.A.?

Deborah Bond of the F.B.I. has testified that Mr. Libby acknowledged in one of his interviews that on that flight, he might have talked to you about whether to tell the news media about Valerie Wilson. So did he?

Since Mr. Libby is renowned for his caution, it seems highly unlikely that he would have leaked classified information twice to reporters right after talking to you, unless you had sanctioned the leak.

During the leak investigation, were you aware that Mr. Libby was telling the F.B.I. apparently false information?

You rode to work with him nearly every day in your limousine, and the issue never came up? Or did you ask Mr. Libby to protect you because you didn't want it known that in fact you were the one who had told him about Ms. Wilson? Was there some other information you wanted kept secret?

Were you trying to cover up your own reliance on misinformation about Iraqi W.M.D. by blaming the C.I.A. and anybody else within range, like Mr. Wilson?

More than anybody, Mr. Vice President, you made the argument in the run-up to the war that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction. And one senses, in the indictment and the trial testimony, that by the early summer of 2003, there was panic in your office that the W.M.D. had failed to materialize.

So when Ambassador Wilson came forward, you seem to have been infuriated. You tried to blame the C.I.A., and then your office tried to discredit Mr. Wilson by arguing that he had simply enjoyed a junket arranged by his wife.

Robert Grenier, a C.I.A. official, told the court that he thought the White House was "trying to avoid responsibility for positions that they took with regard to the truth about whether or not Iraq had attempted to acquire uranium from Niger." So did this all arise from an attempted cover-up?

So when are you going to come clean?

When Richard Nixon was accused of misusing campaign contributions in 1952, he gave his famous Checkers speech. When questions rose about Spiro Agnew's conduct in 1973, he repeatedly addressed them in public. (Look, you know you're in trouble when the press tries to hold you to the same standards of transparency and integrity as Nixon and Agnew.)

I'm not accusing you of committing a crime. But there are serious questions here, and you owe the nation not legalisms, but that "stiff dose of truth." If you continue to stonewall, then you don't belong in office and you should resign.

Difference Between Classified And Secret At Heart Of Libby Trial (ABC)

CIA Leak Case Focuses on Govt's Non Disclosure Agreements

WASHINGTON - Feb. 5, 2007— - In government, there's often a conflict between what can be aired publicly and what should be kept under wraps. There is no doubt about the value of keeping secret the movement of military forces in wartime.

There is plenty of information that should be released, yet is jealously guarded by government officials. Sunshine laws and the Freedom of Information Act are designed to counter too much secrecy.

Secrecy and the lack of it are at the heart of the perjury and obstruction trial of former White House aide Lewis 'Scooter' Libby. The case has its origins in allegations that the Bush Administration twisted intelligence data to justify a pre-emptive war with Iraq. The prosecution believes there was a concerted effort to discredit the war critic by unmasking his CIA wife.

There is no dispute at the Libby trial that Valerie Plame's CIA identity was CLASSIFIED information. It was the CIA that officially requested a Justice Department investigation of who leaked her name to reporters, a possible violation of the Intelligence Identities Protection Act of 1982. But no one has been charged with violating that law, which carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and a 50-thousand dollar fine.

Documents in the case and testimony at the trial show a number of top administration officials discussed Valerie Plame with reporters. Former State Department official Richard Armitage, former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer, Karl Rove, and Scooter Libby, among them. An FBI agent also testified that Libby said it's possible he and Vice President Dick Cheney discussed leaking Plame's name to journalists. It was such an incendiary topic, former Time Magazine reporter Matthew Cooper told his bureau chief the information should be considered "double super secret background."

Simply discussing an undercover operative is not enough to violate the law. You have to know the agent in question is covert and the government is taking steps to conceal the person's identity, and the disclosure must be intentional. So after a more than three year long investigation, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald has only charged Scooter Libby with lying and trying to obstruct his leak investigation. When he announced the indictment, Fitzgerald compared the offense to someone kicking sand into an umpire's eyes.

It is possible that Libby and other officials violated an agreement all federal employees are required to sign before they are given access to sensitive national security data. It's the standard classified information nondisclosure agreement. That document recognizes that "special confidence and trust shall be placed in me by the United States Government."

The signatory (employee who signs the agreement) must acknowledge receiving a briefing on the nature and protection of classified information and a warning that any unauthorized disclosure or "negligent handling of classified information" could cause "irreparable injury to the United States." The agreement also says if the employee is uncertain about the classification status of information, he or she is required to confirm the information is unclassified before disclosing it. Any violation of the nondisclosure agreement can result in termination of security clearances, removal from a particular position, or firing.

The prosecution suggests this may be one reason why Libby lied to the FBI and a grand jury about his discussions with reporters. He may have feared loss of his clearance, which could have cost him his job of National Security Adviser to the Vice President.

And when the scandal was breaking, President Bush said anyone in his administration who leaked classified information would no longer work for his administration.

Miller Tied To '92 Conflict-of-interest Fine (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

Rep. Gary Miller (R-Calif.) last week blamed an FBI review of his land deals on a media smear campaign. But this is not the first time government agencies have scrutinized his real estate transactions.

In 1992, the California Fair Political Practices Commission (FPPC), a state government entity that regulates political activity and investigates conflict-of-interest allegations, levied a $1,750 fine against Covina City Councilman Christopher Lancaster for accepting $8,000 from Miller before voting in favor of a resolution Miller sponsored.

The payment occurred when Lancaster was mayor of Covina and Miller was a member of the Diamond Bar City Council and running for state Senate.

According to an FPPC summary of the case, Miller's campaign committee paid Lancaster the money for "his work as a political campaign consultant." On Sept. 17, 1990, Lancaster voted in favor of Miller's resolution, which created a formula for the exchange and division of property tax revenue between Los Angeles County and the City of Covina.

"The resolution was initiated by Gary Miller to enable him to annex 52 acres of undeveloped land into the City of Covina," the case summary states. "Miller held an option to buy this acreage."

City councils regularly negotiate exchanges of the property tax for annexed land based on the expenses the city and the county have incurred regarding the land, usually in the form of government services. In many cases, these agreements must take place, and the city must pass a resolution laying out the exchange rate before the land can be transferred to the city.

An FPPC stipulation, decision and order signed by Lancaster and Wayne Ordos, executive director of the commission, in late 1992 pinpoints a critical matter in the case.

"Although the resolution had no impact on the amount of taxes on this property, passage of such a resolution was one of the steps necessary for the annexation process to move forward," it states. "Annexation into the City of Covina would have had a financial effect on the fifty-two acres on which Miller held an option agreement."

Annexing land from counties to cities immediately increases the value of the property because the city provides services such as sewer maintenance, according to an initial review of the case summary by the Center for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW).

Shaun Martin, a law and ethics professor at the University of San Diego, said annexation of the land benefited Miller.

"The lingering question is whether the $8,000 he gave to the mayor had anything to do with the mayor's vote in favor" of the annexation tax deal, Martin said. "To a neutral observer, the whole reason you're not allowed to vote on things when someone has paid you $8,000 is because it looks like a payoff."

Martin also said the case suggests a "pattern and a practice" in Miller's land dealings.

The 1992 FPPC case provides "a keen insight into how [Miller] was doing business," Martin said.

"For all I know, maybe [Lancaster] walked around and spent six straight months putting up yard signs [for Miller's campaign], but I highly doubt it."

Miller and Lancaster did not return calls for comment.

The San Gabriel Valley Tribune last week reported that the FBI had contacted officials and former officials from several cities in Southern California about Miller's land deals. A spokesman for the city of Monrovia also confirmed that the FBI had contacted several officials.

Miller has consistently denied any wrongdoing, and last week he lashed out at the press for conducting what he called a "smear" campaign against him.

Among various questionable land deals, The Hill first reported late last year that Monrovia city officials had tried to secure a federal earmark to help purchase a large swath of land to create a wilderness preserve in the nearby foothills, 165 acres of which Miller owned. The city's efforts were unsuccessful and it instead passed a tax increase and secured California state grant money to pay for the land. Miller ended up making nearly $10 million on the deal.

In August, CREW filed a complaint with the IRS following a Los Angeles Times report alleging that Miller failed to pay capital gains tax on the sale of the land to Monrovia, claiming that the city had exercised eminent domain, which lightened his tax load. The city denied doing so.

Fumo Strikes First (PHI)

By Mario F. Cattabiani And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 6, 2007

HARRISBURG - In a preemptive strike on the eve of his likely indictment, a defiant State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo took the fight to federal prosecutors yesterday, vowing to contest charges he called "falsities and half-truths."

"I know in my heart that I have not done anything illegal," the Philadelphia Democrat said during a 12-minute speech on the Senate floor, his voice at times somber, at times bitter.

"Sometimes in life the only choice we have when we face blatant injustice is to have the courage to stand up and fight. That is what I will do."

Fumo made the extraordinary remarks as lawyers close to the case said fraud, conspiracy, and obstruction-of-justice charges appeared imminent. An indictment could come as early as today.

Fumo stepped down from a powerful committee post yesterday - a day before the presentation of the annual state budget - but will remain in the Senate.

It was "a stunning development for the preeminent politico," said Fumo's longtime friend and fellow Democrat, House Majority Leader Bill DeWeese.

"There certainly has been only one Vince Fumo, and the long arm of the senator has exhibited unparalleled muscularity," he said.

After four years of near-silence on the investigation, Fumo, 63, a Philadelphia political baron and a Harrisburg fixture for three decades, said he expected the indictment to be voluminous - and misguided.

He predicted the indictment would focus on two basic allegations: that he exploited a South Philadelphia charity and misused his Senate staff for personal and political purposes.

It will not allege, Fumo said, that he ever cast a vote in his own interest or extorted money from businesses.

"The indictment will not allege that I ever accepted a bribe," Fumo said. "And, as the government knows, I never did."

Federal prosecutors John J. Pease and Robert A. Zauzmer declined to comment.

For nearly four years, the FBI and IRS have been investigating the finances of the multimillion-dollar charity Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods.

The organization, founded and run by Fumo allies, is funded mainly with public money and donations from Peco Energy Co. and the Delaware River Port Authority - money obtained through Fumo's influence or help.

The Inquirer has reported that the charity paid for political polls and secretly funded a lawsuit against a Fumo political rival. It is illegal for charities to participate in political activities and the IRS has been scrutinizing Citizens' Alliance tax returns to determine whether they were falsified.

Sources say the FBI is also investigating whether the charity bought Fumo household items and provided its SUVs - a Ford Expedition and a Lincoln Navigator - for Fumo to use on vacation.

Fumo defended his relationship with the charity.

"Make no mistake, I am proud of Citizens' Alliance," he said, ticking off a list of the nonprofit's accomplishments, from funding a charter school to cleaning up blighted neighborhoods.

The charity's lawyer, William J. Winning, declined last night to comment on the speech or the investigation.

In his speech, Fumo also defended his relationship with Harrisburg and Philadelphia staff. He said they work long hours serving constituents well.

"The suggestion that my staff members are political operatives or personal assistants reflects an amazing ignorance of both the legislative process and the facts," he said with a group of aides standing behind him on the Senate floor.

Fumo made no reference to possible obstruction-of-justice charges. Last year, two of his Senate computer technicians were accused of purging e-mails from government computers. In court papers, prosecutors said they believed the aides - Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister - deleted computer documents at Fumo's direction to thwart the federal probe. They have pleaded not guilty.

Several lawyers involved in the case said they expected the current charges against Luchko and Eister to be merged with the Fumo indictment.

Luchko's lawyer, James C. Schwartzman, said yesterday the government was overreaching.

"I'm looking forward to reading the novel the government is going to come out with," Schwartzman said. "If I were a betting man, I think we're looking at a couple of hundred pages."

Another person who may face charges is Ruth Arnao, a former Fumo Senate aide and Citizens' Alliance executive director. Sources say prosecutors have also sent her a so-called target letter, warning that charges were likely. Her lawyer did not return a call yesterday.

Fumo has been indicted twice before - in 1973 over vote fraud, and in 1980 over putting ghost employees on the state payroll. Charges in the first case were quickly dropped; he was convicted in the second, but a judge later threw out the conviction.

This time, he is represented by the firm of Sprague & Sprague, among the most prominent in Philadelphia. One of his lawyers, Mark Sheppard, declined to comment yesterday.

Fumo or members of his inner circle serve on a web of government and quasi-government agencies - from the Delaware River Port Authority to the Pennsylvania Higher Education Assistance Agency - that control much of the city and state infrastructure, cultural institutions, and political innards.

Fumo will remain on the DRPA, higher education and other boards, spokesman Gary Tuma said.

Fumo took to the floor about 2 p.m. He called it "the most difficult speech I have ever had to deliver."

He ripped federal prosecutors for what he called a "years-long, one-sided campaign of scurrilous leaks to the media designed to undermine my office and attack my reputation."

"I am not happy about this, but in one sense I am relieved," Fumo said. "These years have not been easy on me or my family, my staff and my friends... . I will be able to meet the allegations head-on, instead of trying to answer the countless rumors that have attended this process."

In a move that caused a buzz in Harrisburg, both for its timing and its political impact, Fumo also announced he was stepping aside as the ranking Democrat on the Appropriations Committee, a powerful post he has held since 1985. State Sen. Gerald LaValle (D., Beaver) will take his place.

The news comes on the eve of Gov. Rendell's budget presentation - the traditional start of the busy season for the committee as it crafts the state's spending blueprint for the coming fiscal year.

Through a spokeswoman, Rendell called Fumo's decision to step down a "blow to Philadelphia and the surrounding region."

"Sen. Fumo has sharp knowledge of the budget process and the inner workings of the budget documents. His expertise will be missed," said Kate Philips, the governor's spokeswoman.

Under Senate rules, members indicted for a crime related to their office must temporarily relinquish leadership posts pending the outcome of the case.

Fumo presumably would also lose all the perks of the leadership post, including his large staff and huge discretionary account, which he has spent liberally on, among other things, a stable of consultants.

If acquitted, Fumo would get the position back. If convicted, he could be removed from office.

Pa. Senator Says He'll Be Indicted (NSDY/AP)

By Peter Jackson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 6, 2007

HARRISBURG, Pa. -- One of Pennsylvania's most powerful politicians announced on the state Senate floor Monday that he expects to be indicted soon in an extortion case and that he was temporarily giving up a key committee post.

Sen. Vincent J. Fumo, a Philadelphia Democrat, said he would likely be charged this week with using a neighborhood nonprofit group for his own personal and political gain.

"I know in my heart that I have not done anything illegal," said Fumo, 63.

A federal grand jury has been investigating whether Fumo extorted tens of millions of dollars in corporate donations for the Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods. Two of his former Senate staffers are scheduled to stand trial on obstruction charges May 21 on suspicion of deleting e-mail about Fumo's ties to the charity from office and other computers.

Fumo would have been required to give up his leadership post as soon as he was indicted. He portrayed his resignation as minority party chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee as a temporary measure "until I am vindicated."

Fumo charged that the investigation "has been marked by threats, intimidations and frequent leaks to the media intended to embarrass me" and vowed to fight the allegations.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Zauzmer declined to comment on Fumo's remarks.

The Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods is run by Fumo's aides and does economic development and beautification projects in his district.

Peco Energy Co. gave the nonprofit group $17 million as it sought to win state deregulation of the electricity markets. Fumo initially opposed the effort but later threw his support behind the utility.

A lawyer, Fumo is an architect of the 2004 law that legalized slot-machine gambling in the state.

Fumo's Defense: A Strong Offense (PHI)

By Craig R. Mccoy And Emilie Lounsberry

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 6, 2007

It was vintage Senator Fumo - smart, heartfelt, combative, eloquent and shrewd.

Without waiting for a massive federal indictment that may shred his image, legal experts and public-relations people noted yesterday, State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo struck first. He offered a counter-narrative: Fumo, the people's champion, fighting the good fight in the face of threats, leaks and intimidation.

"A terrific public-relations maneuver to get ahead of the indictment," said lawyer John P. Pucci, a former federal prosecutor.

Or, as veteran Philadelphia ad man Elliott Curson put it: "It's a preemptive attack.... He's trying to get his side of the story out before the other side."

In his speech from the Senate floor, Fumo, 63, provided his own summary of the charges he is likely to face and then ripped into them.

He said the government was about to accuse him of misusing a South Philadelphia charity. To rebut that, he extolled the nonprofit's work on "countless" community projects, from supporting charter schools to cleaning up "trash-strewn, rat-infested, vacant lots.... It is truly about better neighborhoods."

With members of his Senate staff standing behind him, he said prosecutors were about to paint them as his taxpayer-paid campaign workers and personal servants. To the contrary, he said, they work tirelessly for the public, without bonuses or overtime.

And, lest anyone miss the news, Fumo's office circulated copies of his speech to the Capitol press corps.

A special case

An officeholder announcing his own indictment ahead of time is a rarity. While many defense lawyers say the only good client is a silent one, others say an indicted politician is a special case.

Dan Richman, a former federal prosecutor who now teaches law at Fordham University in New York City, noted that politicians must protect not only their liberty, but also their viability - and thus must play to both potential jurors and potential voters.

Neil Oxman, a veteran political strategist, said silent was not a smart option.

"The only other strategy is, you don't say a word, and the next time someone sees you is when you walk into court and somebody sticks a microphone in your face," said Oxman, who is based in Philadelphia. "This is a much better strategy."

Art Patterson, a jury expert in State College, Pa., said it was good strategy to send messages to the vast jury pool: "It's laying the groundwork of a vigorous defense."

If Fumo is indicted, a federal jury would likely be chosen from a wide swath of eastern Pennsylvania. Though jurors are not supposed to be influenced by what they see or read about a case, trial experts say it is hard to totally screen out such influences.

Jurors generally expect someone accused of a crime to mount a strong defense, Patterson said, and wonder about those who say, "No comment."

"Going on the offensive is always good," he said.

Patterson said big companies about to be sued often launch an ad campaign "in hopes that this will have a positive influence on jurors" in civil trials.

Not unprecedented

A few other Philadelphia figures have chosen a similar strategy when a federal indictment loomed.

In 1991, City Councilman James J. Tayoun, delivered a speech on the Council floor denouncing federal investigators' "malicious" attempt to destroy his career. He later pleaded guilty to crimes in office and went to prison. Now he publishes a weekly newspaper, the Public Record.

And in 1988, when six former members of the elite Philadelphia police "Five Squad" drug unit were indicted for corruption, two defendants crashed the news conference at FBI headquarters to attempt to rebut the charges.

Pucci, who prosecuted the Five Squad case and who now practices law in Massachusetts, recalled that move as a "startling event."

So, he noted that Fumo's bold statement on the House floor was "not unprecedented."

Pucci said Fumo's statement was not only a shrewd public-relations move, but also foreshadowed what any Fumo trial might be like - "a bare-knuckled battle."

FUMO'S COATTAILS ARE LONG (PHI)

By Dave Davies

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 6, 2007

WHEN SOMETHING as earth-shattering as a federal corruption indictment hits a politician as influential as Vince Fumo, his friends and allies feel the shock waves, too.

And this spring, some of them are running for office.

What will become of Fumo's political family?

Fumo worked hard to get U.S. Rep. Bob Brady into the mayor's race, and longtime Fumocrats Jim Kenney and Frank DiCicco are running for re-election to their seats on City Council.

Kenney and DiCicco, by now multi-term incumbents with their own legislative records, political relationships and fundraising capacity seem well-positioned to thrive on their own.

It's harder to predict the impact on Brady, a longtime friend and associate of Fumo's who must fight the notion that he's a machine politician.

Opponents may produce pictures of Fumo with Brady, a Democratic ward leader and 20-year party chairman, hoping to taint Brady with Fumo's legal problems.

Political analyst Larry Ceisler said it's a tactic that's likely to fail or backfire.

"In this city, I just don't think guilt by association works," he said. "Brady has his own persona, his own identity."

St. Joseph's University historian and analyst Randall Miller said the Fumo scandal could raise the profile of the issue of public corruption and help mayoral candidates Michael Nutter and Tom Knox, who are fighting "pay-to-play" politics.

"The Fumo charges would be another example, another layer in the growing public perception that corruption is a big problem," Miller said.

Even if Brady isn't tainted by his friendship with Fumo, he's likely to miss Fumo's potent fundraising capacity.

Brady yesterday said he would not hide from Fumo.

"It's not in my nature to turn my back on a friend," Brady said. "I wish him and his family well."

Brady said he believes voters will judge him on his own merit and message, and he wasn't counting on Fumo to fund his campaign.

"It's not like I just got here," Brady said. "I've been around a long time, and there are plenty of people I can rely on."

Kenney and DiCicco said that they regard Fumo a friend but that they have their own records to run on.

"At some point, this 48-year-old, four-term incumbent has to be viewed as an individual, " Kenney said. "I've got a body of work I'm proud to take to the voters."

Kenney has been a focal point of controversy lately for his proposal to lift the campaign-contribution limit in a mayor's race in which millionaire Knox has given his campaign more than $2 million.

Although Kenney was among the first in Council to propose contribution limits and supported ethics reforms in the last term, his recent proposal has drawn fire from several civic and business groups.

DiCicco, who won his seat with Fumo's help in 1995, said he's stood on his own for a long time, opposing Fumo on some policy issues and getting little money from him in his last campaign.

DiCicco said he understands that an opponent of his or Brady's may try to make an issue of their friendship with Fumo.

"People aspiring to elected office will take any shot they can and see if it sticks," DiCicco said. "People will look at it and make reasonable judgments about it. You know, Vince touched a lot of lives in this city, and not just in the political arena."

Corruption Trial Begins Today (MH)

By Cammy Clark

DOJ_NMG_0128189

KEY WEST - A decade after the late Monroe County Mayor John L. "Jack" London was paid $29,000 as part of an alleged development bribery scheme, a former county attorney goes on trial today for his suspected role in the public corruption case.

James Hendrick, who served as Monroe County attorney from 1995-2002, faces federal charges of conspiracy to obstruct justice, witness tampering and obstruction of justice. A 12-member jury was seated Monday.

If convicted, the maximum penalty is 10 years imprisonment for witness tampering and obstruction of justice and five years for conspiracy.

The case stems from a lengthy FBI investigation into alleged public corruption in the Keys. Prosecutors say Hendrick was the center of a "secret deal" in which he, London and Miami-Dade political consultant Randy Hilliard conspired to get Marathon businessman Marvin Rappaport to pay $75,000 in exchange for building and zoning approval of his stymied redevelopment project.

The payments were made between April and August 1996, prosecutors say. On June 19, 1996, the County Commission approved Rappaport's project, called Halls Resort.

In December 1997, Hilliard used some of the money to send three cashier checks totaling $29,000 to pay off a lien on London's second home in Ireland, prosecutors say.

London pleaded guilty in July 2005 for tax evasion stemming from the $29,000 payment. Prosecutors dropped his three counts of lying to federal investigators in exchange for London testifying against Hendrick, once a close friend.

Hendrick was arrested two months earlier at his Whitehead Street office and flown to Miami, where he pleaded not guilty.

The prosecution lost a key witness when London died Nov. 21 from an aneurysm while awaiting sentencing in his plea deal.

Prosecutors are expected to call Hilliard, Rappaport and others as witnesses; they are cooperating and are not charged in the corruption case.

In addition to their testimony, the case against Hendrick hinges on 11 taped conservations between him and Hilliard that began in 2003. Eight were by phone and three were in person, with Hilliard wearing a wire for the FBI.

According to the indictment, transcripts of those tapes indicate Hendrick devised a false explanation of the $29,000 payment, saying it was a consulting fee. He then instructed Hilliard and London to tell the concocted story to the grand jury. Prosecutors also allege that Hendrick told London to leave South Florida to avoid appearing before the grand jury.

Prosecutors also say they plan to introduce evidence that Hilliard, London and Hendrick discussed using a Bahamian company and a bank account in Luxembourg to pay additional bribes to London.

The prosecutors said the use of the Luxembourg account would allow London to use an ATM card to make cash withdrawals in the United States.

The company's name was the Resources Conservancy, with an address in the United States that was the same as Hendrick's law firm in Key West.

Hendrick's attorney, Ed Shohat, filed a motion to exclude the "prior bad acts evidence." Senior U.S. District Judge Shelby Highsmith denied the motion, Assistant U.S. Attorney Christopher Clark said Monday.

"It's part and parcel of the same crime," Clark said after the jury -- 11 women and one man -- was selected for the trial, which is expected to last two weeks.

Hendrick declined to comment, saying anything he said would be misconstrued by the public.

Belleville Woman To Be Sentenced In Hurricane Katrina Fraud (AP)

By Ann Sanner

AP, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - A 59-year-old man was sentenced Monday to 8 1/2 years in prison on charges stemming from his use of stolen identities in an attempt to acquire more than $100,000 in payments intended for victims of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Jeffrey Alan Rothschild, who's also known as Jeffrey Zahler, pleaded guilty in August to bank fraud, mail fraud and money laundering in late 2005. He was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly in Washington.

U.S. Attorney Jeffrey A. Taylor said Rothschild abused a system set up by the Federal Emergency Management Agency to allow hurricane victims to receive $2,000 in emergency funds after providing their names, Social Security numbers and other information.

Between about Sept. 13, 2005, and Dec. 31, 2005, Rothschild used personal information and addresses that he found on the Internet or material he made up to get money from FEMA, Taylor said.

As a result, FEMA issued 38 checks to people whose names Rothschild had provided. He then forged the checks and deposited them in accounts he controlled. He submitted 14 applications for which he did not receive checks, Taylor said.

Rothschild has no fixed address.

Gulfport Woman Pleads Guilty To Katrina Fraud (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, February 6, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - A Gulfport woman pleaded guilty to hurricane disaster-relief fraud and faces five years in prison, the U.S. attorney's office said Monday.

Amanda Rettig will be sentenced April 25 and could also be fined up to $250,000.

She pleaded guilty to filing a false claim with the Federal Emergency Management Agency saying her property was damaged by Hurricane Katrina. She submitted a false address in Saucier.

She received $22,253.23, a statement from U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said.

Suspect In 2 Boys' Abduction Charged With Molestation (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, February 6, 2007

CLAYTON, Mo. — Michael Devlin, who has been accused of kidnapping two Missouri boys who were found last month, was charged Monday with molesting the teenagers.

St. Louis County prosecutor Robert McCulloch charged Devlin, 41, with 71 counts: two kidnapping charges and the rest for forcible sodomy. Each charge is a felony punishable by up to life in prison. He said Devlin was charged with 17 counts of forcible sodomy relating to an abduction last month and 52 more in a 2002 kidnapping. "Devlin acknowledged committing these acts," McCulloch said.

Following his department's policy of not naming victims of sexual abuse, McCulloch did not name the teens. He noted that their identities "are not a national secret."

Ben Ownby, 13, of Beaufort, Mo., was kidnapped on Jan. 8. Shawn Hornbeck, 15, disappeared in 2002 in Richwoods, Mo. Both were found inside Devlin's apartment in Kirkwood, Mo., on Jan. 12. Devlin was charged last month with kidnapping in each boy's home county and pleaded not guilty. Monday's charges were filed in the county where Devlin lived.

USA TODAY does not usually identify victims of alleged sex crimes. In this case, however, the names have been widely used in the media. Hornbeck's stepfather, Craig Akers, told USA TODAY that it was "a logical assumption" that Shawn had been sexually abused. Devlin's lawyers, Ethan Corlija and Michael Kielty, said in a statement they have "received no evidence" on the charges. Scott Sherman, a lawyer for Shawn and his family, told the Associated Press that the family "is relieved that the speculation" about what happened is over.

The Police Lineup Is Becoming Suspect Practice (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

ATLANTA

More than two decades ago, a sexual-assault victim from Sandy Springs, Ga., pointed to a picture of her attacker in a photo lineup.

"From zero to 100 percent, how sure are you?" a detective asked.

"I'm 120 percent sure," the woman said, as stated in court testimony.

DOJ_NMG_0128191

It now appears that she was 100 percent wrong, according to the Fulton County district attorney. The result of DNA testing led to the release of Willie "Pete" Williams on Jan. 23 after nearly 22 years in a south Georgia prison for a crime he did not commit. Her mistake and his exoneration have revived a debate about the accuracy of eyewitness identifications – and their central role in persuading juries to convict.

But even as a handful of police departments from Boston to Minneapolis have voluntarily changed lineup procedures to help reduce such tragic errors, resistance to top-down reform from the majority of American police chiefs and prosecutors is pushing the debate into the legislative chamber. Last week, Georgia introduced a bill that would scrap the side-by-side police lineup, and would instead require police departments to present suspects one by one – either in person or by photo. Georgia joins Texas, New Mexico, West Virginia, and Vermont, which have similar bills pending.

Some experts argue that the new procedure limits inaccurate "relative judgments" that victims can make during a lineup. But police counter that they do not want to be forced to use a specific procedure that they say would undermine proven techniques detectives use.

"You can start to see a move now in policymaking and the decisions that prosecutors are making about how they elicit evidence," says Professor Christian Meissner, director of the Investigative Interviewing Research Laboratory at the University of Texas at El Paso. "The involvement of legislatures is an attempt to get prosecutors to realize that these are real issues that need to be addressed."

Since 1992, 194 people have been exonerated on the basis of DNA evidence, and some 75 percent of the convictions involved at least one faulty eyewitness identification, according to the Innocence Project, which works to clear those who are falsely imprisoned. A separate study published by the University of Michigan in 2004 found that 90 percent of mistakes that led to false convictions in rape cases were caused by eyewitness errors.

"The way the [procedure] is now, it's easy to pick somebody out that's not involved," says Michael Moore, a private investigator in Cairo, Ga.

How new bills change lineups

To minimize errors, the new bills in the five states propose that police must employ a "blind" lineup administrator, who in a small town could be a retired police officer or even a barber. This person would not know anything about the case, and therefore would be unable to influence the witness, for example, to "take another look at No. 5." Also the measures would replace the lineup in which people or photos are shown side by side with a procedure where suspects are shown one at a time. This "blind sequential lineup" strategy reduces "relative discrimination" in which witnesses identify somebody who looks most like the perpetrator out of a group, researchers say.

"Let's learn the lessons not only about the fallibility of eyewitness identification, but also of the ... research that shows how to eliminate the inadvertent suggestiveness of traditional police lineup procedures," says Stephen Saloom, policy director at the Innocence Project in New York.

In recent years, research has showed that blind sequential photo lineups produce half as many mistakes as the traditional "parade" of suspects, but they also result in 3 percent fewer total identifications.

But the blind sequential photo lineup resulted in more false identifications when it was employed in Illinois in the squad rooms of Chicago, Joliet, and Evanston in 2005. Using this method, witnesses made positive identifications 62 percent of the time; the sequential method yielded identifications 53 percent of the time, according to a study by the Illinois attorney general.

With this study in mind, some criticize states' efforts to mandate a specific procedure that would replace the experience detectives have from "thousands of years of court with 25 years of studies on human memory," says Rick Malone, director of the Prosecuting Attorneys' Council of Georgia. "A clinical study in a research laboratory versus someone walking out of a liquor store who shoots the fellow across the street – those aren't the same conditions."

The change could also trigger a flood of appeals from convicts who say they were mistakenly identified, says Terence Campbell, a forensic psychologist in Sterling Heights, Mich., offering a reason prosecutors are against the legislation.

The exoneration of 'Pete' Williams

During his trial, Mr. Williams said he was playing cards with friends at the time of the rape, but his testimony could not overcome the jury's perception of the victim's "120 percent" certain identification. Williams wrote a letter from prison to the Georgia Innocence Project saying he was "a poor black man with a criminal record" who was convicted of a crime he did not commit. The group then used DNA technology to test the evidence again. "We are all human," Williams said after his release, as he forgave the witness for the mistake.

The story of Williams, an aspiring gospel singer who broke into a bar of "Amazing Grace" after his release, is likely to influence whether Georgia lawmakers vote to pass the bill, experts say.

"When you have someone just released from prison who was unjustly put in there, [the success of a reform bill] comes down to how much sympathy defense attorneys can garner in [the house judiciary] committee, and they could garner a lot," says Frank Rotondo, of the Georgia Association of Chiefs of Police.

Jail Record Near For Videographer Who Resisted Grand Jury (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 5 — A freelance videographer who refused to cooperate with a grand jury investigation will become the longest incarcerated journalist in modern American history on Tuesday. The freelancer, Josh Wolf, will pass Vanessa Leggett, an investigator and a journalist who served 168 days in 2001 and 2002 for refusing to surrender information in a murder case.

Mr. Wolf, 24, has been in prison since August, with a brief break in September related to his appeal, after refusing to cooperate with a grand jury investigation of an anticapitalist protest in 2005 in which a police officer here was injured and a squad car was slightly damaged by a small explosive device.

Prosecutors have demanded that Mr. Wolf give them his raw video, some of which he has posted on his Web site, www.joshwolf.net, as well as testify about the protesters seen on the tape for an investigation into possible charges, including arson.

“Wolf videotaped a public demonstration where there may have been an attempt to set a police car ablaze and where a San Francisco police officer’s skull was fractured when he was hit from behind by a demonstrator,” said Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the United States attorney for the Northern District of California.

Mr. Macaulay cited six federal decisions in the government’s favor, including one last week that denied a request for a new hearing.

“This office has issued a lawful subpoena for legitimate investigative purposes,” he said.

Mr. Wolf says he is protecting his sources. He remains behind bars even as the United States attorney who had him held, Kevin V. Ryan, has said he is stepping down and the San Francisco district attorney has dismissed the lone remaining criminal case involving the protest.

Mr. Wolf could stay jailed until the term of the grand jury ends in July.

The jailing has prompted outcries by advocates for freedom of the press who say it seems out of proportion to the scale of the investigation.

“This is one more example of the increasing attacks on confidentiality of sources in the United States, one more blow to investigative journalism and, eventually, to the right for American people to be informed,” Lucie Morillon, a spokeswoman for Reporters Without Borders in Washington, wrote in an e-mail message. “This is a bad signal sent to the rest of the world.”

The case has also raised the question of whether Mr. Wolf is truly a reporter or simply a citizen who shot videotape. His lawyer, Martin Garbus, said Mr. Wolf established his journalistic status in part by selling videotape of the protest to local television stations.

The protest was timed to coincide with a Group of 8 meeting of world economic leaders in Scotland.

Judge William Alsup of Federal District Court here disagreed, referring to Mr. Wolf as an “alleged journalist” in court papers. Judge Alsup has also repeatedly cited Branzburg v. Hayes, a Supreme Court decision in 1972 that found that the First Amendment does not exempt any newsmen from testifying to a grand jury.

Mr. Garbus said he would be return to court next month with a psychiatrist's affidavits, as well as statements from former co-workers and teachers that Mr. Wolf is unlikely to be persuaded to talk.

"The more acclimated he gets," Mr. Garbus said of the detention, "the more determined he gets."

Child Pornography Suspect Pleads Guilty (TRENT)

By Kevin Shea

Trenton Times, February 6, 2007

A former West Windsor man pleaded guilty in federal court yesterday to one count of receiving and distributing child pornography on the Internet.

Mark Wasco, 46, was charged in March 2006 with possessing child pornography after an FBI agent and a New Jersey State Police investigator searched his home and computers and found numerous images of children engaged in sex.

The investigation of Wasco eventually led to him pleading guilty yesterday to receipt and distribution of child pornography before U.S. District Chief Judge Garrett E. Brown Jr.

Wasco was not indicted and pleaded guilty to a one-count allegation against him. He is scheduled to be sentenced May 14.

The U.S. Attorney's office yesterday declined to comment further on the Wasco case.

Court papers and the criminal complaint against Wasco allege that when authorities searched his West Windsor home on South Post Road, they found numerous images of child pornography after searching two laptop computers, one external hard drive and some compact discs.

The complaint also alleges that Wasco, at one point, posed as a teenage boy to solicit images of children using the Web site MySpace.com, and admitted to the ploy.

Wasco also admitted to using more than one file-sharing site to trade child pornography images over the Internet.

Wasco, according to court documents, is free pending sentencing and living with a relative in Hamilton.

Fifth Worker At Frontier Accused Of Sex Crime (BUFFNEWS)

By DAN HERBECK And MARY B. PASCIAK, NEWS STAFF REPORTERS

Buffalo News, February 6, 2007

Elementary teacher arrested in Internet child sex sting

An elementary school teacher from Frontier School District is accused of using the Internet to arrange a sexual liaison with a 14-year-old boy.

Kollin Roy King, arrested Thursday night, is at least the fifth Frontier Schools employee to be charged with improper conduct with youngsters or Internet child pornography since the latter part of 2004.

King, 26, is also a longtime Boy Scout volunteer who was scheduled to become director of Camp Scouthaven this summer, overseeing a program for boys in first to fifth grades who attend camp with their parents.

The "boy" who led to King's arrest was actually an undercover FBI agent, who arranged a meeting at a Cheektowaga restaurant. A team of agents arrested King when he showed up.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Allison P. Gioia identified King as a fifth-grade teacher at Blasdell Elementary School and a Cub Scout leader in the Southtowns area. She said King faces a felony charge of attempting to entice a minor into engaging in sexual activity.

"It's a concern to the district and to board members," said Thomas J. DeBoy, the school district's attorney. "I've been in touch with the FBI and the U.S. Attorney, and the district is cooperating fully with the investigation."

When local scouting officials learned Friday of King's arrest, they notified him that he has been removed from the program pending resolution of the case, in keeping with Boy Scouts of America's policy.

"He's been involved in scouting for many years, and he was always held in high regard, both in his volunteer and paid positions," said Patrick Coviello, executive director of the Greater Niagara Frontier Council of the Boy Scouts of America.

"Everyone here has been shocked by this news. Certainly he always seemed to be a very professional, polite, well-intentioned young man."

According to Gioia, King's arrest followed a series of "explicit" Internet conversations with an undercover agent, during which King said he wanted to have sex with the purported teenager and a 12-year-old friend. FBI agents said King admitted after his arrest to past sexual activities with a 16-year-old he met on the Internet. But agents said he told them he has never molested any of his students or youths he met as a Cub Scout leader.

King, who lives on Southwestern Boulevard in Hamburg, has been a Frontier teacher for less than three years and does not yet have tenure, DeBoy said, adding that the district was unaware of any alleged wrongdoing by King before the arrest.

King taught sixth grade at Orchard Park Middle School for two years before going to Frontier. Orchard Park officials said they never received any complaints about him; he resigned because his job was in jeopardy from pending budget cuts.

A transcript of King's alleged Internet chats with the undercover agent indicates that King repeatedly made graphic requests for sex, strongly urging the agent to include a 12-year-old friend in the planned meeting.

In one excerpt, King asked the agent how old his friend was.

Agent: 12.

King: YES!!!!! lets threesome.

Agent: i dont know if he would be into it.

King: please please please.

But after his arrest, King was less enthusiastic when asked by FBI agents what he would have done if two minor boys had shown up instead of a team of federal agents.

"I hope nothing would have happened," the FBI quoted King as saying.

"We see these sting operations on television all the time. The public is well aware that we have undercover agents on the Internet," FBI spokesman Paul M. Moskal said on Friday. "And yet, people keep doing it. This kind of criminal activity seems to get more and more prevalent."

Moskal said it is difficult to understand why men continue to use the Internet to arrange sexual meetings with minors. "The men we've arrested are driven. They have a fire in their belly to do this, and they won't stop until they get caught," Moskal said. "And they will eventually get caught."

After a brief appearance Friday before U.S. Magistrate Judge H. Kenneth Schroeder Jr., King was ordered jailed until at least Tuesday. A federal public defender, Kimberly Schechter, represented King at the proceeding and declined to comment afterward.

DeBoy said the FBI told him that there are no allegations of King molesting students from the Frontier district. He said the district plans to arrange a meeting with King's students and their parents to discuss the arrest.

DeBoy said it was too soon to disclose whether King would be suspended from work, either with or without pay.

Teacher, Scout Leader Accused Of Soliciting Sex With Minor (NSDY/AP)

By Carolyn Thompson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 6, 2007

BUFFALO, N.Y. -- An elementary school teacher and Boy Scout leader was charged Friday with arranging to meet teenage boys for sex.

Kollin King, 26, of Hamburg was arrested about 9 p.m. Thursday at a suburban restaurant, where he had arranged to meet an Internet acquaintance he thought was a 14-year-old boy.

The acquaintance, who had agreed to bring along a friend, was actually an undercover FBI agent.

When authorities asked King what he would have done had two boys arrived at the restaurant, King replied, "I hope nothing would have happened," Assistant U.S. Attorney Allison Gioia said.

But King later acknowledged that it was not the first such meeting he had arranged, and that he had engaged in sexual activity with a 16-year-old boy he met on the Internet in a park and in his apartment, Gioia said. Other scheduled meetings never came to fruition, King told authorities, because the minors did not show up or the meeting location was fictitious.

He was charged with one count of attempted enticement of a minor to engage in criminal sexual activity.

King denied having inappropriate contact with any of his students at Blasdell Elementary School, where he taught fourth grade, or members of a Cub Scout den _ a group of young Boy Scouts _ he led.

He was suspended from the Boy Scout program pending resolution of the charge, said Pat Coviello, executive director for the Greater Niagara Frontier Council of the Boy Scouts.

In addition to being a den leader, King was a paid staff member at the Boy Scout's Scouthaven camp for Scouts in grades one through five, Coviello said.

King, who passed a criminal background check and "youth protection training" required of all staff members, appeared to be "a professional, well-intentioned person," Coviello said.

"That's the shocking thing, is that there had been, over the years, no issues, no concerns, nothing that we were aware of or anything like this brought forward," Coviello said.

A woman who answered the phone at Blasdell Elementary School said officials would have no comment and hung up.

At an initial appearance Friday in U.S. District Court, King was ordered held pending an appearance Feb. 6. Gioia requested that King be detained as a danger to the community and a flight risk.

If convicted, he could be sentenced to between five and 30 years in prison.

Identity Fraud Has Dropped Since 2003, Survey Shows (NYT)

By John Leland

The number of Americans who are victims of identity fraud has declined steadily since 2003, according to a new survey sponsored by credit-card and financial services companies. Last year, 3.7 percent of people surveyed said someone had stolen their identity in the previous 12 months, down from 4.7 percent in 2003, according to the report.

The study found that the total losses from the crime fell last year to $49 billion from the 2005 level of $56 billion. The thieves either used the victims' existing bank or credit card accounts or opened new ones.

The survey, based on telephone interviews with 5,000 adults, was conducted by Javelin Strategy & Research, a data research firm, and was sponsored by Visa, Wells Fargo and CheckFree. The margin of sampling error is below plus or minus one percentage point for the crimes' prevalence.

The findings contradict public perceptions that identity fraud is proliferating out of control, said James Van Dyke, president and founder of Javelin. "For years identity fraud has been reported as the nation's fastest growing crime, with the assumption that the numbers would keep going up," Mr. Van Dyke said. "We find it's not the case. The trend is going down."

Because the survey relied on people's accounts of whether they had been victims, it does not measure "synthetic identity theft," in which criminals fabricate identities using names, addresses, Social Security numbers and other information that may or may or may not correspond to real people. A 2005 analysis by ID Analytics, a financial industry security firm, found that synthetic identity theft was more common than "true-name" identity theft.

As in past years, the Javelin survey found that individuals whose identities were stolen bore less than 10 percent of the loss from the crimes.

Young adults, ages 18 to 24, were the most likely to say they were victims, and the least likely to take precautions to prevent identity fraud like shredding documents and using computer firewall protections, the study found. People with high incomes were more likely to say they had been victims than were people with low incomes.

The survey did not study why the numbers were dropping, but Mr. Van Dyke attributed the declines to both greater consumer awareness and better prevention efforts by banks and credit card companies.

Edmund Mierzwinski, consumer program director at the United States Public Interest Research Group, a nonprofit group, said the report underplayed the effects of recent state legislation, which the financial services industry has largely resisted. The protections include requirements that companies notify people whose personal information has been compromised, and laws enabling people to freeze their credit reports.

“Financial companies don’t want new regulations,” Mr. Mierzwinski said. “We think we need new regulations. The reason consumers are paying more attention to identity theft is that many are getting breach notices.”

He added, “From our perspective the decline is a good thing, but it’s still affecting many millions of Americans. The cost to victims remains very high in terms of lost time and frustration.”

Homicides Weigh On Confirmation For Chief Lanier (WT)

By Daniel Taylor

A recent series of homicides will provide an early test for acting Metropolitan Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier as she faces D.C. Council confirmation hearings scheduled for next month, say some residents and council members.

"I certainly think the way a city responds to a spike in homicides is an important indicator," said council member Phil Mendelson, at-large Democrat and chairman of the Committee on Public Safety and the Judiciary, which will hold the hearing. "It gives important insight into how the new administration will deal with violent crimes."

The number of homicides this year in the District as of yesterday was 17, the same as last year at this time. Among them was the series of four killings in less than five hours the weekend of Jan. 27-28. Police have made an arrest in one of the cases, and Chief Lanier announced initiatives to aggressively canvass neighborhoods in the 48 hours after a homicide and to target violent criminals wanted on fugitive warrants.

Mayor Adrian M. Fenty, a Democrat, replaced Chief Charles H. Ramsey shortly after being elected in November, in part to implement more community policing in the department, which has 3,800 officers and a budget of about $430 million. Chief Lanier officially took over Jan. 2.

Mary Cheh, Ward 3 Democrat, said she was "excited" about Chief Lanier's appointment, but added she has some issues that need to be addressed.

"I expressed some concerns [to her] that I had about the department," Mrs. Cheh said. "So when she comes up for confirmation, there's a number of things I want to talk to her about."

Mrs. Cheh said she doesn't think violent crimes such as assaults and robberies get enough attention. She said if they did, the death last year of journalist David E. Rosenbaum -- killed by two men suspected of committing a violent robbery and assault two months before -- might have been prevented.

"I'm just not happy now with how the department is run," Mrs. Cheh said. "and I'm hoping she's going to change some things."

She plans to ask Chief Lanier, a 16-year veteran and former commander of the department's Special Operations Division, about her role in handling mass demonstrations. During protests in September 2002, hundreds of demonstrators and several bystanders were swept up in mass arrests, cuffed hand to ankle and detained at the department's training academy for several hours.

Since her nomination on Nov. 20, Chief Lanier has attended community meetings in every quadrant of the city and has pledged to improve the relationship between police and the neighborhoods they patrol, assign investigations to field teams and improve communication in the department.

However, Leroy Thorpe, a former advisory neighborhood commissioner in Ward 2, thinks the new chief has not done enough.

"She hasn't gone out in the community to meet with the players in the community," said Mr. Thorpe, who plans to testify at the hearings. "Ramsey was a people person. I don't think this woman is going to be a people person."

Despite the criticism, Chief Lanier appears to have the support of most of the D.C. Council members.

Ward 1 Democrat Jim Graham called her a "superb selection."

"Here's someone who came right up the ranks, totally engaged from Day One," he said. "She's been through the fire, and she's come out on top."

If the judiciary panel votes to recommend Chief Lanier, her nomination will go before the full council. If the committee votes against her, the mayor must either send down another nominee or seek to dislodge her nomination from the committee.

DOJ_NMG_0128197

Council member Marion Barry, Ward 8 Democrat, said he also supports the nomination.

"I'm very impressed," Mr. Barry said. "I think she's going to make a good chief."

Nominees for police chief typically face little opposition in the council. Only serious questions about the candidate's character or ability to do the job tend to derail an appointment.

"Unless I have very strong objections to individual appointees, I tend to let the captain pick his crew," said council member Carol Schwartz, at-large Republican.

Marion Barry Faces Possible Prison Time (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

D.C. Council member Marion Barry (D-Ward 8) is back in trouble with federal authorities over his income taxes.

Nearly a year after he agreed to follow the law and pay overdue taxes dating back several years, the former four-term mayor has not only flouted a plea agreement but has failed to file tax returns for 2005, prosecutors say.

Now, the U.S. attorney's office, which did not oppose probation for Barry when he was sentenced in March, wants the federal judge in the case to put him in prison.

"The Court's patience should be at an end," Assistant U.S. Attorneys James W. Cooper and Thomas E. Zeno wrote in a motion to Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson, adding that Barry "continues to flout" city and federal tax laws.

Under sentencing guidelines, Barry could have faced 12 to 18 months in prison for failure to file a federal income tax return and failure to make a District of Columbia return. Now that prison time could be back on the table if the judge decides that Barry isn't living up to his agreement with prosecutors and his promises to the court.

And that may only be the beginning of his problems in the case. In November, the Internal Revenue Service began garnishing Barry's city council salary because he failed to follow through with a payment plan for the taxes he owed for years 1999 through 2004.

Barry, 70, did not return calls seeking comment.

Frederick D. Cooke Jr., Barry's attorney, said that he has not talked to his client about the problem with his 2005 taxes. But Cooke said he expects to file court papers challenging the prosecutors' bid to revoke Barry's probation. Cooke said he expected a hearing in the next month.

The filings make clear that prosecutors are tired of Barry's promises. He paid $1,000 toward his tax debts in July, and his accountant expressed a willingness to establish a payment plan, an IRS agent said in an affidavit filed by prosecutors in U.S. District Court. But at another meeting in September, Barry's accountant talked about submitting amended returns along with the payment schedule.

Barry has yet to act, the agent, Don M. Sender, said in his affidavit.

Details about the latest tax dispute were first reported by CNN.

Why Barry failed to file federal or local income tax returns for 2005 is unclear. The prosecutors do not allege that he failed to pay taxes for 2005 -- without returns, it would be difficult if not impossible to determine if he paid enough to cover whatever would be owed for that year through payroll deductions. Prosecutors said Barry sought an extension in filing the federal income tax return that was due last April 15; the IRS gave him until Oct. 15, to no avail.

Barry now is facing hearings in two courthouses. Just last week, he was in D. C. Superior Court dealing with other legal entanglements.

Stopped by police twice last year in the District, he faces several charges, including driving under the influence in connection with the first stop, in September in Northwest Washington. At a court hearing, a judge set a June 12 date for a trial on the traffic charges after Cooke made it clear that Barry does not believe he did anything wrong and is not prepared to plead guilty to any of the charges.

It is in federal court, though, where Barry faces the most serious potential consequences.

Even before these latest revelations, Barry had stumbled in the tax case. Soon after pleading guilty to the misdemeanor tax charges in October 2005, he tested positive in a court-required drug screening for cocaine and marijuana. Then he waited until just before sentencing to contact the IRS about repayment, upsetting the judge as well as the prosecution. But prosecutors stuck to terms of the plea agreement, and the judge sentenced Barry to three years' probation.

Paying the back taxes was a key condition. How much he owes has not been publicly disclosed. Barry earned more than $530,000 in the period from 1999 through 2004.

D.C. Council members earn $92,500 a year.

In its filing, the government notes Barry's stature as a public figure in the District. "A longtime elected official who has been responsible for spending public funds collected from District of Columbia taxpayers, the defendant chose not to file his own tax returns for six years," Cooper and Zeno write.

With Probation At Risk, Barry To Meet Attorney (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

The defense attorney for D.C. Council member Marion Barry said yesterday that he is meeting with the former mayor this week to decide how best to respond to a recent request by federal prosecutors to revoke Mr. Barry's probation in a criminal tax case.

If the motion is granted, the revocation could put Mr. Barry back behind bars more than 15 years after he served six months on drug charges.

"Just because they write it doesn't mean it's true," attorney Frederick D. Cooke Jr. said of the court filing last week in which prosecutors stated that Mr. Barry had failed to pay his 2005 taxes.

Mr. Barry received three years of probation last year after pleading guilty to failing to file returns on more than $500,000 in income from 1999 to 2004.

"I haven't had a chance to draft a response because I have to talk to my client and gather information," Mr. Cooke said.

In exchange for the guilty plea, prosecutors last year agreed to take no position on Mr. Barry's request for probation at his sentencing last year.

Now, prosecutors say, Mr. Barry hasn't lived up to his end of the deal.

In addition to failing to pay D.C. or federal income taxes in 2005, Mr. Barry also hasn't made plans to pay off prior years' tax debt stemming from the criminal tax case, the government memo states.

Mr. Barry's office did not return phone calls yesterday.

Former U.S. Attorney Joseph diGenova said yesterday that Mr. Barry almost certainly will be called to testify about whether he failed to pay his taxes.

Mr. diGenova said the government's latest request isn't out of the ordinary.

"It would be standard practice for the government to file such a pleading when someone had failed to comply with the terms of their probation," he said. "The courts expect the government to do this when they come into possession of knowledge that a court order, which is what probation is, has been violated."

It will be up to U.S. Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson to decide whether to revoke Mr. Barry's probation.

"This is an elected public official, who has a higher duty of compliance than an ordinary citizen," Mr. diGenova said.

Prosecutors argued in their memo last week that Mr. Barry has shown "unworthiness to reap the benefits of a lenient sanction."

The prosecutors also called his failure to pay his taxes the latest in a series of "willful acts in defiance of the tax laws." They said Mr. Barry's actions violate his probation.

Mr. Barry had asked the Internal Revenue Service for an extension to allow him to file his return by Oct. 15, according to court records. However, no return had been filed as of last week, according to an affidavit submitted by an IRS special agent.

"The court's patience should be at an end," the prosecutors wrote. "A longtime elected official who has been responsible for spending public funds collected from District of Columbia taxpayers, the defendant chose not to file his own return for six years."

The IRS began garnishing Mr. Barry's paycheck in November.

CIVIL LAW:

Jury Finds FBI Retaliated Against Agent, Awards Her $565,000 (AP)

MINNEAPOLIS - A jury awarded $565,000 in damages on Monday to a former FBI agent, agreeing that Jane Turner's superiors retaliated against her for filing a sex-discrimination complaint against her supervisor.

"Today is a true vindication for whistleblowers in the FBI," Turner said after the jury returned its verdict in federal court.

Turner retired in 2003, amid the pressure of both her discrimination case and a separate dispute that arose after she accused colleagues of stealing a Tiffany crystal globe from the World Trade Center ruins.

The jury awarded her $60,000 in damages for lost wages and $505,000 for emotional distress. One of her attorneys, Robert Hill, said the judge will have to reduce the $505,000 to $300,000 because of a statutory cap on nonmonetary damages, so she'll get $360,000.

Still, Hill said, it's believed to be the largest jury verdict for retaliation in the history of the FBI.

Members of the six-woman, four-man jury expressed strong admiration for Turner afterward. Several gathered around and embraced her. Some had tears in their eyes.

"I just want to tell you I have nothing but the utmost respect for you," juror Renee Anderle said.

Deliberations took a half-day Thursday, all day Friday and half the day Monday.

The defense team's jury consultant, Nikki Carlson, said it was clear that the jury didn't buy the government's defense, which attacked Turner's credibility and job performance. She said one juror told her that the two jurors seated either side of her wrote "LIAR" on their notepads and stopped taking notes when one of Turner's superiors was testifying.

Spokespeople for the FBI and U.S. attorney's office did not immediately return phone calls seeking comment.

Over her 25-year FBI career, Turner was credited with solving some horrifying child-sex abuse and murder cases on North Dakota Indian reservations. She also helped capture Christopher Boyce, a Soviet spy portrayed in the 1985 movie "The Falcon and the Snowman."

Records show Turner was rated superior or exceptional in her job reviews until she filed a sex discrimination complaint against her supervisor, Craig Welken.

Turner said Monday that her initial Equal Employment Opportunity complaint was relatively minor. She recalled that it alleged female agents in the FBI's Minneapolis division, which covers Minnesota and the Dakotas, were being given lower ratings that male agents, and that she herself was not getting equal respect, among other things.

That case was separate from one still pending before the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General. She noticed a Tiffany globe paperweight on a secretary's desk in the Minneapolis FBI office and, after learning it came from Ground Zero, reported it to the inspector general. The FBI then began moves to fire her.

That case had been on hold pending a resolution of this case, Turner said, and she hopes the inspector general takes note that her jury didn't believe the government's claims.

Turner said the FBI's treatment of her had had a "chilling effect" on other agents, and that she'd received several congratulatory calls Monday from current FBI employees, after eight years of getting little support from her colleagues.

"I guess they maybe had a sense that it was OK to poke their heads up and say they did support me," she said.

Ex-agent Wins Lawsuit Against FBI (MINNST)

By Dan Browning

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 6, 2007

Jurors said the FBI retaliated against the female agent, who filed a discrimination complaint in 1998.

Federal jurors hugged former FBI agent Jane Turner on Monday after awarding her $565,000 in damages and finding that the agency had retaliated against her for filing a 1998 sex-discrimination complaint.

"I think you were the very best FBI agent," juror Mashima Dickens told Turner, who investigated child sex-abuse crimes. "Looking at the way you were treated, I just said you were screwed left and right," Dickens said, tears rolling down her cheeks.

"I just want to tell you I have nothing but the utmost respect for you," juror Renee Anderle said as she hugged Turner in the hallway outside Chief U.S. District Judge James Rosenbaum's courtroom in Minneapolis.

"This is vindication," said Turner, 55, of St. Paul. "We spoke truth to power, and we won."

But Turner said she could never repair the damage done to her by her colleagues in the FBI, an organization she had dreamed of joining since she read Nancy Drew detective novels at age 12.

"I'm dead in their eyes because I betrayed them. And that's what's so sad," Turner said.

The government's attorneys declined to comment on the verdict in the trial, which began Jan. 24.

Stephen Kohn, one of Turner's attorneys and president of the National Whistleblower Center in Washington, called it historic. "I think it's the largest jury verdict in a civil rights case against the FBI for an individual plaintiff," he said.

The jury of six women and four men awarded Turner damages of $60,000 in lost wages and $505,000 for emotional distress, loss of reputation and similar injuries.

Rosenbaum will reduce the non-wage damages to the statutory limit of $300,000, said Robert Hill, of Eden Prairie, another of Turner's attorneys.

Turner had a noteworthy career. After joining the FBI in 1978, she helped capture Christopher Boyce, a Soviet spy, and solved some horrendous child-sex abuse and murder cases on North Dakota Indian reservations.

Records show that she received superior or exceptional job ratings until after her supervisor, Craig Welken, was interviewed in 1999 about a sex-discrimination complaint she had filed the previous year. Her ratings plummeted, which led to a transfer from Minot, N.D., to a desk job in Minneapolis.

Jurors decided that the negative job reviews were retaliation for filing the internal discrimination complaint, but that the transfer was not.

About a month after Turner filed the complaint against Welken, a task force was being formed to investigate a child pornographer who had confessed in an Internet chat room to murdering his 7-year-old daughter. The killer, Larry Froistad, recanted his confession, and the U.S. attorney in North Dakota at the time, the late John Schneider, wanted Turner's help. Welken resisted initially, but said he gave in because Schneider was "unrelenting."

Schneider later credited Turner in an e-mail with solving the Froistad case.

Martha Fagg, one of two assistant U.S. attorneys from Iowa who represented the FBI, argued that Turner had basically stopped working after the Froistad case, and that the transfer to Minneapolis was designed to help her get back on track.

"In my opinion, she was using the EEO [Equal Employment Opportunity] process not as a shield, but as a sword," Fagg said.

However, Turner's attorneys introduced evidence that she kept up her casework and solved some especially tough cases while she was being downgraded on her reviews. Two assistant U.S. attorneys testified that they never saw Turner slack off.

Turner's attorneys plan to file for compensation. Kohn said the final bill will be "well over $1 million to taxpayers in a case that should have been resolved at a fraction of the cost years ago."

Turner still has a complaint pending against the FBI with the U.S. inspector general's office. She reported that a fellow agent had brought back memorabilia from the World Trade Center in Manhattan after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Turner said she was being run out of the FBI after that, so she retired in 2003.

Trial Starts In Collins' Air Crash (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, February 6, 2007

Nearly seven years to the day after a midair collision killed WGN radio personality Bob Collins and two others, a trial opened in federal court Monday to decide who was at fault for the crash of the two small aircraft.

Government lawyers laid the blame on Collins, while attorneys for the three victims said the collision was caused by an air traffic controller and was ultimately the responsibility of the Federal Aviation Administration.

Collins, 57, had been Chicago's top-ranked morning-radio personality for 14 years when his Moravan Z242L struck a Cessna 172P as the two aircraft approached the Waukegan Regional Airport on the hazy afternoon of Feb. 8, 2000.

Collins' plane crashed onto the roof of the Midwestern Regional Medical Center, killing him and passenger Herman Luscher, 58. The Cessna's pilot, Sharon Hock, 31, a flight attendant who was on her second solo flight, died when her plane crashed on a Zion street.

No one on the ground was injured, but the hospital sustained $28 million in property damage and lost business.

The bench trial before U.S. District Judge John Darrah, expected to last about two weeks, opened with the federal government as the lone defendant after Midwest Air Traffic Control Inc., which operates the Waukegan airport's tower, admitted liability Monday.

But lawyers for survivors of the three victims, including Collins' widow, Christine, contend the FAA controlled the Waukegan airport's operations and bears the responsibility for the collision.

In opening remarks, attorney Kevin Durkin, who represents Collins' estate, said air traffic controller Gregory Fowler failed to properly sequence the planes on their approach to the airfield and made other errors.

For years, Durkin said, the Waukegan airfield was mistakenly left off an FAA list of airports that qualified for radar.

The FAA had radar installed in the Waukegan tower after the collision because of political pressure following Collins' death, Durkin said. Another factor, he said: After the crash, Bulls great Michael Jordan wouldn't fly into Waukegan in his personal jet without the airfield equipped with radar.

Robert Clifford, another Collins attorney, said an economic expert hired by the plaintiffs estimates Collins would have earned more than $20 million if he hadn't perished in the crash. He disputed that Collins had planned to retire when his five-year contract was to expire 2004.

"Next to the Cubs, Bob personified WGN and was the heart and soul of WGN," Clifford said.

WGN is owned by Tribune Co., which also owns the Chicago Tribune.

Jill Dahlmann Rosa, a Justice Department lawyer, said Collins set up the collision by misreporting his location to the tower, misleading Hock and the air traffic controller.

Collins' conduct "fell below the standard of care of a reasonable pilot," she said.

Rosa also maintained that Collins failed to report his diabetes to the FAA and that it "impaired his ability to see and evaluate the threat and react accordingly."

Rosa scoffed at the lack of radar playing a part in the collision, saying the Waukegan airfield has low levels of activity and that thousands of small airports operate even without air traffic controllers and have no problems.

Voting Rights Expert Won't Testify In Noxubee County Election Dispute Case (JCL)

By Jimmie E. Gates

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, February 6, 2007

The Noxubee County case has apparently ended without court resuming after the defense decided against calling an expert witness to testify.

An out-of-state voting rights expert had been scheduled to testify Feb. 15.

The lawsuit, the first of its kind in the United States filed by the U.S. Department of Justice, accuses black political leaders in Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters.

The three-week trial in U.S. District Court concluded last Wednesday, with the exception of the expert coming to Jackson to testify.

The Justice Department's lawsuit mostly accuses Noxubee County Democratic Committee Chairman Ike Brown and people working in concert with him of discriminating against white voters.

U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee set March 26 as the deadline for both sides to submit final written briefs in the case. He will then make a ruling after that time.

FBI To Share Progress On Race Crimes, Including Moore's Ford (ATHBH)

By Rebecca Quigley

Athens Banner-Herald, February 6, 2007

FBI officials will announce this month how they will proceed with more than 50 unsolved, racially motivated murders - including the 1946 lynchings of two couples in Walton County.

A mob of more than a dozen white men killed Roger and Dorothy Malcom and George and Mae Murray Dorsey near Moore's Ford Bridge on July 25, 1946, days after Roger Malcom fought with a white man.

Since 1997, a committee of locals, with the support of the Georgia Association of Black Elected Officials, have called for state and federal investigators to reopen the 60-year-old case while some of the suspects still are alive.

FBI officials will hold a news conference later this month to give an update on the bureau's so-called "cold case initiative" in the Moore's Ford lynching and 51 other unsolved race-related murders, said Nancy Nelson, section chief of the public corruption/civil rights section of the FBI's Criminal Investigation Division.

The bureau has been reviewing the cold cases to see if new technology, such as DNA testing, and a new willingness by witnesses to come forward, will allow federal and state agents to give some conclusion to the decades-old and often forgotten murders, Nelson said.

"If we can get prosecutions out of it, terrific," but agents mostly are seeking resolution for the victims' families, she said.

FBI officials have not yet set a date for the announcement, Nelson said.

In 2005, the Moore's Ford Memorial Committee sent letters to several members of Congress, including Sen. Arlen Specter, member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, urging them to ask the FBI to "assign two agents to (the Moore's Ford) case to review existing evidence and actively pursue new leads."

The letter helped spur the FBI to review nearly 40 unsolved race-related cases.

Last year, the U.S. Senate established a new division in the Department of Justice that was tasked with investigating those decades-old, unsolved racial murders.

While members of the Moore's Ford group aren't sure if media attention on the case or recent re-enactments of the crime prompted legislation, the advocacy committee's letter likely influenced the FBI to re-evaluate the Moore's Ford case and other unsolved cases, said Rich Rusk, the committee's secretary.

The committee also sent a letter to FBI officials asking agents to reopen the case.

"The letter certainly proved useful in bringing the case to the forefront," said Stephen Emmett, spokesman for the FBI office in Atlanta.

When the FBI originally investigated the murders, there were as many as 55 suspects, but no one was arrested or charged in connection with the case.

White Supremacist Activity In US Flourishes, Fueled By Anti-immigrant Sentiments (FINDLAW/AP)

By Erin Texeira, Ap National Writer

AP, February 6, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-Huge street protests against tougher immigration laws made millions of immigrants more visible and powerful in the United States last year, but, according to some rights groups, they seem to have revived a hateful counter force: white supremacists.

Groups linked to the Ku Klux Klan, skinheads and neo-Nazis grew significantly more active, holding more rallies, distributing leaflets and increasing their presence on the Internet - much of it focused on stirring anti-immigrant sentiment, a new report released by the Anti-Defamation League says.

"Extremist groups are good at seizing on whatever the hot button is of the day and twisting the message to get new members," Deborah M. Lauter, ADL Civil Rights director, said Monday. "This one seems to be taking hold with more of mainstream America than we'd like to see."

Old Klan chapters have been revived and new ones started throughout the South, historically the heart of the group, and in other places such as Michigan, Iowa and New Jersey, says the report, which was scheduled for official release Tuesday.

Last May in Alabama, an anti-immigration rally included slogans such as, "Let's get rid of the Mexicans!" according to the document, titled "Ku Klux Klan Rebounds."

"The Klan is increasingly cooperating with other extremist groups and Neo-Nazi groups," Lauter said. "That's a new phenomenon."

Between 2000 and 2005, hate groups mushroomed 33 percent and Klan chapters by 63 percent, according to Mark Potok, director of the Southern Poverty Law Center, which tracks hate crimes.

Precise data are difficult to pin down, but Potok's group counts as many as 150 Klan chapters with up to 8,000 members across the United States, still well below a peak of 4 million in the 1920s. More than 800 hate groups exist around the country, Southern Poverty research shows.

In the late 1990s, memberships in such groups was crumbling as they lost leaders and struggled to organize, said Brian Levin, director of the Center for the Study of Hate and Extremism at California State University, San Bernardino. Many hit bottom around 2000.

"Whenever you think the Klan is down and out, they find another way to reinvent themselves," he said of the recent resurgence.

Historically, the Klan's focus had been to terrorize African-Americans - through race riots, lynchings and other killings - but it reached its highest membership in the 1920s by focusing on immigration.

Newcomers from Ireland and Germany were portrayed as Catholic usurpers invading the United States, taking jobs from native-born Americans and undermining national fabric, Levin said.

Said Potok: "It's remarkable to look back at the nativist sentiments toward Catholics - it's very similar to what we're seeing with Mexicans now."

Today, many white supremacists blame immigrants, particularly Hispanics, for crime, struggling schools or unemployment, for instance. With many Americans already divided on how to revamp laws and practices to address the nation's swelling immigrant communities, immigration "is an issue that works for hate groups," Potok said.

Some Latinos are feeling the effects firsthand. Last September, a Kentucky family originally from El Salvador found a wooden cross burning on their front lawn just weeks after they moved in. Earlier last year, a Latino teenager in Houston was brutally beaten and sodomized while one attacker screamed "White Power!" The victim barely survived, and one attacker was sentenced to life in prison.

"I've been doing (Hispanic advocacy work) for a long, long time and the atmosphere has never been as poisonous as it has been in the last few years," said Lisa Navarrete, a vice president at the National Council of La Raza. "The level of vitriol is new."

U.S. Civil Rights Group Calls For Warrant Limits After Police Kill Elderly Woman (FINDLAW/AP)

By Doug Gross, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 6, 2007

(AP) - ATLANTA-A local chapter of a U.S. civil rights group on Monday called on police and politicians to limit the use of "no-knock" warrants in the wake of the death of an elderly woman shot by police during such a search.

The Rev. R.L. White, Jr., chapter president for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, unveiled a list of recommendations the group compiled after a December community forum prompted by the shooting.

"This is of utmost urgency," said White, speaking at the chapter's Atlanta headquarters. "The situation that happened last year was only the tip of the iceberg."

The NAACP chapter also called on police to require officers to receive sensitivity training, for the Atlanta Police Department to launch a goodwill initiative in the city's low-income, high-crime neighborhoods and for a citizens review board to be created to review incidents like the Nov. 21 shooting.

Kathryn Johnston died and three officers were wounded in the shootout during a no-knock search for drugs in Johnston's northwest Atlanta home. Family members say Johnston was 92 years old; authorities said she was 88.

When officers raided her home without first announcing their presence, police say Johnston fired a handgun before officers returned fire, killing her.

Narcotics officers said they were told by a paid informant that cocaine was being sold from Johnston's home.

No cocaine was found in the home, and a man who claims he was the paid informant later said he was told by officers to lie about buying drugs at the home.

The FBI and Georgia Bureau of investigation are investigating the incident at the request of Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington.

The NAACP recommendations call for police to conduct advance surveillance of homes where they plan to use no-knock warrants. They also suggest that judges reserve the warrants for extreme cases.

"I commend the NAACP for their input and involvement on how the Atlanta Police Department conducts business," Pennington said in a statement. "Even though we are currently reviewing our internal policies and procedures, I do not oppose any measure that will strengthen our relationship with the community. I look forward to working together to reclaim the public's trust in our hard-working men and women."

White said the suggestions will be delivered to Mayor Shirley Franklin, Atlanta's city council and Georgia Supreme Court Chief Justice Leah Ward Sears.

Cheapening A Fight Against Hatred (WP)

By Richard Cohen

I started writing a column for The Post in 1976. It was about local affairs, and so it took me about a year to write my first column about anti-Semitism. Since then, I have written about 90 more, most of them full-throated condemnations of the hatred that killed fully one-third of all Jews during my own lifetime. So it comes as a surprise that has the force of a mugging to be accused of aiding the very people I so hate -- of being an abettor of something called "The New Anti-Semitism."

The accusation comes from the pen of Indiana University's Alvin H. Rosenfeld, whose report " 'Progressive' Jewish Thought and the New Anti-Semitism" was published by the prestigious American Jewish Committee and given great play in the New York Times. Certain prominent American Jews -- the historian Tony Judt, the playwright Tony Kushner, the poet Adrienne Rich and I, among others -- were charged with aiding anti-Semitism with our writings. We were, in other words, enablers. As if that was not bad enough, Shulamit Reinharz, a Brandeis University professor and a columnist for a Jewish weekly, dispensed totally with Rosenfeld's qualification. She told the Boston Globe that all of us mentioned in the AJC report are just plain anti-Semites.

Among the first to call me after the Times piece appeared was the AJC itself. It apologized. It did not mean to include me with the others, and it would, its representative told me, soon set matters straight. It issued a news release saying that Rosenfeld's characterization of me does "not reflect the totality of [my] occasional writings on the Middle East." My "occasional writings" include at least 30 datelined columns from the region and a near-obsessive attention to the subject. The diligent can find the AJC statement on the Internet and the reference to me in paragraph 10, a parenthetical phrase of near-microscopic prominence. Oddly, it has not had the same impact as the Times story.

Let me take some responsibility. At times, I have written coldly and provocatively about Israel, maybe once or twice in anger. This, in turn, has angered some readers who knew what I was thinking but not what I was feeling -- that, at bottom, I had a strong emotional attachment to Israel. It is a country whose survival is not only important for the Jewish people but for the rest of mankind as well. I can enumerate many reasons why I support Israel -- it's a legitimate state, a real democracy, etc. But it is also where Jews went to escape the killers; to ignore that is to extinguish the twin lights of morality and memory and leave the world even darker than it now is.

But having said that, let me wonder about those American Jews who interpret criticism of Israel as anti-Semitism or something that abets it. The charge has been leveled at Jimmy Carter over his recent book, "Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid." I, too, didn't like the book. I, too, found the book hostile, oddly unbalanced and chillingly lacking in historical context -- not just a near-total neglect of the Holocaust but also no mention of pre-1948 Arab pogroms, such as the 1929 murder of 67 Jews in Hebron. Still, Carter's overall point about Israeli occupation of the West Bank is apt, and calling him all sorts of names does not change that. The former president has in effect embraced the current, ahistorical context for Israel. For many, it is no longer the orphaned waif of the Holocaust but the bastard child of Western colonialism.

Rosenfeld is surely right about one thing: It's astonishing that in the 60 years since the Nazi extermination camps were liberated, anti-Semitism has revived and thrived. Still, it hardly makes sense to fight it by promiscuously throwing around the word "anti-Semite" so that it loses its punch or to flay Jewish critics of Israel. I strongly disagree with some of these critics and find some of their views obnoxious, but if somehow an anti-Semite finds common ground with them, that is hardly their fault -- and certainly not their intent. After all, anti-Semites do not concern themselves merely with Israel. They hate all Jews no matter where they may be.

It's sad that the American Jewish Committee commissioned and published Rosenfeld's report. I can't imagine what good will come out of it. Instead, it has given license to the most intolerant and narrow-minded of Israel's defenders so that, as the AJC concedes in my case, any veering from orthodoxy is met with censure or, from someone like Reinharz, the most powerful of all post-Holocaust condemnations -- anti-Semite -- is diluted beyond recognition. The offense here is not just to a handful of relatively unimportant writers, but to memory itself.

SMITHFIELD, Va. (AP) -- Smithfield Foods Inc. said Monday it has complied with a Department of Justice antitrust division request for information related to the pork processor's acquisition of rival Premium Standard Farms Inc.

Smithfield said it plans to acquire the pork producer for $674 million in cash and stock and assume $117 million in debt.

Smithfield said it hopes the antitrust division can complete its review in enough time for the deal to close in the first quarter of 2007.

A Premium Standard Farms shareholders meeting has been scheduled for Feb. 23 to vote on the deal.

Smithfield Foods shares fell 25 cents to close at $26.13 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Companies Are Trying To Beat The Antitrust Clock (DEAL)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell, The Deal

The Deal, February 6, 2007

Companies trying to hasten the antitrust reviews of their deals are increasingly deciding to hit the reset button on the regulatory clock, a maneuver aimed at saving time and money on government reviews.

Although the strategy is becoming increasingly popular, it's not a sure thing.

Two recent deals indicate that refiling produces mixed results.

Express Scripts Inc. Wednesday announced it was pulling and refiling its premerger notification, in the hope of evading a second request from the Federal Trade Commission regarding its hostile bid for rival pharmacy benefit manager Caremark Inc. But Genentech Inc., which earlier pulled and refiled its paperwork regarding its purchase of Tanox Inc., announced Monday it will have to comply with a longer, costly review.

While the government hasn't historically kept track of corporate decisions to pull and refile merger notices, it is starting to, and on Wednesday a Department of Justice official said those corporate moves to pull and refile seem be increasing. About two-thirds of those cases have successfully skirted a government demand for documents and data, known as a second request for information.

The process of notifying the government's antitrust agency of merger plans and getting approval to proceed despite competitive issues has become an increasingly elaborate dance under the rubric of the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antirust Improvements Act of 1976.

Tom Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the antirust division at DOJ, and FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras have both repeatedly said they are trying to minimize the cost and time burden of the merger review process, and that as a part of that effort, both agencies are aggressively examining deals during the initial 30 days they are permitted to look over a deal before having to issue a second request.

But sometimes, one month just isn't enough for antitrust lawyers to collect, review, deliver and explain the data fast enough. During that same time, staff lawyers at the agencies also need to review information that may include sophisticated economic data, consider the implications and evaluate the merger's competitive impact in industries that may be new, arcane or rapidly evolving.

As a result, the staff decision to issue a second request for information can prolong the review, and dramatically increase the price tag on the merger review process.

But a second request may not mean the government is really interested in blocking the deal. During the past seven years, 265 cases at DOJ received second requests, according to Bob Kramer, a senior staff official, but only 104 of those cases saw enforcement actions, such as consent decrees involving divestitures or licensing agreements. And only four of those cases actually proceeded to trial.

The cost of the review isn't chicken feed. Merging parties pay $1 million to $20 million for antitrust scrutiny, which varies based on the size of a deal, the nature of the markets involved, the scope of the overlapping product markets and the speed at which the parties submit the data, but on average runs about $10 million per party, according to antitrust lawyers.

Armed with the knowledge that the government is more likely to resolve the matter without action, and in an effort to hasten the process cost-effectively, private-firm antitrust lawyers have sought to increase the time of a review without forcing the government to issue a second request -- hence, the increase in the pull and refile maneuver.

In addition to pulling and refiling -- which can be done once without repaying fees and is sometimes done twice, doubling the fee cost but still avoiding the need to respond to a second request -- lawyers are trying to get ahead of the game.

Antitrust lawyers may enter discussions with agency staff to discuss issues or parse data about a deal even before the official merger notification paperwork is filed, and antitrust lawyers in Washington say it's often a good tactic to help staff narrow the focus to the critical competitive issues of a merger.

The FTC did not immediately provide any statistics on how often the process is successfully used.

F.T.C. Reaffirms Rambus Antitrust Ruling (AP)

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 5 (AP) — The Federal Trade Commission made final its ruling that the memory chip designer Rambus violated antitrust laws, imposing limits on the royalties the company can charge.

Wall Street was bracing for a potentially harsher order than the one the commission released Monday, and Rambus stock rose sharply.

Still, the final opinion provides the sharpest criticism to date of Rambus, and legal experts said it would set an important precedent for the broader technology industry.

The order said Rambus violated federal antitrust laws “by deliberately engaging in a pattern of anticompetitive acts to deceive an industrywide standard-setting organization.”

Thomas R. Lavelle, senior vice president and general counsel for Rambus, said the company was disappointed with the opinion and would appeal.

The case hinges on whether Rambus illegally obtained a monopoly in the 1990s when it secured patents for two popular types of memory used in personal computers. Rambus was accused of failing to disclose to an engineering council that its patents had been incorporated into an industry standard regarding memory technology.

An administrative law judge dismissed the complaint in 2004, but the F.T.C. overturned that ruling in July 2006.

Rambus, which is based in Los Altos, Calif., insisted for years that it disclosed the patents to the memory makers, Micron Technology and Hitachi, before the standards-setting discussions began. Rambus lawyers also argued that disclosure policies of the council, the JEDEC Solid State Technology Association, failed to specify what Rambus should have revealed to the committee.

On Monday, the commission required the company to hire an agency-approved compliance officer to ensure that its patents and patent applications "are disclosed to industry standard-setting bodies in which it participates."

The nearly five-year-old case has battered Rambus's shares for several years. News of the ruling sent the shares surging 24 percent, up $4.58, to $23.50 on Nasdaq.

Daniel I. Prywes, a lawyer at Bryan Cave in Washington, said the ruling set a precedent for the commission's handling of cases involving standards-setting organizations and would help Rambus and dozens of other companies understand the legal framework of such organizations.

"Now that the F.T.C. has laid the legal groundwork," Mr. Prywes wrote in an e-mail message, "future cases attacking 'patent ambushes' at standards organizations should be able to move more quickly and obtain powerful remedies before the technologies at issue are superseded in the marketplace by next-generation devices."

Rambus Shares Surge After FTC's Antitrust Order (MRKTWTCH)

By Matt Andrejczak

Market Watch, February 6, 2007

FTC's remedy less harsh than feared

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- The Federal Trade Commission ordered Rambus Inc. on Monday to license some of its older computer memory-chip technology and set maximum royalty rates it can collect for licensing.

Rambus, of Los Altos, Calif., said it plans to appeal the ruling that stems from government antitrust charges filed more than four years ago.

However, shares of Rambus (NasdaqGS:RMBS - News) surged 24% to $23.50 as the FTC remedy was deemed less severe than investors had expected.

In its final order, the FTC said Rambus can charge a maximum rate of 0.5% for DDR SDRAM and a rate of 0.25% for SDRAM -- memory chips widely used in personal computers, servers, printers, and cameras. Those rates would apply over three years and then go to zero.

The government's remedy also bars Rambus from attempting to collect more than the maximum royalty rates from companies that may already incorporate its DRAM technology.

The FTC issued its order on a 3-2 vote. Commissioners Pamela Jones Harbour and J. Thomas Rosch disagreed with parts of the remedy.

Importantly, one analyst said, the FTC order doesn't affect second-generation DDR and SDRAM memory-chip designs that Rambus has developed or other memory technologies that it's engineered. The order also didn't invalidate any Rambus patent.

"The remedy issued by the FTC could have been much worse and investors were expecting the decision to be harsher than it was," wrote BWS Financial analyst Hamed Khorsand, who rates Rambus shares as a buy, in a note to investors. "In three years, we would not expect RMBS to be making much, if anything, from the products the FTC is capping."

However, the legal significance of the government's action is enormous and should pave the way for quicker remedies in future legal cases, said antitrust attorney Daniel Prywes, a partner at Bryan Cave LLP.

"For the first time, the FTC has laid out in tremendous detail how it will impose remedies on companies that conduct patent ambushes at standards organizations," he said.

The FTC charged Rambus in June 2002 with violating antitrust laws by engaging in anticompetitive acts to deceive, the Joint Electron Device Engineering Council, an organization formed to incorporate patented technologies into its published standards that companies could license on a royalty-free basis or on favorable terms.

Rambus was a participant, but the FTC charged that the company failed to disclose that it was working on technologies later adopted into the standards.

In February 2004, an FTC administrative judge ruled in favor of Rambus. The FTC overturned that decision last July.

Rambus said it plans to appeal the order, set to go in effect within 60 days. The order also barred the company from making misrepresentations or omissions to technology standard-setting groups.

"We believe the commission got it wrong," Rambus General Counsel Tom Lavelle said in a conference call.

He added the company was "disappointed the commission adopted rates below what we argued were reasonable rates and were the result of arm's-length negotiations."

Lavelle said if the FTC refuses to hear its appeal it will seek a federal appellate court hearing.

Rambus Stock Soars 24% After Antitrust Ruling By FTC (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, February 6, 2007

In a long-running antitrust case, Silicon Valley company Rambus dodged harsher penalties when the Federal Trade Commission issued an order Monday capping royalties — rather than eliminating them — on some of its memory chip technology.

Wall Street seemed relieved: Rambus' stock price soared 24%, or $4.58 a share, to close at $23.50 in regular trading on Nasdaq.

The FTC charged in 2002 that Rambus illegally monopolized the market for some computer memory technologies by failing to disclose its patents to the Joint Electron Device Engineering Council (JEDEC), an engineering standards body. An FTC administrative law judge tossed the complaint in 2004, but the FTC overturned the ruling last year.

Under the FTC order, Rambus cannot charge royalty rates higher than 0.25% to 0.5% for four of its older memory chip products for three years. After that, the royalty rates on those chips drop to zero. It had been charging an average of 1% to 2%, according to the FTC.

The order also bars Rambus from misrepresenting its patents to any standards-setting group or its members. Rambus also must hire a compliance officer and allow the FTC to monitor its bookkeeping.

In a statement, Rambus general counsel Tom Lavelle said the company will appeal the decision "because we strongly disagree with a number of the commission's determinations." Lavelle said that the FTC commission "continues to ignore the extensive findings of fact" made earlier by FTC chief administrative law judge Stephen McGuire.

Daniel Prywes, an attorney for JEDEC, hailed the order. "This is a turning point that puts the industry on notice," he said. "This sends a strong message that deceptive conduct at standards-setting organizations will be met by strong remedies."

But others thought the FTC, which voted 3-2 for the order, should have been tougher and imposed penalties in which Rambus would collect no royalties at all.

In her dissenting opinion, Commissioner Pamela Jones Harbour wrote: "I believe the commission should have imposed a royalty-free remedy in this case. … I do not believe the remedy adopted by the majority goes far enough to restore competition."

Commissioner Thomas Rosch also wrote in dissent that without "zero-royalty rates," Rambus will "continue to reap the fruits of its ongoing violation of Section 2 (federal antitrust Wagner Act)."

The Rambus case and the FTC's remedy raise the question of whether rapidly changing technology is outpacing the enforcement efforts of regulators.

In her opinion, Jones Harbour wrote that the FTC also should have imposed a royalty cap on the newest DDR2 generation of Rambus memory devices that are gaining popularity in the market.

Prywes said the commission laid out a detailed road map that should enable it to enforce similar antitrust violations more quickly.

Rambus is entangled in major antitrust and patent lawsuits with Samsung, Micron Technology and other semiconductor makers in federal and state civil courts. The FTC order could affect those cases.

Rambus, based in Los Altos, Calif., designs so-called DRAM chips, or "dynamic random access memory chips," used in computers, printers and other devices.

Beatles End Trademark Dispute With Apple (FT)

By Richard Waters In San Francisco And Nikki Tait And Emiko Terazono In London

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

The Beatles on Monday buried their latest trademark dispute with US technology company Apple, removing one of the obstacles to a potential deal that could bring the Fab Four's songs to the iTunes music store.

The two sides did not comment on whether a digital music deal, which has been widely anticipated, would follow.

However, Neil Aspinall, manager of Apple Corps, The Beatles' record company, appeared to hint at the possibility of a future commercial relationship.

"We wish Apple Inc every success and look forward to many years of peaceful co-operation with them," he said.

A deal to put The Beatles on iTunes was already under discussion before Monday's settlement, according to a person familiar with the matter, although it is unclear how far the negotiations have got.

Bringing The Beatles to iTunes would open up a highly valued catalogue of songs and could represent a significant breakthrough for the entire digital music business, according to analysts.

There was already huge pent-up demand to buy Beatles music in digital form and many people over the age of 40 would be likely to turn to online purchases for the first time, said Richard Doherty, a digital media analyst at Envisioneering.

However, others cautioned that personal and legal complications could still stand in the way of a deal.

"The problem for Neil is he has four shareholders who have to approve every single thing, which doesn't always happen," one person familiar with the issue said.

The Beatles' representatives have also been in a legal dispute with EMI, which owns the recording rights to the band's music and would have to agree to an online deal.

The legal settlement came shortly before Apple Corps and Apple Inc were set to reopen their legal battle at an appeals court hearing in London.

Apple Corps had sued the US company, arguing that its use of the Apple brand for its digital music service broke a 1991 agreement between the two sides.

Last year, a High Court judge ruled in favour of Apple Inc. Under Monday's settlement, the US company will own all the trademarks relating to the Apple name, and license "certain trademarks" back to Apple Corp. Each side will bear its own legal costs.

Mike Lynd, partner at intellectual property specialists Marks & Clerk, said it was "highly unusual" to see the original owner of a trademark relinquish ownership and control of its identifying mark.

"It seems fair to deduce that Apple Inc has paid a substantial sum for the record companies' rights," he said, pointing out that decades of goodwill had built up.

"We love The Beatles, and it has been painful being at odds with them over these trademarks," Steve Jobs, chief executive officer of Apple, said in a statement.

"It feels great to resolve this in a positive manner, and in a way that should remove the potential for further disagreements in the future."

Apple, Beatles Make Some Peace (WSJ)

By Don Clark And Ethan Smith

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

Apple Inc. appears to have reached a final resolution of a trademark battle with the company that represents the Beatles. But today's iTunes users won't be able to download "Yesterday" tomorrow.

The companies have long squabbled over the word Apple, with the Beatles' Apple Corps Ltd. objecting to the use of its trademarks by the Silicon Valley company. Under a new agreement announced yesterday, Apple Inc. will take over those trademarks, and license some of them back to Apple Corps, which agreed to drop its trademark-infringement litigation. Financial terms weren't disclosed.

Neither company answered the biggest question for music fans -- whether they will finally be able to buy Beatles recordings from Apple's iTunes music store and transfer those purchases to an iPod music player. The Beatles are the most prominent holdout from iTunes, and the companies have privately discussed licensing deals in the past, but nothing has materialized.

Michael McGuire, an analyst at Gartner, said the trademark pact was probably a prerequisite for the companies to reach any music licensing arrangement. But the deal doesn't necessarily clear away all impediments to a broader partnership. "Is it now a fait accompli? I'm not so sure," Mr. McGuire said.

Steve Jobs, Apple's chief executive, is known to be interested in selling recordings by the Beatles. At the company's Macworld trade show in January, he cued the band's "Lovely Rita" as part of a demonstration of his company's new iPhone device. But any agreement also requires the cooperation of surviving members of the band as well as EMI Group PLC, which distributes their music throughout the world. An EMI spokeswoman said it "has been in ongoing discussions with Apple Corps to get the Beatles to make their music available in a digital music format."

Publishing rights to the Beatles' music is controlled by Sony/ATV Music Publishing, which is jointly owned by Sony Corp. and Michael Jackson and would be expected to receive a cut of revenue from online sales. A spokeswoman for the Beatles said there is no implication about a music-licensing deal from the trademark settlement, which simply preserves the legal status quo.

An Apple Inc. spokeswoman, Natalie Kerris, sounded a bit more optimistic that the trademark deal could hasten a music-licensing pact. "Clearly it paves the way," she said. "We are certainly hopeful." But she added, "we don't have anything to announce at this time."

The companies' battles began after the 1976 founding of what was until recently called Apple Computer Inc. The Beatles' company, founded in 1968, complained about the use of the trademark; the companies reached a then-secret settlement in 1981 under which Apple Computer agreed that the Beatles' company would have exclusive use of the trademark in the field of music.

The Beatles' company sued for trademark infringement in 1989, after Apple's Macintosh began being widely used by musicians. They reached a settlement in 1991, but another flap arose in 2003 over Apple's iTunes music store. Last May, Britain's High Court dismissed Apple Corps suit; the settlement avoids the possibility of appeal.

Expect Beatles Downloads Soon, Media Watchers Say (USAT)

By Jefferson Graham

USA Today, February 6, 2007

The Apples have decided to give peace a chance.

Apple Corps. — the Beatles' business entity — and Apple Inc. (AAPL)— home of iTunes and the iconic iPod — on Monday said they have settled their longstanding trademark dispute.

The move clears the way to get the Beatles music available as digital downloads on Apple's popular iTunes Store, say Wall Street analysts.

The Beatles are the "most notable iTunes holdout," says Gene Munster, an analyst at equity firm Piper Jaffray. "Once the Beatles are in, this will lead to a chain reaction among other bands and movie studios. No one will want to be left out anymore."

Besides the Beatles, Led Zeppelin, Radiohead, AC/DC, Kid Rock and Garth Brooks have declined to offer their music as digital downloads. Last year, Apple added movies to iTunes with films from Walt Disney and, more recently, Paramount Pictures. Studio holdouts include 20th Century Fox, NBC Universal, Sony Pictures, MGM and Warner Bros.

Munster predicts that Apple Inc. will officially announce the Beatles availability on iTunes within the next three months.

The Beatles on iTunes "would be a boon for both sides," says Geoff Mayfield, director of charts for Billboard magazine. "It would give the baby-boomer-age consumer another reason to consider making the jump to an iPod, if they haven't already."

Mayfield expects Apple to do a major marketing campaign for the Beatles, and notes that Bob Dylan profited handsomely from such an alliance in 2006, with the release of his Modern Times album. "It was Dylan's first No. 1 album in more than 20 years, and directly attributable to iTunes," he says.

Apple Inc. declined to comment.

Love, a soundtrack remix of older songs for a Beatles-themed Las Vegas show, has sold 1.2 million copies since November, Mayfield says. A 2000 compilation of their No. 1 hits, 1, has sold more than 10 million copies.

Apple has an 80% market share of digital downloads, according to Paul Resnikoff, editor of the Digital Music News newsletter. A Beatles alliance would only "help Apple, and hurt competitors," he says.

Still, he notes, by now, "People have figured out how to get the Beatles music onto their iPods." Consumers transfer music from a CD into iTunes, then to an iPod.

The Beatles formed Apple Corps. in 1968. Apple Computer made its debut in 1976. Lawsuits about trademark issues have been ongoing since. A court showdown in England last year ended with a victory for Apple Inc. (See copy of the two firms' 1991 agreement.)

Under the new settlement, Apple Inc. owns trademark rights to the name and has agreed to license certain of the trademarks to Apple Corps. Both parties declined to address financial settlement terms.

After Long Dispute, Two Apples Work It Out (NYT)

By Laurie J. Flynn

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

The long and winding road has come to an end for the Beatles, at least as far as the dispute over their Apple logo is concerned.

Apple Inc., the maker of the iPod, and Apple Corps, the guardian of the Beatles' music interests, announced yesterday that they had settled their dispute over the technology company's name and its use of an apple logo.

Under the new agreement, Apple Inc. now owns all the trademarks related to "Apple" and will license certain trademarks back to Apple Corps Ltd., the London company founded by the Beatles in the late 1960s.

The agreement immediately raised speculation that the Beatles' music, which has been unavailable on legitimate digital music services, might soon be licensed for downloads from the Apple iTunes service.

Neither company would comment directly on that prospect, though both sides said they were happy to have worked things out.

"We love the Beatles, and it has been painful being at odds with them over these trademarks," said Steven P. Jobs, chief executive of Apple Inc., who is widely known as a huge fan of the Beatles' music. The companies declined to provide further details of the settlement.

The new agreement replaces one signed by the companies in 1991, when Apple Corps, which represents Paul McCartney; Ringo Starr; the estate of George Harrison; and Yoko Ono, the widow of John Lennon, moved to ensure that the computer company did not use the apple logo in the music business. The Apple Corps logo is a Granny Smith apple. The logo for Apple Inc. is an apple with a bite taken out of it.

But things changed in 2003 when Apple Computer, as it was known until it dropped "Computer" from its name last month, began signing deals with record labels to distribute music online through iTunes.

Apple Computer had approached the British company in hopes of distributing the Beatles' music on iTunes, but Apple Corps instead accused the technology company of breaching the 1991 contract, arguing that Apple was essentially entering the music business with its service.

Last May, a judge in London ruled in favor of Apple Computer, agreeing that the company's use of the logo was fair and reasonable. Apple Corps's appeal of that ruling was scheduled for this month.

"It is great to put this dispute behind us and move on," Neil Aspinall, manager of Apple Corps, said in a statement. "The years ahead are going to be very exciting times for us."

The Beatles are considered the last major holdout from online downloading services like iTunes. Today, Beatles fans can play Beatles music on an iPod only by transferring the songs from a CD.

But the latest settlement does nothing to resolve that issue, and Mr. Jobs said nothing about it yesterday. Speculation about a deal to sell Beatles songs on iTunes reached fever pitch on fan Web sites and blogs after Mr. Jobs appeared to give the band a highly public nod last month. In introducing the Apple iPhone, he demonstrated the device's music-playing capabilities by displaying Beatles album covers and playing the song "Lovely Rita" for the audience.

Elizabeth Freund, a spokeswoman for Apple Corps, said the settlement had no bearing on any move to make Beatles music available on iTunes, saying that was a separate matter for the Beatles to discuss with EMI, which holds the rights to the Beatles' recordings.

A spokeswoman at EMI, where digital sales of Beatles songs could be a lucrative source of income, declined to comment on whether or when that might happen.

The iTunes service is by far the largest legal music downloading site, having sold more than two billion music downloads accounting for more than 70 percent of the market, according to the NPD Group, a market research company.

With the Beatles dispute behind it, Apple Inc. faces still another trademark battle: a lawsuit filed by Cisco Systems, the networking company, over the use of the iPhone brand. Cisco has said the two companies have been unable to reach an agreement over the name after several years of discussion.

Mark Chandler, Cisco's general counsel, said at the time the suit was filed in January that Cisco would have been willing to share the trademark if Apple had agreed to its terms. These included an agreement by Apple to differentiate its coming iPhone product — a combination iPod and cellphone — from Cisco's iPhone, a business phone that uses the Internet to transmit calls.

Warning of Vista-iTunes Problem

Apple Inc. recommended yesterday that users hold off upgrading their computers to Microsoft's new operating system, Windows Vista, because of compatibility problems with Apple's iTunes music software.

Users should wait to upgrade to Vista until a new version of iTunes becomes available in the next few weeks, said Derick Mains, a spokesman for Apple.

Apple And The Beatles Make Peace Over Their Logos (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

The maker of the iPod and the guardian of the Beatles' music resolved their long-simmering dispute yesterday over who has the right to the Apple trademark.

The settlement between Apple Inc. and Apple Corps, which holds the rights to the band's music, offered greater hope to fans that the two sides could now focus on permitting downloads of Beatles songs through the computer company's iTunes Store. The catalogue of Beatles songs is a holdout from iTunes and other online services.

The two Apples have been exchanging legal salvos for 20 years over their names and logos. The last skirmish came in May after a British judge ruled that iTunes did not violate a 1991 agreement stipulating that the computer maker could keep using its logo if it did not enter the music business. An appeal had been scheduled for this month.

The new settlement replaces that agreement and gives Apple Inc. ownership of all the trademarks related to Apple, meaning it can continue using its name and logos in iTunes. Apple Inc. would license some of those trademarks back to Apple Corps for its continued use.

Each side agreed to pay its own legal costs to end the trademark lawsuit. Further terms were not disclosed.

"We love the Beatles, and it has been painful being at odds with them over these trademarks," said Steve Jobs, Apple Inc.'s chief executive. "It feels great to resolve this in a positive manner and in a way that should remove the potential of further disagreements."

Neil Aspinall, manager of Apple Corps, said the company was glad to resolve the dispute.

"The years ahead are going to be very exciting times for us," he said. "We wish Apple Inc. every success and look forward to many years of peaceful cooperation with them."

DOJ_NMG_0128213

The joint announcement did not mention the prospects of Beatles downloads. The Beatles have not allowed any online service to sell their music. The only Beatles songs for sale on iTunes are cover versions and tributes, and the only legal way of getting the band's tunes onto iPods is to buy a CD and make a digital copy from that.

Seeking Heft, State Street To Add Investors Financial (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

BOSTON -- Bulking up in a bid to stay independent, securities-processing company State Street Corp. said it plans to buy Investors Financial Services Corp. for $4.5 billion in stock to become a big player in the hedge-fund realm.

For years, State Street has prospered here as a leader in the unglamorous business of offering back-office custody work, such as portfolio accounting and issuing monthly statements to institutional investors such as mutual funds.

CONFERENCE CALL

But the company, which has in the past faced unwanted takeover interest, now grapples with intensified competition in a rapidly consolidating industry in which big players hope to achieve economies of scale through acquisitions.

To shore up its position, State Street is buying fast-growing Investors Financial, a smaller Boston neighbor that provides similar investment services to customers, including hedge funds -- lightly regulated private investment partnerships that cater largely to institutions and wealthy people. Financial-services companies are eager to cater to these sophisticated and fast-moving clients that have exploded in popularity. The two companies say the deal will create the No. 1 administrator of hedge-fund assets, in terms of assets under custody.

Investors Financial, a 17-year-old firm, has $2.2 trillion in assets under custody. The deal, expected to close in the third quarter, would give State Street more than $14 trillion in assets of all kinds under custody, ranking it No. 2. (The No. 1 player emerged last month, when Bank of New York Co. agreed to buy Mellon Financial Corp. in a deal then valued at $16.5 billion.)

"We are very determined to remain independent, because we think that's the best strategy for our shareholders," Jay Hooley, vice chairman of State Street, of Boston, said in an interview. State Street's "plan and our strategy is to be a growth company -- acquiring companies and building business."

In the transaction, Investors Financial shareholders will receive 0.906 share of State Street common stock for each share of Investors Financial common stock, based upon the $71.75 closing price of State Street stock on Feb. 2. That values Investors Financial at $65.01 a share, a 38% premium to Friday's closing price of $46.95.

State Street's stock was off 6.5%, or $4.67, at $67.08 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Investors Financial stock soared, rising $12.85, or 27% to $59.80 as of 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading.

Gerard Cassidy, a banking analyst with RCB Capital Markets in Portland, Maine, said State Street's stock declined sharply because "the deal is expensive for State Street -- they paid Neiman Marcus prices rather than Filene's Basement prices." The company said it had other bidders.

Mills Receives Another Buyout Offer (WP)

By Dana Hedgpeth

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

The nation's largest mall owner and a hedge fund yesterday offered to buy the financially troubled Mills Corp. for $1.6 billion, exceeding the $1.35 billion offered by a Canadian company in January.

The latest offer for Mills of Chevy Chase, which owns about 40 malls nationwide, including Potomac Mills and Arundel Mills, was made by Simon Property Group and the hedge fund Farallon Capital Management. Simon is the country's largest real estate investment trust, by market value, and Farallon is Mills's largest shareholder.

Brookfield Asset Management, a Canadian investment company and owner of the World Financial Center in New York, made the earlier offer, which Mills accepted.

Simon, of Indianapolis, owns 285 properties across the country, including Bowie Town Center and Leesburg Corner Premium Outlet. Farallon of San Francisco manages $26 billion of equity capital.

Simon, which presented its offer in a letter yesterday, would pay $24 per share and assume Mills's debt. Brookfield would pay $21 per share. Mills closed yesterday at $25.87, up $3.72 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Simon said its cash tender offer would allow Mills shareholders to get their cash as much as six months earlier than they would under Brookfield's deal.

Executives at Mills declined to comment on the offers. In a statement, Mills said that it would "promptly consider the proposal" from Simon but that the "current merger agreement with Brookfield remains in effect."

The offers came as Mills is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission for possible misconduct by management and for accounting errors totaling up to $352 million. Mills is best known for popularizing the notion of shopping mall as entertainment destinations. One of its projects, Madrid Xanadu, featured a bowling alley and indoor ski resort.

But some analysts said the company had trouble keeping up with its ambitious plans. Mills has not released an earnings report since the third quarter of 2005. It plans to restate its financial results from 2001 to 2004 and for the first three quarters of 2005. Its chief executive, Laurence C. Siegel, retired in 2006.

And in January, the company warned that it may be forced to seek bankruptcy protection. It has given up its role in the Xanadu project in New Jersey and sold off other assets.

Analysts said the Simon and Brookfield offers show the eagerness of large companies to pay high prices for commercial real estate.

"It is a little surprising that Simon made an offer for more, especially given the fact that there is no new information to show that Mills is worth $24 a share," said Benjamin Yang, an analyst at Green Street Advisors. "They still have not restated their financials, and coming up with a value for them is exceedingly difficult.

Still, he said "the mall industry has gone through a period of consolidation. Simon has the opportunity to acquire 30-odd properties in one fell swoop."

Paul Morgan, managing director at Friedman, Billings, Ramsey Group, said Simon has an opportunity to "create a synergy in its leasing with tenants."

"Mills has been in turmoil for the last 18 months," he said. "A lot of talent has left Mills. Assets are not being managed as well as they could be by someone like Simon."

$1.56 Billion Offered For Mills Corp. Sale (WT)

By Jen Haberkorn

The battle over troubled local mall developer Mills Corp. continued yesterday as the largest shopping mall owner in the country offered to buy the company.

Simon Property Group Inc. and Farallon Capital Management LLC, Mill's largest shareholder, offered $1.56 billion, or $24 per share, to buy Mills, the companies announced yesterday. That figure beats an agreement Mills made last month to be bought by Brookfield Asset Management Inc. for $1.35 billion or $21 per share.

Mills Corp., a Chevy Chase developer, said the agreement with Brookfield is still in effect, but that it will "promptly consider the proposal."

What makes Mills so valuable, despite recent revelations that executives may have mismanaged funds and that it was running out of money, is its 38 shopping centers across the country.

Simon's offer is cash, meaning shareholders could receive payment six months before they would under a Brookfield deal, the company said.

DOJ_NMG_0128215

Simon said its experience would make it most qualified to run the Mills properties.

A Brookfield spokeswoman declined to comment on the competing bid.

Wall Street analysts yesterday were hesitant to issue opinions on the proposal because Mills' financial situation is unknown. Amid its financial troubles, Mills still hasn't filed its 2005 financial statement.

"Without current financial statements it is impossible to assess the impact on [Simon's] bottom line from this transaction and the real question is whether it is worth the 'brain damage' to acquire a troubled company and invest the next several years trying to turn it around," Merrill Lynch analyst Steve Sakwa said in a note to investors.

Merrill Lynch is acting as Simon's financial adviser in its proposed acquisition.

Mr. Sakwa pointed out that Mills' assets are a mixed bag, from desirable properties such as shopping centers in Northern New Jersey and Northern California to less desirable centers such as the Mills malls in Cincinnati and Colorado.

Wachovia Capital Markets LLC analyst Jeffrey J. Donnelly said he is skeptical without a financial picture but said Simon is a "logical buyer" for Mills.

Farallon Capital Management, which owns nearly 11 percent of Mills' shares, had been furiously looking for someone to save the embattled Mills.

The San Francisco hedge fund originally offered $20 per share in a recapitalization plan. Then it submitted a bid with fellow shareholder Gazit-Globe Ltd., an Israeli real estate company, for $22 per share. Now, it is working with Simon.

Mills' stock rose nearly 17 percent to close at $25.87 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Icahn Launches Takeover For Lear (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News

The Washington Post/Bloomberg, February 6, 2007

Carl C. Icahn, the billionaire activist investor, offered to pay $2.31 billion for the 84 percent of auto-parts maker Lear Corp. that he does not already own.

Lear and Icahn's American Real Estate Partners discussed the proposal over the weekend. Lear said in a regulatory filing yesterday that it was trying to reach an agreement. The cash offer of $36 a share from Icahn, the company's biggest shareholder, was criticized by its third-largest investor as too low.

Richard Pzena, whose New York investment group Pzena Investment Management owned 7.48 million, or 11 percent, of Lear's shares in November, sent a letter to the non-management directors expressing "alarm" about the offer. "To claim today that $36 is a fair price is quite disingenuous," Pzena said in the letter. "It is our fear that the company's management may have lost sight of the long-term value inherent in the company and that their personal interest in the transaction may create an inherent conflict."

Pzena said that his staff and Icahn's staff met in November to talk about Icahn's increased stake in Lear and that analysts from both groups agreed on a valuation of $60 a share.

"Icahn knows $36 is a steal," Pzena said in an interview. He said he would prefer that the company not be sold now, when its shares are undervalued.

Icahn did not respond to calls for comment.

The offer steps up the transformation of Lear as private-equity firms and investors bet that they can buy troubled operations cheaply, improve operations and boost profit. Such suppliers as Lear, of Southfield, Mich., have been hurt by production cuts by U.S. automakers General Motors and Ford.

Icahn's offer is 3.8 percent higher than the $34.67 closing price on Feb. 2. The stock closed yesterday at $38.64, up $3.97. The bid is for about 64.3 million shares of Lear. Icahn owns 12 million.

EU Microsoft Judge: Ruling By September (AP)

AP, February 6, 2007

The judge due to rule on Microsoft Corp.'s appeal against the European Commission's antitrust order said Monday he hoped to publish his decision before he leaves office in September.

Bo Vesterdorf, the president of the Court of First Instance, refused to give a precise deadline for his ruling.

"Obviously we would do our very best to get the case out as soon as at all possible," he told reporters at an Informa legal conference in Brussels. "It's a very big case."

Microsoft is challenging the European Union's 2004 antitrust order, which found the software maker broke competition law and fined it a record 497 million euros ($613 million).

To remedy market harms, the EU ordered the company to offer a version of its Windows computer operating system without Microsoft's media player software. The EU also ordered Microsoft to share communications code and information with rivals to help them develop server software that worked smoothly with the ubiquitous Windows platform.

In July, EU regulators fined Microsoft another 280.5 million euros ($357 million) for failing to supply the "complete and accurate" interoperability required.

Both Microsoft and the Commission can appeal the ruling to one more authority, the European Court of Justice, which is the EU's highest court.

Pelosi, Dingell Reach Deal (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, February 6, 2007

Ending a three-week long turf war, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) have reached an agreement on the parameters of the select committee on global warming.

In a new letter to Pelosi, Dingell wrote that the select committee has no legislative authority and that the panel will expire on Oct. 30, 2008. Dingell also wrote that he has "assurances" from Pelosi that his committee will get first dibs to call witnesses where there could be potential conflict and that Pelosi will be consulted "before the exercise of any compulsory powers by the select committee to ensure the appropriate coordination of efforts."

The letter, which was also signed by Energy and Commerce Committee member Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), does not state whether the panel will have subpoena power. The chairman and Speaker discussed the issue during the Democratic issues conference in Williamsburg, Va., said Democratic aides.

The negotiations between Pelosi and Dingell to establish the panel have overshadowed difficulties Democrats face drafting a comprehensive energy bill. While they have overcome one turf battle, they probably will face many more regional and ideological disputes.

"The Democratic Caucus has had a tough time [on energy policy] when you get down in the details," said Dave Hamilton, the Sierra Club's director of global warming and energy policy.

Signaling that global warming has reached the top of the new policy agenda, former vice president and Oscar nominee Al Gore will testify next month before the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

"I don't know if the science is out there any more than it was, but the politics [have changed because] the majority has changed," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), who is working with Rep. Eliot Engel (D-N.Y.) to pass a bill to encourage consumers to buy fuel-efficient cars.

Climate change has also consumed hours of lawmakers' and aides' time. Energy and Commerce staffers have been told to block two hours on Fridays for briefings with the Congressional Research Service.

Dingell invited lawmakers to hear from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change on Friday. The group issued a report last week that humans are causing the earth to warm at a dangerous rate.

Former Rep. Philip Sharp (D-Ind.), now president of Resources for the Future, said the arrival of global warming at the top of the policy agenda is due to several causes, including high gas prices and public recognition that gasoline demand distorts U.S. foreign policy.

"The basic price of oil and natural gas certainly gets people's attention in marketplace and politics," he said. "That is undoubtedly seared in people's minds in the last two years."

Despite the political consensus that a new energy policy could make for good politics, Pelosi's goal of drafting an energy bill by July 4 remains in doubt.

But the agreement between Pelosi and Dingell means that House Democrats will avoid a contentious vote on the House floor. They could avoid a vote altogether if the Speaker creates the committee in what is known as the committee funding resolution, legislation that sets biennial budgets for committees. The bill is usually voted on in late March in the first year of a Congress.

Regional disputes between lawmakers from coal-producing states and those who represent districts on the east and west coasts and in the upper Midwest could be bigger hurdles. Those lawmakers and state governments, such as New York and California, have proposed much more aggressive environmental policies to reduce carbon dioxide emissions than their southern and western counterparts, said Democratic aides and energy policy lobbyists.

Dingell, an ally of the auto industry, is at odds with many of his congressional colleagues and President Bush, who support increasing corporate average fuel economy standards for cars and trucks.

Lawmakers and staffers have discussed a "grand bargain" on energy policy in past years, which would include drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR) and more investment in alternative fuels. Now, with Democrats in control of both chambers, Democratic aides said legislation allowing ANWR drilling is not going to happen.

Still, the prospect of passing legislation to address climate change has created a temporary spirit of bipartisanship. President Bush and congressional Democrats have said they want to cooperate and compromise on policies to reduce U.S. dependence on foreign oil or cut carbon dioxide emissions.

Bush acknowledged climate change for the first time in his State of the Union address and he told House Democrats on Saturday at their issues conference that climate change was one area where they could cooperate.

The partnership between Engel and Kingston is the most prominent example of bipartisanship. Their bill has 89 cosponsors.

At the State of the Union address and at the Democrats' conference in Williamsburg, Va., Engel asked Bush to support his bill.

"I hope you'll be bold," Engel told him at last month's speech, "We need your help."

Engel said he also spoke to Pelosi and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) about his measure.

China And UN Plan Carbon Trading Exchange (FT)

By Mure Dickie And Fiona Harvey

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

China and the United Nations are working to set up a carbon trading exchange in Beijing – a move that could establish the Chinese capital as an important centre for the multibillion-dollar global trade in carbon credits, according to the UN's top official in China.

If successful, the exchange – which would be the first in the developing world – would compete with private sector carbon exchanges established in Europe and the US, and would help to open up further the lucrative Chinese market in carbon credits.

Carbon credits are issued by the UN under a provision of the Kyoto protocol known as the clean development mechanism, by which developed countries invest in projects, such as wind farms or hydroelectric projects, that reduce greenhouse gas emissions in poor countries. The credits can fetch $15-$18 on the international market.

About $3bn in carbon credits from developing countries were traded in the first nine months of last year, according to the World Bank. The UN's climate change secretariat said China was expected to account for 41 per cent of all carbon credits issued by the UN by 2012.

Although there are several exchanges dealing in carbon in Europe, and one in Chicago in the US, the market is fragmented, with many trades carried on outside exchanges through brokers or between companies.

The Beijing exchange is to be set up as part of a carbon finance initiative agreed by the United Nations Development Programme with the Chinese Ministry of Science and Technology and the powerful National Development and Reform Commission, said Khalid Malik, the UN resident co-ordinator in China.

"I hope we can launch it this year – the sooner the better," he said. Mr Malik said he hoped the exchange would also trade in special carbon credits that would be tied to the UN's eight "millennium development goals", which range from halving extreme poverty to universal primary education by 2015. While mixing the climate change goals with efforts to fight poverty, Aids and the loss of biodiversity will make the certification of the credits much more complicated, they may appeal to companies keen to polish their reputation for social responsibility.

However, UN officials said it could be difficult to design such credits before 2012, when the present provisions of the Kyoto protocol expire, although they could form part of an expanded carbon trading system if a successor to the treaty is agreed.

The UNDP said most existing emission reduction projects in China offered "little or no impact on sustainable development".

"Companies want very green credits," said Kishan Khoday, UNDP Energy and Environment team leader.

Many of the credits issued in China so far have come from the installation of equipment to curb emissions of HFC-23, a much more potent greenhouse gas than carbon dioxide, generating large profits for a small outlay.

Legal Hot Air (WSJ)

The U.N.'s latest global warming report is being spun as a wake-up call. But whether or not you agree on the need for urgent action, it ought to be obvious that the absolute last branch of government that should set climate policy is the courts. As usual, California Attorney General Jerry Brown has his own ideas.

At issue is a federal lawsuit filed last September by Mr. Brown's predecessor, Bill Lockyer, asking for billions of dollars worth of damages to be levied against six automakers -- General Motors, Toyota, Ford, Honda, Nissan and Chrysler -- because their products allegedly create a common-law "nuisance" by contributing to global warming.

At the time most observers, Mr. Brown included, appeared to regard the move as an election-year stunt. But now that he's in office, Mr. Brown has decided to pursue the case, which he says rests on "sound legal doctrine." Because "no federal statute speaks directly to the particular problem of global warming," says California's recent response to the carmakers' motion for dismissal, ". . . federal common law applies."

Uh-huh. We don't want to give Governor Brown any ideas, but if making a legal product that might contribute to global warming is an actionable offense, why stop with the automakers? How about the publisher of the Los Angeles Times, which deprives the world of a "carbon sink" (aka a tree) to create its daily product? Or how about cattle ranchers, whose flatulent herds emit massive amounts of methane before they become steaks on your dinner table? Methane is a far more potent greenhouse gas than CO2.

In short, there's scarcely any economic activity imaginable that doesn't somehow affect the balance of greenhouse gases, which is why a "nuisance" complaint against any single industry doesn't make sense. It's also why the judiciary has so far wisely refused to get drawn into this kind of blame game. A New York federal district court has already rejected an attempt by Mr. Lockyer and others to hold the utility industry responsible for global warming, saying it would be wrong "to impose by judicial fiat" CO2 regulations that "Congress and the Executive" have considered and declined to impose.

In any case, as global warming alarmists never tire of reminding us, any serious attempt to control greenhouse gas levels would have to be an international one. That means the primary Constitutional responsibility for the issue lies with the President, who negotiates treaties. Congress, which regulates automobile mileage and other tailpipe emissions, is also free to pass unilateral CO2 caps if it wishes. That it has so far decided not to do so may be a source of angst to some people. But it's hardly an excuse for an end-run by an ambitious state attorney general around the country's system of environmental regulation.

Given the existence of the Clean Air Act and many other environmental rules, it's preposterous for California to invoke the common law as if Congress had never considered the issue. Or as the Environmental Protection Agency has written by way of explaining why we'd need a national approach to the alleged problem: "[I]t is hard to imagine any issue in the environmental arena having greater 'economic and political significance' than regulation of activities that might lead to global climate change."

If environmentalists want the U.S. political system to do something about CO2 emissions, a good place to start would be convincing a majority of Americans that they are serious people with serious concerns. California's attempt to single out automakers -- which gives a whole new meaning to the term "junk lawsuit" -- is not helping their case.

Global Warming's Simple Remedy (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

Washington Post, February 6, 2007

"Worse than we thought." The headline in the British Guardian newspaper on Saturday was almost gloating about the bad news. The tone of the article that followed was no different: In Paris, a U.N.-sponsored panel, consisting of hundreds of scientists from all over the world, had just declared that average global temperatures will probably rise 4 degrees Celsius over the next century. If so, catastrophic flooding, famine and water shortages may follow, along with the extinction of up to half of existing animal species. Malaria and other tropical diseases may spread. Among the coastal cities threatened by the higher ocean levels caused by melting ice caps, the paper noted -- not without a degree of satisfaction -- are London, New York, Tokyo and Hong Kong.

Since the Guardian was not the only European paper to feature this story -- Germany's Der Spiegel cautioned " A Tropical Germany by 2100?" -- perhaps it's not surprising that the U.N. report inspired politicians of various hues, across Europe and the world, to seek controls on carbon emissions and the fossil fuels that create them. The British environment minister called for an "international political commitment to take action." The head of the German environment agency said, "We must all change our environmental behavior considerably." So much was said about the need for "action" and "change," in fact, that it's a wonder the resultant hot air didn't make temperatures rise higher.

But don't get me wrong: I was convinced by the reigning consensus on global warming a long time ago, have accepted that human use of fossil fuels has caused it and am very glad so many European politicians take the scientists' words seriously. The question now is whether these same Europeans will start taking the solutions seriously. If so, they must begin by abandoning the bankrupt Kyoto treaty on climate change and encouraging the United States to do so, too.

The much-vaunted treaty creates a complicated and unenforceable system of international targets for carbon emissions reduction, based on measurements taken in 1990. Critics of the American president have condemned him for failing to sign it, conveniently forgetting that the Senate rejected it 95 to 0 in 1997, a margin that reflects broad bipartisan opposition. At the same time, few of the Asian and European signatories are actually on track to meet their goals; those that will meet the targets, such as Britain, can do so because their economies rely less on industry than they once did. Canada and Japan aren't even close to compliance; China and India, whose emissions rates are growing most rapidly, are exempt altogether as "developing" countries -- which, given their economic strength, is absurd.

None of which is to say that reduction of carbon emissions is impossible. But the limiting of fossil fuels cannot be carried out with an unenforceable international regime, using complicated regulations that the United Nations does not have the staff or the mandate to supervise, with the help of a treaty that effectively penalizes those who bother to abide by it. I no longer believe that a complicated carbon trading regime -- in which industries trade emissions "credits" -- would work within the United States either: So much is at stake for so many industries that the legislative process to create it would be easily distorted by their various lobbies.

Any lasting solutions will have to be extremely simple, and -- because of the cost implicit in reducing the use and emissions of fossil fuels -- will also have to benefit those countries that impose them in other ways. Fortunately, there is such a solution, one that is grippingly unoriginal, requires no special knowledge of economics and is easy for any country to implement. It's called a carbon tax, and it should be applied across the board to every industry that uses fossil fuels, every home or building with a heating system, every motorist, and every public transportation system. Immediately, it would produce a wealth of innovations to save fuel, as well as new incentives to conserve. More to the point, it would produce a big chunk of money that could be used for other things. Anyone for balancing the budget? Fixing Social Security for future generations? As a foreign policy side benefit, users of the tax would suddenly find themselves less dependent on Persian Gulf oil or Russian natural gas, too.

Most of all, though, the successful use of carbon taxes does not require "American leadership," or a U.N. committee, or a complicated international effort of any kind. It can be done country by country: If the British environment minister or the German chancellor wants to go ahead with it tomorrow, nothing is preventing them. If a future American president wants to rally the nation around a patriotic and noble cause, then he or she has the perfect opportunity. If the Chinese see that such a tax has produced unexpected benefits in America and Europe, they'll follow. And when that happens, we'll know that the apocalyptic climate change rhetoric has finally been taken seriously.

U.S. Officials Mull Ethanol Reserve Amid Bush Plans To Increase SPR (WSJ)

By Maya Jackson Randall And Beth Heinsohn

Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As the U.S. Energy Department looks to expand the nation's emergency oil stockpile, officials are also considering whether it would be beneficial to create an ethanol reserve.

"Perhaps we should be thinking about having an ethanol reserve," Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman told reporters Monday during a press briefing to discuss DOE's fiscal year 2008 budget proposal. "There are a number things we are looking at."

Mr. Bodman said there are several ideas being discussed as the Bush administration moves to expand the strategic petroleum reserve. The plan is to double the size of the oil stockpile, increasing it from its current capacity of 727 million barrels to 1.5 billion barrels in the next two decades.

Administration officials are also considering whether there should be storage sites built in areas outside of the Gulf Coast, Mr. Bodman said. For the first time, reserve sites could be built west of the Rockies or on the West or East coasts, a DOE official said last week.

Aside from considering new locations for SPR sites, another question on the table is "should we have an expansion in the type of fuel," Mr. Bodman said, noting that the idea might have merit given the administration's newly announced goal of reducing gasoline use 20% in the next 10 years. To meet that goal, the administration is proposing to increase use of ethanol and other alternative fuels.

Still, a congressional and regulatory affairs director at the Renewable Fuels Association, a trade association for the U.S. ethanol industry, said she doesn't see a need for an ethanol reserve anytime soon. "I can't image them doing that in the near-term," said Samantha Slater, noting that an ethanol reserve is certainly not on the industry's agenda. "We're using every drop."

"Having a reserve would generally imply we have some we could put in reserve," she said, adding that that isn't the case. "At this stage of the game, that's probably not something that would be particularly effective."

At the same time, experts have noted infrastructural challenges inherent in the creation of an ethanol stockpile, noting in particular storage and transportation capacity. Ethanol has a corrosive effect on pipelines so it must be shipped by rail, truck or ship to fuel terminals where it is blended with gasoline before going to service stations.

Just last spring, concerns about marketers' ability to move and store adequate amounts of ethanol for blending with gasoline accompanied a large-scale phase-in of the fuel additive and spurred higher prices for months.

The addition of a reserve might require the construction of new storage tanks, said Rick Kment, an ethanol analyst with Omaha-based DTN, a commodities news service. Storage tanks for other fuels can be used to hold ethanol but whether there are enough existing tanks in a given location is another issue, he said.

The Price Of Corn (NYT)

The current price of corn is $3.23 a bushel, more than half again what it was a year ago, and beginning to bring to mind the record $5.545 a bushel set in July 1996.

There are many reasons for this price spurt. The ethanol boom has created a sharp new demand for corn. The Department of Agriculture revised its estimate of the 2006 corn harvest downward by some 200 million bushels because of weather and other factors. There is also a smaller corn reserve on hand than usual — the smallest in a decade — which parallels shortages around the world.

Add to this the growing weight of commodities funds investing in agricultural markets, and you have daydreams — or nightmares — of that $5 mark.

Yet all this has taken place against the backdrop of three record harvests in a row, a sure sign of how strong the ethanol appetite for corn production is turning out to be. It's tempting to assume that the effect of sharply higher prices is confined primarily to the agricultural sector. But where corn is concerned, we are all part of the agricultural sector. The historical cheapness of corn has driven it into nearly every aspect of our economy, in the form, most familiarly, of corn syrup. The low price of corn over the past half-century lies at the very foundation of America's historically (and unrealistically) low food prices.

Gratifying our two major appetites — cheap food and cheap gas — used to seem easy because both corn and oil were abundant. Cheap oil helped keep corn prices low because it cost farmers less to run their tractors and combines.

But we are entering a new dynamic now. While there has been talk recently about refining ethanol from sources other than corn, that could take a while. So at the moment what we are trying to do is gratify those appetites from the same resource: agricultural land. No matter how high prices go, what will need to change isn't the amount of corn acreage available or even the size of the enormous harvests we are already getting. What will need to change is the size of our appetites.

Asarco Accuses Mexican Owners Of Illegally Stripping The Company Of Assets (TACNT)

Asarco asks judge to void transfer of two copper mines in Peru

WASHINGTON - One-time mining giant Asarco, charging that its Mexican owner stole its most valuable asset and left it to face $7 billion worth of environmental and asbestos-related claims, is asking a federal bankruptcy judge to void the transfer of two Peruvian copper mines to Grupo Mexico, S.A. de C.V.

The stakes are high for U.S. taxpayers, who would be stuck with the tab for cleaning up nearly 100 contaminated sites nationwide where Asarco once operated. If the court agrees that the mines were "fraudulently transferred," Asarco could recover several billion dollars, by some estimates.

In a 23-page complaint filed late Friday in a Texas bankruptcy court, Asarco alleged that Grupo Mexico plotted to gain control of Asarco's 54.2 percent interest in the Peruvian mines. The complaint, which one lawyer in the case said reads like a "legal potboiler," charges that Grupo Mexico took control of the mines with the "actual intent to hinder, delay and or defraud" Asarco's creditors.

"Grupo Mexico's goal was to take Asarco's most valuable asset, the majority ownership of SPCC (the Peruvian mines), and remove it from the reach of creditors," the complaint said.

Lawyers and officials of Grupo Mexico and the subsidiary named in the complaint, Americas Mining Corp., didn't return phone calls seeking comment.

Grupo Mexico is owned by one of Mexico's richest families, the Larreas. The complaint alleges that another of Mexico's super rich, Carlos Slim, who owns and controls Inbursa, a Mexican bank, may have benefited from the deal. The complaint describes Slim as a "close associate" of the Larrea family.

Asarco is assembling a reorganization plan and trying to emerge from bankruptcy. It is still wholly owned by a Grupo Mexico subsidiary, but under federal bankruptcy laws it's now responsible to its creditors rather than to its stockholders.

Asarco, a century-old mining, smelting and refining company that once was listed on the Fortune 500, filed for bankruptcy protection in 2005. It faces about $6 billion in environmental claims filed by the federal government and more than a dozen states. It also faces 95,000 asbestos-related claims that could be worth between $500 million and $1 billion.

The federal Environmental Protection Agency filed a $1.3 billion claim for cleanup of Superfund sites across the country. The federal departments of Agriculture and Interior, along with local governments, several Indian tribes and private parties, have also filed environmental claims.

Asarco has talked with state and federal lawyers about the possibility of settling the environmental claims, though there are no offers in the table.

Asarco officials had little to say.

"The complaint speaks for itself," said Joseph Lapinsky, president and chief executive of the Tucson, Ariz.-based company.

Lapinsky said it would be up to the bankruptcy court judge to decide how much the Peruvian mines are worth, if the court ultimately rules that they were illegally taken from Asarco. And even though Grupo Mexico is a foreign company, Lapinsky said it has U.S.-based subsidiaries that could make it possible to recover any judgment without having to seek redress in Mexican courts.

Asarco's independent directors had been looking at filing such a complaint for months at the urging of some of the company's creditors, Lapinsky said.

The complaint details Grupo Mexico's actions since it bought Asarco in 1999:

After the takeover, top Grupo Mexico officials took over Asarco's board of directors and filled many of the company's executive positions. "Grupo Mexico structured the leveraged buyout so that Asarco assumed huge amounts of debt," the complaint said. "Asarco was left inadequately capitalized to conduct its business."

At the direction of its Grupo Mexico-dominated board, the complaint says, Asarco began selling its subsidiaries, cashing in insurance policies that had been purchased to cover environmental and asbestos claims and stripping its remaining mines of high-quality ore. The revenue was used to cover day-to-day expenses as Asarco slipped toward insolvency. Grupo Mexico also forced Asarco to pay off bonds that had been bought at deep discounts by Slim and other "friends" of Grupo Mexico executives, the complaint charges.

Meanwhile, Grupo Mexico was angling to seize control of the Peruvian copper mines.

After one independent company valued the two mines at nearly $1 billion, Grupo Mexico hired another company, which placed their value at $720 million. At one point, according to the complaint, Grupo Mexico offered Asarco $450 million, but only $100 million of it was in cash and the rest was in debt forgiveness.

The mines eventually were sold to a Grupo Mexico subsidiary for $765 million without soliciting any competitive bids. The complaint charges that Asarco received "not a nickel" in cash from the sale to cover its operating expenses.

As soon as the sale was complete, the Grupo Mexico executives on Asarco's board resigned.

The complaint alleges that even after the sale, Grupo Mexico tried to keep Asarco out of bankruptcy until the statute of limitations on a fraudulent conveyance claim had passed.

Connellsville Investor Faces Drug Charges (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, February 6, 2007

A New Jersey man who bought the 106-year-old Aaron's building in Connellsville was arrested Jan. 25 as the alleged ringleader of a multimillion-dollar narcotics network.

Mohamed Hassanain, of 30 Edgar Road, West Orange, used the alias Mohamed Aly to buy the structure. He allegedly ran the drug ring from his home as well as his business, Lyons Avenue Auto Sales in Newark, said state police in New Jersey.

Authorities seized 14 properties Hassanain owns in the Newark area as alleged proceeds of criminal activity. The Connellsville building was not part of the seizure, according to court records in New Jersey.

"This operation brings to a grinding halt a dangerous, multimillion-dollar criminal enterprise," New Jersey Attorney General Stuart Rabner said. "We have arrested the alleged leader of this narcotics ring as well as those who supplied him with what had been an endless supply of illegal prescription drugs."

Hassanain, 40, is charged with leading an organized criminal enterprise, racketeering, money laundering, forgery and distribution of controlled substances.

Hassanain bought the Aaron's building in August for $20,000 on the Internet auction site eBay. The purchase was based on snapshots and a written description, but Hassanain visited the city in December for a walk-through and met with public officials who have made the historic building's redevelopment a priority.

"This sure is a blow," Mayor Judy Reed said. "We talked, and he said he would fix the building. I tried to impress upon him the responsibility of owning this building, which is in deplorable condition, and he started work immediately."

Hassanain told officials he was "thrilled" with the building, and talked about his intention to create office and retail space on the first floor and loft apartments on the upper floors.

He planned to have the building ready for rental later this year.

Councilman Terry Bodes, who led the charge to refurbish the Aaron's building, said Hassanain "seemed too good to be true. It's just frustrating, disappointing. It's a disappointment to the whole city."

A downtown row-style structure, the 6,000-square-foot building at North Pittsburgh and East Apple streets is assessed at $73,333. It is eligible for the National Register of Historic Places.

A citation the city filed Sept. 5 against the seller, D&F Services Inc., of Leisenring, states the structure "is old, dilapidated, so out of repair as to be dangerous, unsafe, unsanitary, unreasonable to repair."

Former owner Richard DiCenzo, of Uniontown, was fined $8,053 in September 2005 for allegedly letting the structure become a public nuisance. Pieces of the building's facade, weighing as much as 10 pounds, had fallen onto the street, according to city health code officer Rita Bornstein.

But a Fayette County judge dropped those charges because the citation was "insufficient."

DiCenzo bought the Aaron's building in 1978, just after the furniture store went out of business. It has been vacant since.

The building sold in November 2005 for $5,000 to Divito B. Corteal and Frank W. Corteal. The deed was transferred in April to D&F Services.

D&F Services was listed as owing more than $2,000 in taxes on the property upon sale to Hassanain, according to the Fayette County Tax Claim Bureau.

Hassanain paid the taxes in August, according to New Jersey attorney Matthew E. Przywozny, who executed the deed transfer on Hassanain's behalf.

The city did not file a citation against Hassanain because he promptly began work to meet code in January.

"If he's in a position where he can't continue the project, we need to find out," Reed said. "He made attempts to correct the problems, but unfortunately the work has stopped."

A telephone message left with Przywozny was not returned Monday.

The charges against Hassanain stem from a six-month investigation led by New Jersey State Police and the Attorney General's Division of Criminal Justice, with assistance from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

The investigation, dubbed "Operation Pandora," determined the network allegedly sold 20,000 to 30,000 OxyContin and Percocet pills per week, most going to a distribution ring based in Bronx, N.Y., according to state police Col. Rick Fuentes.

"Like the mythical Pandora's box, once this investigation was opened, a plethora of criminal acts, conspiracies and perpetrators kept pouring out," Fuentes said.

Approximately 22,000 prescription pills, seven guns and hundreds of thousands of dollars were seized during the execution of search warrants at 10 locations.

Also arrested was Dr. Mario Comesanas, 51, of Livingston, N.J., who allegedly went to Hassanain's home to write thousands of fraudulent painkiller prescriptions, and pharmacist Ahmed F. "Felix" Aly, 32, of Union, N.J., Hassanain's cousin, who is charged with knowingly filling the forged prescriptions.

Two other alleged members of the enterprise were previously arrested in New York, and warrants are outstanding for more than a dozen others.

At Hassanain's auto shop, police seized a Tech 9 machine gun and five pistols, including several .357 Magnum revolvers. Hassanain was carrying $10,000 in his sleeve when he was arrested, police reported.

Hassanain is incarcerated on $1.5 million bond.

S.J. Airport Screeners Nab Alleged Meth Smuggler (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0128224

(AP) SAN JOSE An East Palo Alto man allegedly tried to smuggle three pounds of methamphetamine in his cargo pants while trying to board a Hawaiian Airlines flight, according to court records.

Michael James Cade, 26, was charged Friday in U.S. District Court in San Jose with possession with intent to distribute at least 50 grams of methamphetamine.

About 8:30 a.m. Thursday, Cade was at San Jose International Airport preparing to board a Hawaiian Airlines flight to Honolulu when he was chosen for secondary screening at a security checkpoint, authorities said.

While patting him down, a Transportation Security Administration agent "felt a large bulk item in the front right pocket of Cade's cargo pants," Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent Anthony Guzman wrote in a charging document.

Cade was asked to remove the item, but he insisted it was only money, Guzman wrote. Agents took Cade to a private screening area where they again asked him to remove the item.

Cade removed "one bag of crystal-like substance," following by four more bags, all of which were clear, quart-sized and sealed with black electrical tape, the affidavit said.

Security officials notified a police officer, who learned that Cade had an outstanding felony warrant from Modesto for narcotics and that he could be searched because he was on probation, the affidavit said. A search found a sixth bag in Cade's lower right pants pocket and a pipe in his left front pocket, it said.

A test concluded that the crystal-like substance was methamphetamine, Guzman wrote.

Cade has previous convictions for felony theft, grand theft and narcotics possession, the affidavit said.

E. Palo Alto Man Tried To Smuggle Meth Onto Airplane, Court Records Say (SFC)

By Henry K. Lee, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, February 5, 2007

SAN JOSE -- A man is facing federal charges for trying to smuggle six bags containing 3 pounds of methamphetamine in his cargo pants while trying to board a Hawaiian Airlines flight in San Jose, court records released today show.

Michael James Cade, 26, of East Palo Alto was charged Friday in U.S. District Court in San Jose with possession with intent to distribute at least 50 grams of methamphetamine.

About 8:30 a.m. Thursday, Cade was at San Jose International Airport preparing to board a Hawaiian Airlines flight to Honolulu when he was chosen for secondary screening at a security checkpoint, authorities said.

While patting Cade down, a Transportation Security Administration agent "felt a large bulk item in the front right pocket of Cade's cargo pants," Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent Anthony Guzman wrote in an affidavit.

Cade was asked to remove the item but insisted it was only money, Guzman wrote. Agents took Cade to a private screening area where they again asked him to take out whatever it was in his pants, authorities said.

Cade removed "one bag of crystal-like substance," the affidavit said. It was followed by four more bags, all of which were clear, quart-sized and sealed with black electrical tape, authorities said.

Security officials notified an on-duty San Jose police officer, who learned that Cade had an outstanding felony warrant from Modesto for narcotics and that he could be searched because he was on probation, the affidavit said.

Police searched Cade and found a sixth bag in a lower right pants pocket, authorities said. Cade then told officers that he had a pipe in his left front pocket, the affidavit said.

A test of the crystal-like substance concluded that it was methamphetamine, Guzman wrote.

Authorities said they believe Cade was smuggling the drugs and, since he had only $10 with him, had hoped to be paid for the illicit cargo in his pants, authorities said. Cade has previous convictions for felony theft, grand theft and narcotics possession, the affidavit said.

He appeared Friday before U.S. Magistrate Patricia Trumbull in San Jose and will return to court Wednesday for a detention hearing.

Lawmen: Drug Lord Marked Witness For Death (NSL)

By Jeff Whelan, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, February 6, 2007

As sentencing nears for Newark kingpin, details of plot emerge

Even in captivity, Hakeem Curry maintained the ruthlessness that made him Newark's biggest drug kingpin in recent years, prosecutors say.

During his trial last year, Curry watched as one of his childhood friends and trusted lieutenants, Lachoy "Pooh" Walker, testified against him in federal court. The testimony had a devastating effect on his case.

On the second day of Walker's six days on the stand, a sheriff's officer overheard an alarming conversation as he transported Curry from jail to the courthouse, according to prosecutors. Curry's co-defendant told the gang leader they had a hitman in place to kill Walker, the prosecution's star witness.

That bold plot, never realized, emerged publicly for the first time in court papers prosecutors recently filed related to Curry's sentencing tomorrow. Security at the trial was unusually high, but no specific threat had been previously disclosed.

Curry, convicted by a jury last July of conspiracy, money laundering and drug trafficking, could face 30 years to life in prison under federal sentencing guidelines.

"This is a ruthless gang," Assistant U.S. Attorney John Gay said last week during a hearing in which Curry's co-defendant and cousin, Rakim Baskerville, was sentenced to life in prison. The prosecutor said members of the gang "think nothing of gunning down" witnesses.

Curry's conviction was one of the most significant for federal law enforcement officials since they began investigating and prosecuting drug gang members as part of ongoing conspiracies. During an investigation that spanned more than a year, Drug Enforcement Administration agents built the case by secretly taping tens of thousands of phone calls of Curry and his associates.

Prosecutors said Curry's criminal organization pumped tens of millions of dollars of cocaine and heroin onto the streets in Essex and Union counties for more than a decade and arranged for the murders of a rival and another government witness slated to testify against one of Curry's allies. At one point, 85 percent of the heroin sold in Newark came from Curry's crew, investigators said.

While the threat against Walker's life in the middle of the trial was particularly daring, it wasn't the first time his life was in jeopardy, prosecutors said. After he was arrested in March 2004, Curry immediately suspected Walker set him up. A hitman later testified at trial that Curry had attempted to hire him to kill Walker for $15,000.

Walker, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute drugs, is awaiting sentencing. He plans to enter a witness protection program.

In a related case, another of Curry's cousins, William Baskerville, goes on trial in April and could face the death penalty on federal charges that he plotted the murder of a secret FBI informant. Though Curry was not charged in that crime, prosecutors have said he tipped Baskerville off to the informant's identity.

During his own trial, Curry and his co-defendant were jailed without bail and wore leg shackles. Spectators had to pass through a checkpoint outside U.S. District Judge Faith Hochberg's courtroom, and juror names were sealed from the public.

Defense attorneys, in court papers filed last year, complained Curry wasn't even allowed to call his lawyers from jail, accusing the government of "cruel and unusual punishment far beyond the strictures of normal incarceration."

Last week, they submitted a sentencing memorandum to Hochberg seeking a sentence below federal guidelines. One circumstance they asked her to consider is that Curry has spent nearly three years in prison already, much of it in "virtual solitary confinement," with no access to family and friends.

"During this time, he has suffered through trying to arrange the care for his 10-year-old son whose mother had temporarily disappeared," wrote James Plaisted, Curry's attorney.

But Gay, the prosecutor, wrote in court papers the enhanced security put in place by U.S marshals was necessary because of Curry's "own actions of attempting to kill witnesses at trial."

Last week, Hochberg sentenced Rakim Baskerville to life in prison after he was convicted of conspiracy. The stepped-up security measures remained in place as about a dozen friends and family arrived on hand to support Baskerville, who sported a thick beard and a green prison jumpsuit.

"How y'all doin? You all right?" Baskerville asked his supporters. "Yeah, I'm all right."

In seeking a sentence lighter than the minimum 30 years recommended under federal sentencing guidelines, Baskerville's attorney, Troy Archie, said his client was a "mule" for Curry's organization "at best."

But Gay disputed that, saying the evidence at trial showed Baskerville was a trusted, high-ranking member of the organization. Gay's court filing urging a life sentence revealed the plot to kill Walker in mid-trial.

Hochberg said she found that threat "believable." She also said the accusation was corroborated by "sufficient other evidence," though she did not elaborate.

"The security precautions in this case were done for good reasons," she said, adding, "I do find the security threat very real in this case."

While she didn't use the incident in calculating Baskerville's sentence for technical reasons, she condemned the defendant's "utter disrespect" for witnesses.

"You've devoted your life to crime and now your crime is going to control your life," she said. There is no parole in the federal system.

Men Plead Not Guilty To Federal Drug Charges (SHJ)

Spartanburg (SC) Herald Journal, February 6, 2007

A federal drug conspiracy case involving hundreds of pounds of marijuana and more than 10 pounds of cocaine is headed to court this week for two men who have pleaded not guilty.

Two women and 13 men in the Upstate have already pleaded guilty to charges including weapons violations and conspiracy to distribute cocaine, crack cocaine and marijuana, but none have been sentenced.

While executing the search warrant at Mesa-Lopez's residence at 849 Harvey Road, authorities found 1,400 pounds of marijuana, several ounces of crystal methamphetamine, one kilogram of cocaine, $20,000 cash, magazines loaded with ammunition, an Uzi machine pistol and four other weapons.

Jury selection in the joint trial of Mesa-Lopez and Roland Fuller of Greenville will begin today. Testimony starts Wednesday and is expected to last two or three days.

Suppression motion

Floyd's ruling Monday allows federal prosecutors to present a large amount of evidence against Mesa-Lopez.

During the August 2006 raid on the Harvey Road residence, DEA agents found the drugs and saw Mesa-Lopez crawling under a bed where the firearms were stored, agents said.

Mesa-Lopez's attorney, Janis Hall, claimed the search warrant was unconstitutional. A magistrate never should have signed the warrant, she argued, because no specific facts indicated drug activity at the house and that information investigators did have was almost a month old.

"This is a case where there was no contact with Harvey Road for 29 days," Hall said.

The judge sided with Assistant U.S. Attorney Leesa Washington, who countered that Mesa-Lopez' roommate met with other conspirators, told police during a traffic stop that he lived at the residence and drove a vehicle owned by Mesa-Lopez.

"It does provide a nexus between the drug activity and the residence," she said.

Washington said the case clearly involved a "large-scale cocaine distribution ring" on top of the marijuana charges.

Arellano's Lawyers May Put Blame On Brother (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 6, 2007

Defense lawyers for accused Tijuana drug cartel kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Félix hinted at a defense in court yesterday: His brother Benjamín actually was running the drug organization from a Mexican prison.

The lawyers mentioned the theory while asking federal prosecutors to give them any documents that might help prove that in preparation for a trial in less than a year.

Javier Arellano took over as head of the murderous drug-running ring in 2002 after Benjamín was jailed and another brother, Ramón, was killed, prosecutors said in court papers filed last week.

Defense lawyers said they hope to prove that's not the case as they defend Javier from charges that could lead to the death penalty.

Prosecutors said they would turn over all their evidence as required by law.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is expected to decide whether prosecutors will seek the death penalty. U.S. District Judge Larry Alan Burns set an Oct. 10 deadline for prosecutors to announce how they plan to proceed.

Burns wants jury selection in the case to begin right after Thanksgiving and witnesses to begin testifying in January. Defense lawyers said that is too soon.

Prosecutors said they hope to try Javier Arellano at the same time as three other accused cartel members: Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia and brothers Gilbert and Ismael Higuera Guerrero.

Villarreal is accused of heading a band of thugs who beheaded three Rosarito Beach police officers and kidnapped and killed other enemies of the cartel. He also could face the death penalty.

The Higuera brothers are accused of running day-to-day operations for the cartel in Tijuana and Mexicali.

The brothers were among 15 Mexican prisoners extradited to the United States last month.

Mexican officials agreed to the extraditions as long as none of those extradited face the death penalty, which is not used in Mexico.

Mexican officials said the brothers and others still were running criminal organizations from inside jails.

San Diego prosecutors are hopeful that other members of the Arellano Félix cartel will be extradited soon, including Benjamín Arellano.

Convict-cop Labels ATF Accuser 'Liar' (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 6, 2007

Drawing chuckles from jurors for his Chicago mannerisms and colorful language, infamous former Police Officer Joseph Miedzianowski was back in federal court Monday, but only in a videotaped deposition in a case involving a one-time federal agent who is suing the city.

Tapes of Miedzianowski being questioned about his dealings with former Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms Agent Diane Klipfel were played for the panel. Klipfel and her agent husband are suing Chicago, charging that when they tried to blow the whistle on Miedzianowski in 1992, the city ignored the allegations and Miedzianowski was able to turn the Police Department's internal affairs unit against them.

Dressed in prison garb with short hair and a hint of a goatee, Miedzianowski admitted in the video that he doesn't like Klipfel. He called her out of control, a liar and a lunatic. He eventually was arrested in 1998 and later convicted of masterminding a massive Chicago-to-Miami drug ring and was dubbed the most corrupt police officer in Chicago history by federal prosecutors.

"Lunatic would've been one of the nicer words I would've used on her," Miedzianowski said.

Miedzianowski said Klipfel sowed dissent among agents and officers while she supervised a gang detail of which he was a member, and she made false allegations against him to cover her own questionable conduct.

He gave a vastly different version of events surrounding the February 1992 search at the home of a drug dealer than Klipfel has given jurors during the trial. Klipfel testified last month that she watched Miedzianowski take a safe-deposit box key from the dealer's pants and that cash and jewelry were taken from the home.

Miedzianowski said Klipfel was the one who found the key and she asked police officers to get a warrant and open the safe-deposit box. While officers were there, the wedding ring of the dealer's wife vanished, causing the dealer to shout about it, he said.

"I was right there when it happened," Miedzianowski said, at times barking his answers. "Diane Klipfel produced the ring and gave it to her (the dealer's wife.)"

In her testimony, Klipfel had described an enraged Miedzianowski who kicked her car and threatened her when she confronted him about taking money from the dealer and others. Miedzianowski described calmer meetings called by Klipfel, and he said the matter in dispute was that she wanted to give inventoried cash back to the dealer.

He said he had no idea that a formal complaint had been made against him until many months later and actually asked for a Chicago police investigation of himself a year after the search of the dealer's home to clear his own name.

Eventually, he just tried to get away from , Miedzianowski said, and he only made formal complaints against her after believing she was the source of complaints against him. He said he only wanted internal affairs investigators to know who they were dealing with and said he did not further influence any investigation of himself or Klipfel.

"Here's a woman screaming, 'Fire, fire fire,'" Miedzianowski said. "And the fire isn't over here, the fire's in her house."

He said he could not tell the lawyers that deposed him every "disgraceful" act Klipfel committed.

"I don't keep a catalog or a Rolodex of everything," he said. "I wouldn't have one big enough."

ATF Agent Says He Faked Murder To Get Into Hells Angels (CNN)

By Kelli Arena, Scott Bronstein And Jim Spellman, Cnn

CNN, February 6, 2007

MESA, Arizona (CNN) -- In a parched, secluded desert, a brutal killing is caught on videotape. A member of the feared and violent Mongol motorcycle gang is shot in the head at close range. His body is dumped in a shallow grave.

That murder was Jay Dobyns' ticket for membership into the Hells Angels motorcycle gang, Dobyns said.

"I had committed, like the ultimate deed, the ultimate act of loyalty to these guys," Dobyns said in an exclusive CNN interview.

But that murder was a fake, complete with special effects, cow guts for brains and artificial blood. What's more, Dobyns had a dark secret he was keeping from his fellow Hells Angels gang members: He was actually an agent for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and was infiltrating the gang to help bring them down. (Read about Dobyns' complaints against the ATF)

For nearly two years, from 2001-2003, Dobyns abandoned his old life, his family and his friends to wear the Hells Angels trademark vest and to simultaneously build a case against the most feared motorcycle gang in the world. If he'd been caught, he figured he would be dead.

The undercover plot was elaborate: Dobyns even had to fake a romantic relationship with a fellow biker played by a female agent, so he had an excuse not to sleep with other women.

Dobyns saw what few outsiders have ever seen -- the inner workings of the Hells Angels. He says that included gun and drug trafficking, extortion, rape and even murder. And Dobyns testified about it all in court.

One of the alleged murders happened on Dobyns's home turf at the time, Mesa, Arizona.

"Cynthia Garcia was a young woman who partied with the motorcycle gang. One day she said something one of them didn't appreciate, according to a Hells Angels informant for the government.

She was allegedly beaten unconscious, driven to the desert, and stabbed more than two dozen times, her head nearly severed from her body, according to government records. Dobyns testified about it in court.

Going deep undercover in the Hells Angels was only the latest installment of Dobyns' hard-living persona. In college, Dobyns was a star wide receiver at the University of Arizona.

After school, he went into law enforcement, getting shot through the chest and even run over by criminals in his first few years on the job. Fellow agents say he was among the best in his rough-and-tumble field.

Illegal Guns Targeted With $1,000 Rewards (SACBEE)

By Christina Jewett, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, February 6, 2007

Sacramento law enforcement leaders have announced a new program offering $1,000 rewards to get illegal guns off the street.

DOJ_NMG_0128229

Authorities are turning to YouTube, MySpace.com and text messaging - communication highways for teens - to promote a new program offering $1,000 rewards for information about illegal guns.

The rewards will go to anonymous callers who provide police with information about an illegal gun or unlawful gun owner - if the information leads to an arrest. In California, felons are not allowed to own guns, and only people with permits can carry loaded firearms.

"This is one of the things we're doing to try to reduce the level of violence we see on the streets," Sacramento Police Chief Albert Najera said at a press conference with Sacramento County Sheriff John McGinness and agents from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

ATF Agents Who Shot At Gunman Won't Be Charged (WP)

By Jamie Stockwell, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

Arlington County's chief prosecutor has ruled that there will be no charges against the federal agents who exchanged gunfire with a man who then broke into an Arlington home, shot another man and kept police at bay for 10 hours last summer.

Commonwealth's Attorney Richard E. Trodden said an investigation into the July 5 incident found that the three agents acted in self-defense when they fired at Travis Hampton, 24. Hampton had fired several shots at the agents before leading them on a chase that zigzagged through the county's narrow streets, Trodden said. Hampton, of Southeast Washington, later fatally shot himself inside the home he had broken into.

"We found no grounds for any kind of criminal case," Trodden said. "The only real issue here was whether the agents acted properly, and we found they certainly had a right to defend themselves."

The incident began as a minor collision at the height of rush hour on Interstate 395 south and evolved into a tense standoff that lasted into the next morning and involved out-of-town agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. Moments before the crash, Trodden said, Hampton had robbed a drug dealer of marijuana at gunpoint from inside the car, which belonged to his girlfriend.

ATF spokeswoman Sheree Mixell would not comment on the case and declined to say whether the agents faced any internal action. She referred calls to the civil rights division of the Justice Department, which also reviewed the case. A spokesman there did not a return a message left yesterday.

Trodden said that after Hampton sideswiped the agents' unmarked sport-utility vehicle, he took the South Glebe Road exit and got out of his car. After the agents identified themselves, Hampton fired at them. Bullets hit the SUV's engine compartment and a window. The agents returned fire, and Hampton dived back into his car and fled.

While he was being pursued on a congested Glebe Road, Hampton at one point leaned out his car window and fired again, Trodden said, shattering more of the SUV's windows and sending pieces of glass into the agents' faces. The SUV became disabled, and the agents ran after Hampton's car into Arlington's Douglas Park neighborhood. Hampton's Ford Taurus finally crashed into a Chevrolet Blazer parked in front of a house on South 13th Street.

Hampton left his car and kicked open the front door of the house, Trodden said, startling a resident who had just finished showering. He shot the resident, a man who lived in the basement with his sister, as the two siblings ran from the house. The man was not critically injured, police said.

About 4 a.m., after stalled negotiations and failed attempts to reach Hampton by telephone, a SWAT team found Hampton's body in a front bedroom. He had shot himself in the mouth, Trodden said. He said Hampton also suffered wounds to the back of his head, possibly during the exchange of gunfire.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigrant Entrepreneurs Shape A New Economy (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

DOJ_NMG_0128230

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

Manuel A. Miranda was 8 when his family immigrated to New York from Bogotá. His parents, who had been lawyers, turned to selling home-cooked food from the trunk of their car. Manuel pitched in after school, grinding corn by hand for traditional Colombian flatbreads called arepas.

Today Mr. Miranda, 32, runs a family business with 16 employees, producing 10 million arepas a year in the Maspeth section of Queens. But the burst of Colombian immigration to the city has slowed; arepas customers are spreading through the suburbs, and competition for them is fierce. Now, he says, his eye is on a vast, untapped market: the rest of the country.

In the long run, like bagels, "you're going to have arepas in every store," predicted Mr. Miranda, whose innovations include a "toaster-friendly" version (square instead of round), and an experimental Web site that offers online sales nationwide. "But I don't have the connections. I don't know the people who can advise how to take us to the next level."

As the flow of immigrants to suburban and small-town America outpaces the growth of bustling ethnic centers in New York, many foreign-born entrepreneurs like the Mirandas are facing an unfamiliar crossroads. In the city, rising rents and density hamper growth, while swelling ethnic enclaves in the suburbs generate competitors. Yet in other places, opportunity beckons as never before, as immigrants expand the tastes of mainstream America.

Whether these businesses exploit the new chances to break out or succumb to the new perils, the city's economy will feel the effects.

"Immigrants have been the entrepreneurial spark plugs of cities from New York to Los Angeles," said Jonathan Bowles, the director of the Center for an Urban Future, a private, nonprofit research organization that has studied the dynamics of immigrant businesses that turned decaying neighborhoods into vibrant commercial hubs in recent decades. "These are precious and important economic generators for New York City, and there's a risk that we might lose them over the next decade."

A report to be issued by the center today highlights both the potential and the challenge for cities full of immigrant entrepreneurs, who often face language barriers, difficulties getting credit, and problems connecting with mainstream agencies that help businesses grow. The report identifies a generation of immigrant-founded enterprises poised to break into the big time — or already there, like the Lams Group, one of the city's most aggressive hotel developers, or Delgado Travel, which reaps roughly $1 billion in annual revenues.

In Los Angeles, at least 22 of the 100 fastest-growing companies in 2005 were created by first-generation immigrants. In Houston, a telecommunications company started by a Pakistani man topped the 2006 list of the city's most successful small businesses.

But even in those cities and New York, where immigrant-friendly mayors have promoted programs to help small business, the report contends that immigrant entrepreneurs have been overlooked in long-term strategies for economic development.

Some are doing just fine anyway. Lowell Hawthorne, the Jamaican-born chief executive of Golden Krust Caribbean Bakery, has parlayed a single bakery, opened in the Bronx in 1989, into more than 100 franchise restaurants nationwide. The latest batch opened in Atlanta, where Jamaican-style specialties, supplied from a Bronx plant with 130 employees, draw on a mix of West Indian immigration and crossover appeal.

Other companies, like Rajbhog Foods, which started as a mom-and-pop Indian sweets shop in Jackson Heights, Queens, seem to be on the edge of a similar breakthrough, even as they struggle with rising costs and shifting immigration patterns.

"Two steps forward and then back one step," said Sachin Mody, the chief executive and son of the founders. "That is the hardest part, to keep hurdling and keep evolving."

Mr. Mody said the company had about 70 employees and three plants and sold its vegetarian products to stores in 41 states and Canada. Its catering operation handles Indian weddings and conventions for as many as 10,000. But six years ago, in recognition of a changing market, it began opening franchise stores in places like Jersey City and Hicksville, on Long Island, where Indians have settled in large numbers.

In Jackson Heights, where South Asians from around the region have long come to shop for ethnic food and the latest in saris, bangles and Bollywood DVDs, business in Rajbhog's gleaming flagship store is down 30 to 40 percent, said the owner, Nirval Shah, an Indian-born nephew of the founders.

"We try to reach out to every corner where there is an Indian community, so they don't have to drive all the way to one location to get what they need," he explained, allowing that such suburban shops were drawing business away from Little India in Queens, a view echoed by other merchants.

Then he pointed to the company's newest line: frozen Indian entrees, less spiced for American palates.

In some ways, New York may have a head start on the growing pains of immigrant businesses. The nation's recent surge of newcomers started earlier in the state and peaked by the mid-1990s, when immigration was still growing rapidly elsewhere. About 90,000 new immigrants still arrive each year in New York State, the vast majority still settling in the city, but that is down from about 168,000 in 1990.

Now, some children of the early influx are trying to build on their parents' success — success that itself has increased the cost of doing business, by driving up rents and creating congestion.

One example is Jay Joshua, a Manhattan company that designs souvenirs and then has them manufactured in Asia and imported. Jay Chung, who arrived from South Korea in 1981 as a graduate student in design, started printing his computer-graphic designs for New York logos and peddling them to local T-shirt shops. His company is now one of the city's leading suppliers of tourist items, from New York-loving coffee mugs to taxicab Christmas ornaments.

Mr. Chung's son Joshua, 26, who was 3 when he immigrated, joined the company after studying business management in college, and recently helped land orders for a new line of Chicago souvenirs. But frustration mixes with pride when the Chungs, both American citizens now, discuss the company's growth.

"It's really hard to conduct a business over here as a wholesaler," Mr. Chung said in the company's West 27th Street showroom, chockablock with samples. "We get a ticket every 20 minutes, no matter what. We need more convenient places with less rent, less traffic."

Thirty years ago their wholesale district was desolate. Now hundreds of Korean-American importers are there, said Jay Chung, who is a leader of the local Korean-American business association. They face a blizzard of parking tickets and high commercial rents — nearly $20,000 a month for 1,400 square feet, he said. Many merchants have had to subdivide and sublet their space, he added, shrinking just when they need to grow.

The association's efforts to find an alternate wholesale site have a checkered history that underscores the importance of partnerships with the city — and the pitfalls. Responding to the city's request for redevelopment proposals for the College Point section of Queens, more than 50 Korean merchants pooled $1 million to draw up the winning proposal, Mr. Chung said. At a news conference in 2004, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said it would create hundreds of new jobs. But the city backed out eight months later, after protests by older, white Queens residents and their representatives.

"They said they didn't want the area to become like Flushing, like Chinatown," Mr. Chung recalled. "It was a disaster for us — not only financially, but our image."

Apologetic city development officials offered five other locations, he said in an account that the city confirmed, and the group is negotiating for a private project in Jamaica, Queens, that could yield a 13-story center in about four years. Meanwhile, however, some merchants have already moved to New Jersey.

At a time when cities woo biotechnology firms and sports arenas to jump-start local economies, the economic potential of immigrant entrepreneurs has remained largely under the radar, says the Center for an Urban Future. Though there are no precise figures to measure their economic contributions, the report said, these businesses create jobs in good times and bad. They offset the cyclical slumps of more high-profile sectors like finance in New York or energy in Houston. And they have created ethnic markets that draw shoppers into the city, balancing the loss of retail trade to the suburbs.

The report credits the Bloomberg administration for small-business initiatives that have helped some firms, but calls on public, private and nonprofit agencies to do more to connect immigrant entrepreneurs to the expertise available.

Kara Alaimo, a spokeswoman for the city's Small Business Services Department, said it now deployed a staff speaking six foreign languages who aided almost 13,000 businesses in the five boroughs last year. "We are incredibly proud of our achievements in this arena and look forward to doing even more to provide resources to this vital community," she said.

Immigrant entrepreneurs seem ambivalent about getting more attention from the city. Some are leery of red tape, though they would welcome, say, a municipal parking garage. Others cite concrete help they have received from city agencies.

When Mr. Miranda's arepas company, Delicias Andinas, was struggling with high trash bills two years ago, he said, a city agent in an industry retention program referred him to a recycler. Now much of the company's garbage — mostly corn leftovers — is sold to hog farms.

"They helped us out to a win-win situation," said Mr. Miranda, now an American citizen who calls himself "a dyed-in-the-wool New Yorker."

"For us, it was a big deal. Right now, I don't need money. I need knowledge."

Send Convicted Illegal Immigrants Home (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

The county is right to send the illegal immigrants in its jails to deportation hearings after their sentences.

POLICE SHOULD NOT act like immigration agents, nor should landlords. But if there's one place it's wholly appropriate for local officials to crack down on illegal immigrants, it's in county jail.

Two years ago, Los Angeles County kicked off a controversial program to screen the immigration status of jail inmates more carefully. Eight custody assistants with the Sheriff's Department were trained to investigate inmates' backgrounds, and in October, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement doubled the number of agents assigned to local jails. The result, as Times staff writers Patrick McGreevy and Stuart Pfeifer reported Monday, is that the number of inmates flagged for deportation nearly doubled last year, to 5,829.

L.A. jails are facing an overcrowding crisis, and illegal immigrants are part of the problem. Federal officials estimate that as many as 40,000 of the 170,000 inmates who pass through local jails each year are in this country illegally. Deporting them won't solve overcrowding in the short term because they have to serve their sentences before being turned over to the feds, but it will probably reduce crime and the jail population over the long term. Meanwhile, illegal residents will have more incentive to obey the law, without being unduly discouraged from cooperating with police.

Outside of jail, getting local governments, or citizens, involved in the immigration enforcement business is usually a bad idea. Perhaps the most disturbing local example of the trend was last fall's short-lived Escondido law forcing landlords to verify the immigration status of their tenants and to evict illegal immigrants. Orange County Sheriff Michael S. Carona has long sought to conduct immigration sweeps, and the Los Angeles Police Department has slightly loosened its policy forbidding inquiries into suspects' immigration status.

The danger with these measures is that if local police are seen as immigration enforcers, law-abiding immigrants will shy away from reporting crimes or stepping forward as witnesses. Beat cops rely on community relationships; turning them into border police makes their jobs harder.

Jailhouse immigration screening applies only to convicts, so there's little danger that it will erode trust for police by law-abiding immigrants. And though deputies serving guard duty later end up on the streets, they aren't the ones doing the screening; that's performed by custody assistants, who remain in the jails. The only legitimate fear about the jail program is that cops may bust street thugs they suspect to be illegal immigrants for the tiniest of infractions, knowing that a deportation hearing will follow the punishment. But this is a narrow concern that requires monitoring; it's not a deal-breaker.

There should be a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants, but convicts have forfeited the right to be on it. Send them home.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

On Deficit Cutting, Skeptics Abound (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

President Bush often describes himself as optimistic about the nation's future, and he demonstrated that again with his 2008 budget request to Congress.

In the spending-and-tax plan released yesterday, Mr. Bush projects the deficits that have marked his tenure will disappear by 2012. To accomplish that, the White House assumes revenues will continue to pour into the Treasury at near their recent rates and Congress goes along with all of Mr. Bush's domestic-spending plans -- a scenario Democrats on Capitol Hill promptly rejected.

Even if the White House is able to persuade Democrats to cut 141 federal programs, squeeze nonsecurity programs to a 1% annual growth rate and make sharp cuts in Medicare, Mr. Bush's projections still don't account for several big potential budget-busters, as budget analysts and Democratic critics were quick to note yesterday. All of these are short-term problems that pale in comparison with the long-term fiscal time bombs the nation faces with the retirement of baby boomers.

Still, the budget's perceived shortcomings are sparking a lively debate.

The president's budget contains only partial projections of war-related spending, likely disguising what will be higher outlays. The budget assumes the cost of military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan will total $145 billion for fiscal 2008, but only $50 billion in 2009 -- and zero after that. Congressional Budget Office figures suggest a withdrawal of large numbers of U.S. troops by 2010 would actually add to overall costs.

Mr. Bush also hasn't addressed the likely costs of long-term relief from the alternative minimum tax. Originally created by Congress in the 1960s to ensure ultrawealthy people didn't use credits and deductions to avoid paying any tax, it is beginning to hit the middle class. It isn't indexed for inflation, so more earners qualify for the AMT, and the Bush tax cuts have accelerated the expansion of its reach. Congress keeps passing one-year patches, but the cost of relief is soaring each year; it would be at least $36 billion through 2008 and could reach $1.3 trillion over the next decade, according to various estimates. Democrats are adamant about fixing the AMT problem, in part because it hits states they dominate -- such as New York, New Jersey and California -- especially hard.

Mr. Bush also is projecting reductions in expenditures for agricultural subsidies -- as much as $5 billion annually, compared with last year's forecast -- as the administration seeks to reauthorize farm-economy support programs. Much of the change is due to strong market demand, which has kept prices from falling to levels that trigger federal subsidy payments. But the administration's agriculture plan also is expected to tighten up on some programs, while focusing more on establishing overseas markets and putting more money into research, particularly renewable fuels. Some of those proposals could fall short of farm-state Democrats' expectations.

Democrats also questioned the increases in tax collections the White House projects -- exceeding 5% annual growth on average over the next six years, greater than the yearly increase in projected economic growth and above the revenue growth congressional budget analysts forecast. The administration also is proposing a series of fees -- including an increase in premiums for corporations that participate in the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. and new fees for food inspection and enrollment in veterans programs -- that will be difficult to push through Congress.

The administration's economic-growth projection for 2007 is somewhat higher than others. It projects 2.7% real GDP growth for 2007, compared with 2.3% by the Congressional Budget Office and 2.4% by the Blue Chip panel, a group of business economists. Last year, the administration projected 3.4% real GDP growth for 2006 versus 3.6% by CBO and 3.4% by the Blue Chip. CBO now projects that real GDP growth in 2006 was 3.3%.

Critics say when more realistic projections are used, the small surplus forecast for 2012 is likely to melt away.

"While the president has endorsed the goal of balancing the budget, under realistic assumptions his budget remains in deficit every year," said Rep. John Spratt (D., S.C.), chairman of the House Budget Committee.

"In some places this budget shows vision, and in some places the president's eyes are shut tight to this country's fiscal reality," said Sen. Max Baucus (D., Mont.), the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

White House budget director Rob Portman termed the budget "credible." Mr. Portman said the handling of war costs also was more transparent than in the past, when requests were made off-budget through "emergency" appropriations.

Democrats vowed to counter Mr. Bush's priorities by pushing for more help for lower-income people and the middle class. Spending on health-care programs, education, energy and the environment were among the most likely friction points with the White House, as the two sides clash over appropriations bills.

Still, the focus by both sides on the five-year window ending in 2012 masks the fiscal problems that lie after that. Starting in 2011, the oldest members of the baby-boomer generation will begin to become eligible for Medicare, the government health-insurance program for people 65 and older. That system is projected by its trustees to go broke by 2018.

That reality sets up a much bigger debate over fiscal policy in 2009, following the presidential election in 2008. Hanging in the balance will be a possible overhaul of U.S. health care, the fate of Mr. Bush's tax cuts and maybe Social Security and Medicare. To jump-start the debate over entitlements, Mr. Bush again is urging Congress to create new private accounts for future Social Security recipients.

White House Sees End To Deficit (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

The White House budget sent to Congress on Monday shows the deficit declining moderately during the remaining years of George W. Bush's presidency – from 1.9 per cent in fiscal 2006 to 1.6 per cent in 2008 – plunging more rapidly from around the time he leaves office, and finally turning into a 0.3 per cent surplus in 2012.

This deficit dynamic is substantially driven by the way the budget accounts for the cost of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. It accounts for these costs in full in 2008 and sets aside $50bn to cover unforeseen war-related expenses in 2009, but makes no provision for one-off war costs in 2010 or beyond.

Whether actual war-related spending will follow the path set out in the budget is debateable, raising one source of uncertainty as to its fiscal forecasts.

More broadly, most of the deficit reduction is supposed to take place after Mr Bush leaves office and achieving this is cause for some scepticism.

The White House set out to show that it is possible to balance the budget by 2012 while making the Bush tax cuts permanent. The budget indeed does this, though the fiscal maths rests on certain assumptions, some of which – like the rapid decline in war costs – look optimistic.

The biggest assumption is that it is possible to hold non-security discretionary spending growth to 1 per cent in nominal cash terms. That means real terms cuts every year for five years – a degree of sustained spending restraint which is unprecedented in recent times.

Then, the White House assumes the economy will grow faster than the non-partisan Congressional Budget Office estimates in 2007 and again from 2011 onwards.

The budget has growth averaging 3 per cent from 2008 to 2012, which is probably a small fraction faster than the Federal Reserve now thinks is sustainable.

In addition, the budget makes no allowance for the cost of indexing the Alternative Minimum Tax (AMT) beyond 2008 to prevent it drawing in an increasing number of middle class Americans.

This is legitimate in one sense, as Mr Bush has called for a "revenue-neutral" AMT fix. But it would be politically very difficult for Congress to find revenue increases to offset fully the cost of an AMT fix.

If Congress continues to patch the AMT year by year, as it has in recent years, the deficit will be significantly larger in each year from 2009 onwards than the budget forecasts.

The changes to Medicare and other entitlement programmes – which are significant in fiscal terms at the 2012 mark and hugely important thereafter – may also be difficult to get through Congress.

On the plus side, the budget includes an allowance for the cost of moving to private accounts in Social Security, which is unlikely to happen, leaving some cash on the table.

Also, the White House has not made very aggressive assumptions about growth in tax receipts in the light of the positive revenue surprises of the past couple of years.

This is in line with mainstream economic thinking, but it remains possible that there could be more tax buoyancy ahead, because of the share of income gains going to corporations and higher rate taxpayers.

Even if this materialised, though, it would very likely not be enough to make up, for instance, for any ongoing post 2009 war costs, inability to hold non-security discretionary spending growth to 1 per cent or failure to implement a cost-neutral AMT fix.

Bush Releases Budget Aimed To Erase Deficit (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5 — President Bush unveiled a $2.9 trillion budget on Monday that he said would wipe out the deficit in five years without raising taxes, setting up a clash with the Democratic-run Congress and charting a course for Republicans to continue his policies long after he leaves office.

The budget, in four volumes and 2,500 pages of text, charts and tables, made few concessions to the political realities facing Mr. Bush.

For a president less than two years from the end of his second term, and with his poll numbers low, it was a defiant statement of the principles he has championed for years: the power of tax cuts to drive the economy, the need to spend what it takes to succeed in Iraq and in the broader struggle against terrorism and the necessity of reining in spending on much of the rest of what government does.

Speaking to reporters after meeting with the cabinet, the president said, "We have proven, and I strongly believe Congress needs to listen to, a budget which has no tax increase, and a budget, because of fiscal discipline, that can be balanced in five years."

He said the plan "is realistic; it's achievable."

To the Democrats who now run Congress, it was little more than a prop in a bit of theater that the White House used to try to define the fiscal debate on its terms.

While all presidential budgets are political documents as much as economic plans, this one, Democrats said, would get little hearing on Capitol Hill. They said the budget was built on flawed assumptions and fiscal trickery, including the failure to include estimates for the long-term cost of the war.

"What he's saying is, basically you can have it all — you can spend the money, especially on defense and the war, and you can cut every tax, and it all works," Senator Kent Conrad, Democrat of North Dakota and the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, said in an interview. "But in the real world, it doesn't work out."

The budget calls for $145.2 billion for the war in the year starting Oct. 1, mostly for Iraq and Afghanistan, on top of a new request for an additional $99.6 billion to pay for the war for the balance of the current fiscal year. It includes money to increase the size of the Army and the Marine Corps and hire more Border Patrol agents, but imposes steep cuts in the growth of Medicare and Medicaid. It would trim or eliminate other domestic programs, like one providing loans for vocational education.

Assuming that all of Mr. Bush's proposals were agreed to by Congress, that his economic assumptions panned out and that the costs of the war dropped sharply and then went away in coming years, the budget would bring the deficit down from a projected level of $244 billion this year to $239 billion next year. In 2012, three years after he leaves the White House, there would be a surplus of $61 billion.

The document provided Mr. Bush's fellow Republicans with talking points to use in asserting that tax cuts have helped keep the economy strong, as they confront calls from some Democrats to roll back some of the tax cuts Mr. Bush signed into law in his first term. John Edwards, the Democratic candidate for president, said Monday that he would support raising taxes on upper-income people to help pay for his proposal to provide health coverage to the uninsured.

In an internal party strategy memorandum circulated on Capitol Hill, a senior Republican aide wrote that the budget "gives us a huge (and rare, given our new status) opportunity to get a jump on the Democrats and stay on the offensive for weeks to come."

The memorandum continued, "Our message will be one that repeatedly challenges the Democrats to rein in federal spending and balance the budget without raising taxes on the American people."

But it was also to some degree a longer-term legacy-building document for Mr. Bush, an effort to bake into the fiscal cake many of the domestic policies that have defined his presidency and conservative economic thought in the last several decades.

And while the two parties have different views of how much to credit the Bush tax cuts for the economy's current condition, the government's books, at least in the short run, are benefiting from a jump in tax revenues that has already brought the deficit down substantially in the past several years.

The White House promises to achieve its balanced-budget goal, in part, by limiting the growth of all federal programs, outside of the military and domestic security, to 1 percent. In addition to assuming spending restraint, the budget assumes the economy and federal tax revenues will continue to grow — assumptions that Rob Portman, Mr. Bush's budget director, described as "a cautious approach" rather than "a rosy scenario."

The 2008 proposal is the first Bush administration budget to include emergency spending requests for Iraq and Afghanistan, a move Mr. Portman called "our good-faith effort to be as transparent as possible." But that transparency came only after repeated complaints from lawmakers of both parties, who had grown tired of considering budgets that left out the bulk of war spending.

Just hours after the budget message was released, the Senate was locked in a procedural showdown over the Iraq resolution opposing Mr. Bush's troop buildup. Disagreements on the war, within parties and between them, are so profound that Senator Conrad, the Budget Committee chairman, predicted that a fight over Iraq spending might prevent his committee from adopting any budget at all.

"Can you imagine getting every Democrat to agree on spending for the war?" Mr. Conrad asked.

As he has in years past, Mr. Bush uses the budget to challenge Democrats to rein in the growth of the government's biggest entitlement programs: Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security. The 2008 proposal includes plans to divert payroll taxes from Social Security into private accounts, a plan that went nowhere in the past, even when Republicans ran Capitol Hill.

The blueprint also calls for the government to reduce its projected spending on Medicare and Medicaid by a total of $280 billion over the life of the 10-year budget. While Democrats criticized Mr. Bush for what Speaker Nancy Pelosi called "wrong priorities," they conceded privately that Mr. Bush was correct in warning that the unchecked growth of entitlement programs would eventually break the federal bank.

As in years past, domestic security would see a big increase under Mr. Bush's budget, with spending rising by 8.4 percent to $61.1 billion. The plan includes enough new money for the Border Patrol to hire 3,000 new agents, bringing the total force to 17,819, compared with just over 9,000 in 2001. By the end of 2008, a total of about 370 miles of fence would be laid out on the border, compared with about 75 miles today.

In yet another sign of the times for Mr. Bush, the plan drew criticism from a leading Republican, Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who is her party's senior member on the domestic security committee. Ms. Collins said the budget "highlights the chronic and troubling underfunding" of grant programs for first responders.

Mr. Bush has long been criticized by some conservatives as being too willing to tolerate a steady expansion in the size of the federal government; some commentators refer to him, usually not admiringly, as a big-government conservative.

This budget calls for a 4.2 percent increase next year in overall government spending, down from a 4.8 percent increase between last year and this year.

The budget includes isolated increases for a few popular federal programs, including two in the area of education, which Mr. Bush considers a signature domestic issue. The White House called for gradually raising over five years the maximum Pell Grant for aid to needy college students to $5,400 a year from $4,050. Mr. Bush also proposed a $1.2 billion increase in aid to high schools that educate predominantly low-income youngsters.

But the president also proved willing to propose reining in the popular health program called Schip that provides insurance to low-income children whose parents earn too much to qualify for Medicaid.

The budget calls for only slim spending increases in the Schip program, so slim that Democrats say they are tantamount to cuts when inflation is considered. The budget also sets new rules limiting eligibility to youngsters with family incomes below 200 percent of the federal poverty level, or about $38,000 for a family of four.

Bush's Budget Beefs Up Defense (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

DOJ_NMG_0128237

Chicago Tribune, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, seeking $245 billion more for the nation's two wars at a time when Congress is challenging an escalation of U.S. military force in Iraq, proposed a $2.9 trillion federal budget Monday that would significantly increase defense spending while restraining other areas of the government.

The president's plan for 2008 is much like the budgets he has presented for the past six years, averting new taxes and limiting spending in many "discretionary" areas while boosting defense spending. The $481.4 billion requested for the Department of Defense would mark a 62 percent boost since Bush took office and an 11 percent increase over the current budget.

What is different is the political environment in which the president is delivering his newest spending plan. Leaders of the new Democratic-controlled Congress are challenging not only the president's escalation of force in Iraq but also his conduct of the war in general.

The White House, while insisting that its commitment to military force in Iraq is not open-ended, added a $50 billion "placeholder" proposal for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan in the 2009 budget year, a fiscal acknowledgement that the conflicts will outlast Bush's tenure.

"Our priority is to protect the American people," Bush said Monday. "And our priority is to make sure our troops have what it takes to do their jobs."

The president's newest spending plan arrives as the Senate is working to craft a non-binding resolution protesting Bush's deployment of 21,500 additional troops in Iraq, which accounts for $5.6 billion of the $100 billion in added war costs for 2007 that the president is seeking. The White House says it has not factored that deployment into the war costs of the 2008 budget, because this "surge" of troops is expected to be temporary.

That resolution hit a Republican roadblock Monday when GOP leaders found the votes to halt debate on the measure. Republicans want their own resolutions considered at the same time as the Democratic-supported measure.

Congressional leaders—insisting they support the military, especially the troops already in Iraq—promised closer scrutiny of the president's war spending than the Republican-run Congress has given defense expenditures since 2002.

"The sums involved in the defense budget requests are staggering," said Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. At the same time, Bush is seeking a 92,000-person increase in the size of the standing military.

Skelton said the military has "long needed an increase in funding."

"We cannot provide an adequate national defense on the cheap, but neither can we afford to simply ratify the president's request," he added. "Congress must look very carefully at how much of this increase truly goes to enhancing our readiness and future defense capabilities and how much is being spent to further the fight in Iraq."

Projected war cost: $700 billion

The White House insisted that it has attempted to make the costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan as "transparent" as possible by spelling them out in its new budget. This comes after four years in which the White House has sent the Congress "emergency" supplemental funding plans for the wars, separate from the main budget.

The newest increase of $100 billion in war spending for the current year would push to $170 billion the wars' costs during the 2007 budget year that ends Sept. 30. The president's budget director said military planners have taken their best guess in estimating a $145 billion war budget for 2008.

Overall, the president's requests push the projected costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan to nearly $700 billion through 2008, just before Bush will finish his term.

"It's a credible and more transparent budget," said Rob Portman, Bush's budget director, maintaining that this blueprint "goes further than we have in the past to show the full cost of the war… for the rest of the president's term."

That is not all that Bush is promising by the end of his presidency and beyond. After the federal budget deficit jumped to record highs during the Bush administration, the White House promises to halve that deficit by the end of his presidency. The administration also maintains that the proposed budget would put the government on a path toward a slight surplus by 2012.

The deficit exceeded $400 billion during Bush's first term, and the White House budget office now projects a deficit of $239 billion in 2008 and $187 billion in 2009. That could put the government on track for a $61 billion surplus by 2012, the budget office maintained.

Bush maintained that balancing the budget would be possible without raising taxes.

"I strongly believe Congress needs to listen to a budget which has no tax increase, and a budget, because of fiscal discipline, that can be balanced in five years," Bush said at a Cabinet meeting Monday.

At the same time, the White House insisted that the spiraling increase in spending in entitlement programs such as Medicare and Medicaid must be curtailed, and proposed $96 billion in spending cuts over the next five years to contain the growth of those programs.

Such mandatory spending now accounts for 53 percent of the overall federal budget, said Portman, noting that the share of entitlement programs in the budget has grown from 26 percent in the early 1960s. At the pace those programs have been growing, Portman says, they will "crowd out all other spending … unless we are ready to make the necessary reforms."

Education spending reduced

The president's 2008 plan includes close to 7 percent in additional spending for those mandatory programs, a 6 percent increase overall for "security"—including the Departments of Defense and Homeland Security—and just a 1 percent increase for all "discretionary" spending outside of the mandatory entitlements or security spending.

In some areas, such as education, the president is proposing a continuation of cutbacks. The 2008 plan proposes $58.6 billion for education, down from $68 billion this year. In 2006, $93 billion was spent on education.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) sharply criticized the proposal. Kennedy helped Bush win passage of his No Child Left Behind educational reforms during Bush's first year as president, but has since criticized the administration for failing to finance those reforms.

"I am particularly disappointed that the president has once again proposed inadequate funding for the law's important reforms and that he pays for his modest increases through cuts to other education programs," Kennedy said.

The president is calling on Congress, as he has before, to shrink or eliminate 141 government programs to save another $12 billion.

But Portman, a former Ohio congressman, said the White House has adjusted its budget proposals to more closely conform to what Congress actually has done in recent years—which has meant increasing the discretionary areas of spending in the federal budget by about 1 percent this year.

Bush Budget Cements Expiring Tax Cuts (AP)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

AP, February 6, 2007

President Bush asked Congress on Monday to slash taxes by $1.9 trillion over the next decade, cementing his first-term tax cuts while changing the way health insurance is taxed.

The lion's share of the president's proposed tax reductions would come from making permanent his signature cuts enacted in 2001 and 2003, at a cost of $1.6 trillion over the next 10 years. Those cuts would otherwise evaporate at the end of 2010.

"Well-timed, pro-growth tax policies helped create the right climate for innovation and entrepreneurship," powering a resilient economy, Bush said in his budget message.

The president also proposed a variety of individual and business tax breaks, including incentives for retirement and health care savings. He asked for an extension of a popular research and development tax credit, at a cost of $117.3 billion over 10 years. The cost of extending Bush's earlier tax cuts would be $146.5 billion in 2011 alone — the first year after they are set to expire.

Bush called for a change in the way the tax code treats health insurance as part of a complex plan to expand coverage to the uninsured. His plan would end the tax-exempt status of employer-provided health insurance payments, and give families a $15,000 deduction for buying medical coverage. Employer contributions that exceed the deduction amount would be taxed.

Other options for tax-free health spending, such as setting aside money in a Flexible Spending Account, would also end under Bush's proposal, according to details provided by the Treasury Department. Taxpayers could still save tax-free for a dependent's medical expenses.

The plan would go into effect in 2009. It would cost $121.2 billion over its first three years but would ultimately pay for itself, according to Bush's budget estimates.

Democrats have assailed the proposal as an inadequate solution to covering the uninsured, noting that it could penalize some workers who receive generous employer-furnished health coverage.

Bush's budget said it would "level the playing field for Americans who purchase health care individually rather than through their employers."

The president did not propose a permanent fix for the alternative minimum tax, a complex system created to ensnare wealthy tax-dodgers but which is increasingly hitting middle-class families. As he has in past years, Bush instead asked Congress to preserve a temporary change to blunt its effect for another year.

Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., the Finance Committee chairman, said he would like to see Bush's 2001 tax cuts extended, but faulted the president for leaving out the cost of addressing the alternative minimum tax, which he called "a far more immediate threat to American families."

Treasury estimated that the alternative minimum tax was paid by 4 million people last year and predicted that some 25 million can expect to pay it next year without a change in law.

Bush's budget also proposes tackling the "tax gap" — the estimated $290 billion difference each year between what taxpayers owe and what they pay. He called on Congress to add $409 million to the Internal Revenue Service's budget next year to address the problem, and to pass a host of measures designed to improve compliance with tax laws.

Plan Calls For No Tax Hikes; Dems Say It's 'Disconnected From Reality' (USAT)

USA Today, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — The proposed $2.9 trillion budget that President Bush sent Congress Monday sets the stage for a series of politically difficult debates over war, taxes and the safety net for poor, elderly and disabled Americans.

By laying down his priorities, Bush wooed Democrats with spending proposals they favor and made clear that if they want to raise taxes to pay for more, they will have to propose it themselves.

HIGHLIGHTS: Requests may get mixed reception

Bush pays for his own priorities — the Iraq war and permanent tax cuts — with reductions in Medicare and Medicaid, below-inflation increases in other domestic programs and what Democrats such as House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt decried as faulty revenue projections. If they reject those proposals, Democrats may need to boost taxes in their own budget plan, to be written this spring.

Bush's budget is 4.2% bigger than last year's. He raises defense spending by more than 10%. Spending on veterans and foreign aid soars by double digits. There's more money for programs ranging from Pell college grants to national parks.

Yet the budget professes to reach a $61 billion surplus in 2012 without raising taxes, thanks to fiscal restraint and continued economic growth averaging 3% a year that administration officials said will generate higher tax revenue.

"I strongly believe Congress needs to listen to a budget which has no tax increase," Bush said after meeting with his Cabinet at the White House.

Democratic leaders in Congress, taking up their first budget since winning House and Senate majorities in the November elections, said Bush eliminates the $248 billion budget deficit by leaving out three critical factors: The budget doesn't project war costs beyond 2009. It underestimates future domestic spending. And it assumes that the alternative minimum tax will raise taxes on tens of millions of middle-income taxpayers after this year, even though both parties have said they won't let that happen. The AMT is intended to ensure that wealthy Americans cannot avoid all taxes.

"This budget is a combination of deception and debt in a way that's disconnected from reality," said Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., chairman of the Senate Budget Committee. Now Democrats have to write their own budget, which Conrad said will be "extraordinarily difficult."

Democrats outlined three reasons why:

•War costs. Bush wants to spend another $99 billion this year, for a total of $170 billion, on the war on terror. That includes funds to increase U.S. troop levels in Iraq by up to 21,500 this year. He wants $145 billion for next year and at least $50 billion for 2009.

Democrats promised to scrutinize the request. "There will be no more blank checks or rubber stamps," said Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert Byrd, D-W.Va. Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., who will chair hearings on the war request, wants to boost troop readiness outside of Iraq, which White House budget director Rob Portman said Bush's budget would do. Conrad said war costs cannot be cut significantly without a plan to begin withdrawing troops.

•Taxes. Bush's budget assumes that $1.6 trillion in tax cuts remain in place through 2017, even though they are scheduled to expire after 2010. Democrats have criticized the portion of those tax cuts that benefited millionaires, which Conrad estimated at $55 billion for 2008. Now that they control Congress, they must decide whether to propose eliminating those or other tax cuts.

Bush's budget also assumes the alternative minimum tax will increase bills for millions of middle-class Americans beginning in 2008. Democrats such as Spratt say that's unrealistic, but if they eliminate the AMT, they must find a way to pay for it with other tax increases.

•Safety net programs. Both parties agree that the biggest fiscal problem facing the nation is the long-term costs of Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security. The retirement of baby boomers and health care inflation mean that those programs cannot sustain themselves without higher taxes, lower benefits or widening deficits. Medicare alone would need a $32 trillion cash infusion over the next 75 years.

Bush, as he does every year, called for some safety net reductions. He would cut Medicare's projected growth by $66 billion over five years, partially by requiring higher payments from wealthier beneficiaries, and Medicaid's growth by $12 billion. He would give retirees the option of investing some of their payroll taxes in private Social Security accounts, beginning in 2012. "We should not leave these problems for our children and grandchildren to solve," said Portman. "Small changes now can have a big impact later."

Even with those reductions, inflation and population increases would drive Medicaid spending up 40% by 2012, while Medicare and Social Security would rise by 31%.

In 2005, a Bush proposal to change Social Security by adding private accounts went nowhere in a Republican-run Congress. Members of both parties have been loath to tackle Medicare, the health insurance program for seniors and people with disabilities.

Now Democrats must square opposition to Bush's cuts with their desire to address Medicare's long-term insolvency.

"We're not cutting $100 billion from Medicare and Medicaid and, in the same breath, approve the largest funding yet for Iraq," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., who headed House Democrats' campaign last year.

Bush Budget Trims From Energy Spending (LAT)

By Richard Simon

Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — When President Bush signed a major energy bill in 2005, an array of programs were promised much more money.

But when Bush unveiled his new budget Monday, some of these same programs -- from energy assistance to low-income families to research to promote energy efficiency -- lost out.

The promises of more federal dollars clashed with fiscal reality as a deficit-minded Bush sent his first budget to a Democratic-controlled Congress. The president's spending proposals are certain to provoke fights as energy policy moves back to prominence on Capitol Hill amid heightened concerns about global warming and U.S. dependence on foreign oil.

Bill Prindle, acting executive director of the American Council for an Energy Efficient Economy, said Monday that the president's budget "sacrifices important efficiency programs." "Efficiency is the first fuel in the race for energy security," he said, urging Congress to scrap the president's proposals. "If we don't get our energy demand under control, none of the president's or anyone else's clean energy proposals will be able to catch up."

Although the proposed $1.24 billion budget for the Energy Department's Office of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy is slightly higher than the administration proposed in its last budget, it represents a cut of $237 million, or 16 percent, from the amount proposed for the current year in a bill moving through Congress.

"The good news is that Congress has signaled its intent to make energy efficiency programs a priority notwithstanding the budget request of the administration," said Kateri Callahan, president of the Alliance to Save Energy.

Bush proposed more money for some of his favorite initiatives: promoting technology to reduce emissions from coal-fired power plants and seeking to revive the nuclear industry, which has been at a virtual standstill since the 1979 accident at the Three Mile Island reactor in Harrisburg, Pa.

And he followed through on the initiative he proposed in his State of the Union address earlier this month to reduce gasoline consumption by calling for more spending for developing home-grown alternative fuels -- such as ethanol made from wood chips, switch grass and other kinds of biomass -- an initiative that appears to enjoy bipartisan support in Congress, especially from farm-state lawmakers.

Drawing the most criticism were Bush's proposals to cut the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Program to about $1.8 billion from the nearly $2.2 billion expected to be allocated and to cut the weatherization program from the proposed $242 million for the current fiscal year to $144 million.

Nick Papas, a spokesman for the House Democratic caucus, said Bush was sending a message to families who receive the energy assistance: "Stock up on blankets."

Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, called Bush's proposed cut in funding for the energy assistance program "simply unacceptable," underscoring how energy policy often breaks not along party lines but isothermal lines.

David Bradley, executive director of the National Community Action Foundation, said that Bush's proposal "unwisely elects energy experimentation over conservation."

"We certainly need new breakthroughs, yet it is not wise to invest only in risky, long-range experiments and neglect more immediate and proven home energy-saving upgrades," he said.

Sen. Pete Domenici of New Mexico, the top Republican on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, suggested Bush should add a zero to his proposed $9 billion in loan guarantees for alternative energy projects, saying that amount "means we can only guarantee loans for a couple of nuclear power plants or a couple of coal gasification plants."

Ironically, among the criticisms directed at Bush, a former oilman, was his zeroing out of funding for research and development of oil and natural gas, leaving coal as the only fossil fuel on which the Energy Department would continue to carry out any research.

The chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., complained that this would stymie production from new sources. "The key players for natural gas onshore in the United States are independent producers," he said, "they don't have R&D departments, and they are too small to be able to afford to start ones, regardless of the price of oil and gas."Rep. Nick Rahall, D-W.Va., chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee, praised the administration for including a provision recently passed by the House that would end royalty relief to energy companies drilling in the Gulf of Mexico and allow the federal government to charge fees when companies apply for drilling permits on federal lands.

The president's budget document states simply: "Additional royalty relief for oil and gas exploration is unwarranted in today's price environment."

"Amen to that," Rahall said.

Bush Submits 'Staggering' $2.9 Trillion Budget (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

DOJ_NMG_0128242

President Bush yesterday sent Congress a $2.9 trillion budget for fiscal 2008 with more than $620 billion for defense next year and more than $93 billion for the Iraq war for the rest of 2007 -- figures the new majority Democrats on Capitol Hill called "staggering."

After two years of freezing or cutting basic domestic spending, the White House says it is bowing to Congress by planning a 1 percent increase. But it is also butting heads with Democrats by calling for Mr. Bush's tax cuts to be made permanent -- at a value of $1.2 trillion over 10 years.

"I strongly believe Congress needs to listen to a budget that says no tax increase and a budget that because of fiscal discipline can be balanced within five years," Mr. Bush said after meeting with his Cabinet yesterday morning.

With Democrats now in control, Mr. Bush's budget is probably already a dead document.

"I doubt that Democrats will support this budget, and frankly, I will be surprised if Republicans rally around it either," said House Democrats' point man on the budget, Rep. John M. Spratt Jr. of South Carolina, chairman of the Budget Committee.

Mr. Spratt, though, said Democrats do share Mr. Bush's goal of a balanced budget by 2012 -- providing at least a common endpoint for negotiations.

The budget shows deficits will hover around $240 billion for 2007 and 2008, decline to $187 billion in 2009 and eventually turn into a surplus in 2012. But the Bush budget counts on revenue, including tax collections from the Alternative Minimum Tax, that both Republicans and Democrats said is unrealistic.

For the first time since the war on terrorism began, Mr. Bush included a prediction of the expected annual cost, so appropriators can take that into consideration when developing their budget.

Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, called it a "good-faith effort" designed to show Mr. Bush is ready to work with Congress on an honest budget this year.

But Democrats expressed shock at the size of defense spending -- all told, more than $717 billion in new money that was proposed for 2007 and 2008.

"The sums involved in the defense budget requests are staggering," said House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton, Missouri Democrat. Other Democrats said the sizeable spending shows Mr. Bush is not changing his course.

Overall, the budget for fiscal 2008, which begins Oct. 1:

•Projects revenue of $2.662 trillion and spending of $2.902 trillion, for a deficit of $240 billion.

•Spends $410 million to help the Internal Revenue Service collect taxes and tweaks tax rules -- which the administration says could help collect $29 billion over 10 years in unpaid taxes.

•Calls for Medicare spending to rise at 6.7 percent annually over the next decade, down from the current projection of 7.4 percent, and for smaller reductions in Medicaid, for savings of $96 billion over five years.

•Pushes back the start date for private accounts in Social Security another two years, to 2012 -- a recognition that Congress is unlikely to approve such a program any time soon.

•Includes Mr. Bush's proposals for boosting alternative fuels to help decrease the use of gasoline, and his new health care proposal, which would amount to a tax cut on most Americans but a tax increase on those with the most generous health insurance plans.

•Calls for slashing 141 programs, which would save $12 billion in 2008.

Mr. Bush won praise from House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, for dropping some of the "gimmickry" he said the White House has used in the past.

In addition to trying to include more war costs this year, Mr. Portman said they also stopped counting on fees that Congress routinely rejects as sources of income, such as higher airport-security fees.

Democrats blasted the reduced spending on Medicare, and promised a fight over Mr. Bush's call to extend his 2001 and 2003 tax cuts.

"The administration cannot continue to ignore the fact that its tax policies are shortchanging key domestic priorities such as health care, education and the environment, and driving us further into debt," Mr. Hoyer said.

DOJ_NMG_0128243

Republicans on the more liberal side of the party were almost as harsh, with Sen. Olympia J. Snowe of Maine saying the budget was "a reflection of misplaced priorities" and Rep. Michael N. Castle of Delaware saying the proposal "may fall short in balancing non-war Defense Department funding with the need for critical domestic-spending priorities."

But conservative groups said Mr. Bush should have done more to rein in spending.

Republican budget leaders promised to fight any Democrat-led effort to raise taxes.

"We do not have a revenue problem in Washington, we have a spending problem," said Rep. Paul D. Ryan of Wisconsin, the top Republican on the Budget Committee. "When revenues are coming in as fast as they are, there is no need to raise taxes."

Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, sent his fellow senators a letter telling them he will block any new spending that is redundant or not offset by cuts in other programs.

"We are at a point in our history when the question of whether we should live within our means and prioritize spending is beyond debate," Mr. Coburn said. "Our nation's unsustainable fiscal course, the impending bankruptcy of Medicare and Social Security, and our national security challenges leave us no option but to make the hard choices today that will secure the future for tomorrow."

Portman Changes Tone, At Least, In Budget Debate (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 6, 2007

As Republicans go, Democrats really like Rob Portman. It's just too bad for the Office of Management and Budget director that he works for the Bush administration.

"Certainly, Rob Portman is very well regarded by many Democrats," said Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.). "But the Bush administration, separate from Rob Portman, has a very low level of credibility with the Democratic Caucus. ... They end up formulating policies and budgets that are very different from what Rob Portman presents."

Similarly, Senate Budget Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) praised Portman as "a thoughtful, bright person who is concerned about the long-term unsustainability of our fiscal situation."

So does that mean that Conrad is approaching with an open mind the $2.9 trillion fiscal 2008 budget the White House delivered on Monday?

"The problem is not with the staff. The problem is at the top," Conrad said. "Staff says everything is on the table, and the vice president and president are undermining the staff. ... If their superiors keep contradicting their representations, nothing's going to happen."

That's the overwhelming sentiment Portman, a former Ohio Congressman, faces over the next few weeks as he teams up with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to sell President Bush's budget blueprint to a skeptical Democratic majority on Capitol Hill.

"There will be no Democratic support for it," said Davis, who pointed to revelations that the president's 21,500 troop "surge" in Iraq really would amount to 48,000 new soldiers for the war as just the most recent example of why Democrats view the White House with suspicion.

But Democrats' misgivings about the Bush administration may not be completely insurmountable, given Portman's and Paulson's stellar reputations among Members.

While one House Democratic Member noted that, with Portman, "there's distrust of what he'd like to do and what he can do," the Member said that if the president is serious about repairing bipartisan relations after six years of raw partisan warfare, "he has the right ambassadors" to Congress.

House Budget ranking member Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) agreed, saying, "The president couldn't have a better team to sell his budget."

Portman and Paulson got high marks from both New Democrats and Blue Dog Democrats who met with the duo over the past month and were encouraged by the pair's message of bipartisanship.

"It wasn't budget specific," said Rep. Melissa Bean (Ill.), a member of both centrist-to-conservative Democratic groups. "It was about reaching common ground."

DOJ_NMG_0128244

Bean added that she believes the president "is very sincere about wanting to rein in spending and move to a balanced budget."

Davis, who also attended a Portman-Paulson briefing, declared the president's budget "dead on arrival" in one breath, but in the next breath, he held out the possibility of working with Portman on "elements that will have room for compromise."

Portman said Friday that his goal in meeting with both Democrats and Republicans was to try to head off the partisan posturing that traditionally surrounds budget debates and to get Congress to concentrate on the substance of the policy differences.

Portman said he approached it that way "so we won't be poisoning the well for discussion about how to come together on both the short-term budget but also the long-term fiscal realities."

And in his budget press conference Monday, Portman outlined several ways in which the White House and the OMB tried to address the concerns of Congress in their budget.

For example, he said, "We heard loud and clear from Congress that they were seeking more detail" on the Iraq War costs, and so, for the first time since the war began in 2003, the White House included nearly $300 billion in war funding projections through 2009.

In fact, Conrad interrupted his litany of complaints about the president's budget Monday to praise the OMB's inclusion of Iraq War costs.

"They are at least moving toward transparency," he said, crediting Portman for the change.

Pressed for more ways in which the White House sought to make peace offerings to Congress, Portman said the administration gave up on a $1 billion-a-year transportation security user fee and included a 1 percent increase in non-security discretionary funding, rather than the traditional freeze proposed by the president.

"We have tried to be responsive to appropriators who have said this is not a realistic budget," Portman said.

Plus, Portman tacitly acknowledged, perhaps unwittingly, that the Bush administration often has approached Congress with take-it-or-leave-it proposals.

"By saying, 'There are no preconditions, and we should all come to the table and talk,' that was a change in position," Portman said. But when asked whether Bush actually set a precondition by saying that he would not accept any tax increases as part of balancing the budget, Portman said that was merely Bush's starting position — as unwavering as it may be.

"What the president and the vice president are saying, they are just reiterating the position we have had in terms of policy for some time," Portman explained on Friday. "What's new is the commitment of the administration to discuss all ideas."

But if the initial reviews of the president's budget hold, Portman — and Bush — are going to have to entertain a lot more Democratic ideas than they're used to, given that even the economic assumptions on which the White House based its budget have come under attack.

"You need to look at the underlying assumptions very carefully before you buy into the end result" of a balanced budget by 2012, said House Budget Chairman John Spratt (D-S.C.). "It's a very improbable assumption to say the least."

And while Portman emphasized Friday the need to "establish a procedure by which we can work through our differences," his message hasn't been completely embraced yet.

"The president's budget is filled with debt and deception," Conrad declared on Monday. "It is disconnected from reality."

Bush Budget Sets Stage For Clashes With Congress (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Faced for the first time with a Democratic majority in Congress, President Bush put a little of everything in his 2008 budget: high spending, assumptions that the government will collect still-higher revenues, and the promise of a modest surplus in five years, even if his tax cuts remain intact.

But no amount of optimism is expected to head off what is likely to be a continuing series of conflicts in coming months between the White House and lawmakers on priorities ranging from urban housing to farm subsidies and defense spending to investments in child health care and education.

Democrats share the president's goal of erasing the federal budget deficit by 2012, but would take a very different path. The two biggest flash points between the White House and Congress are taxes and the war in Iraq. Conflict over these two issues alone could derail Mr. Bush's promise of a modest surplus in five years -- the first since 2001.

In his $2.9 trillion budget, Mr. Bush wants to first protect his signature tax cuts and extend them beyond their scheduled 2010 expiration. Democrats want to scale back some of the reductions that apply to capital gains and the wealthy. Beyond that disagreement, the two sides are split over the alternative minimum tax, originally aimed only at the wealthiest Americans, but which is increasingly reaching into the middle class.

At this stage, the president has committed himself to doing little beyond next year. That's a major concern for Democrats, who have vowed to do what it takes to keep the AMT from hitting tens of millions of additional families.

Stirring Emotion

The second flash point, Iraq, is stirring even more emotion now than the Cold War debate did in the 1980s, when Republicans joined Democrats in trimming President Reagan's defense buildup to pay for domestic spending. The size of Mr. Bush's budget request for defense -- $716.5 billion in new spending over the next 20 months -- is "staggering," said House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (D., Mo.), a strong ally of the military.

One reason for the big defense budget is that the president, for the first time since the 2003 invasion of Iraq, is submitting a spending blueprint that spells out upfront defense costs. But beyond Sept. 30, 2008, Mr. Bush's budget reverts to past practice and allocates only $50 billion for Iraq, or less than half what the annual cost of the war has been so far.

The White House says that's because the war's cost can't be accurately predicted any further into the future. Still, the projected cost for the next year of the war alone will spark competition between defense spending and Democrats' desires to fund their priorities, particularly education and health.

For example, while the Defense Department budget would grow by $49 billion under the president's plan for next year, the Education Department's budget would be cut by $1.5 billion from the joint funding resolution that passed the Democratic-controlled House only last week.

Rob Portman, Mr. Bush's budget director, has sought to ease some of the conflicts. The administration is no longer pressing for a fee on airlines to pay for security screeners. In the case of Medicare, proposed cuts at the expense of oxygen services for the elderly set off a big fight in Congress last year; this time around, Mr. Portman and the administration have sought to find a formula to defuse some of the tension.

Mr. Portman told reporters he was comfortable with what he described as an overall 1% increase in domestic spending, saying, "It's adequate to fund the nation's priorities." But in a sign of the political challenges ahead, Mr. Portman overstated even this modest increase. Democrats have already begun revising spending for 2007, and in some cases the spending increases cited in Mr. Bush's budget turn out to be reductions from those levels.

Mr. Bush's refusal to reconsider his tax policy makes it harder to reach the compromises needed on entitlement programs such as Medicare and Medicaid, which are closely identified with Democrats. This tension is likely to have a ripple effect, shaping the broader budget debate this year.

The most likely route to real progress toward a compromise would be passage of a major deficit-reduction package. But unless the administration is more willing to include taxes in the same package, Democrats would be reluctant to tackle an issue as tough as Medicare. Instead of one battle, Congress faces a series of skirmishes as bills come to the floor, and much will depend on new "pay go" rules that require lawmakers to offset any new spending with new revenues or savings.

Early Test Fight

An early test fight will come over the planned reauthorization of a popular program designed to help states extend insurance coverage to low-income children. The so-called State Children's Health Insurance Program, established 10 years ago for children who don't qualify for Medicaid, would get another $5 billion over the next five years under the Bush administration budget. But advocates in Congress believe $12 billion to $15 billion is needed, and some Democrats would like to see the figure go even higher to extend the program's coverage.

Education is going to be similarly sensitive. Mr. Bush's "No Child Left Behind" reforms are coming up for reauthorization in Congress, and Democrats have long complained that more money must be provided to help local public schools meet the standards set under the law. Toward this end, the administration proposes to provide more funding for low-income public schools, targeted to high schools, and math and reading programs also would receive more money. But a total of $2.3 billion in other education programs would be terminated, setting up conflicts with lawmakers that will make it harder to reach agreement.

Agriculture spending will be another source of conflict. As part of the farm-bill debate this year, the administration is seeking greater investments in renewable fuel, but farm-state lawmakers complain that the budget doesn't provide adequate resources. Senate Agriculture Committee Chairman Tom Harkin (D., Iowa) said yesterday that while the administration's farm plan has "solid suggestions," the budget figures "would deny the necessary funding to reach critical objectives in energy, conservation and rural-economic-development initiatives." The proposed budget also cuts $360 million in 2008 from two conservation programs that have been a priority for the chairman.

Even the budget's basic assumptions about spending and tax revenues will spark debate.

In many respects, Mr. Bush's budget has been overtaken by events, including the House's passage last week of a resolution that includes increases in domestic spending for the last eight months of fiscal 2007.

The Association of American Universities complained that the new budget for the National Institutes of Health proved to be a $500 million cut from an NIH funding resolution for this year. In the case of veterans' medical care, funding does go up in the Bush budget, but the increase is about $1 billion less than the administration boasted in the accompanying explanatory documents.

In the case of revenues, the administration predicts annual government receipts will grow by 30% to reach $3.3 trillion in the crucial year of 2012. That's more than $150 billion higher than what the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office estimates that same year.

Under Pressure

Democratic critics say the administration is using overly rosy estimates of how many more tax dollars a growing economy will generate for Washington. Still, Democrats themselves are tempted to use the same kinds of numbers, because they too are under pressure to show they can craft a balanced budget. House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt (D., S.C.) admitted that to get an "apples and apples" comparison with the president's numbers, Congress may take a second look at the White House estimates.

"Humpty Dumpty can get to balance by 2012 with these numbers. The real problem is 2015 and later," said Sen. Judd Gregg (R., N.H.), the former Senate Budget Committee chairman.

Bottom Line For Bush's '08 Budget: Contention (LAT)

By Joel Havemann And Maura Reynolds

WASHINGTON — The $2.9-trillion budget President Bush unveiled Monday highlighted major policy differences with the Democrats in control of Capitol Hill and set the stage for vigorous battles over healthcare, war costs and deficit reduction in the last two years of his presidency.

Although presidents' budgets have always been largely a theoretical exercise — the Constitution gives Congress the job of passing spending bills — they help set the terms of Washington's heated budget debates. The heat flared up immediately Monday as Republicans lined up squarely behind Bush's budget for fiscal 2008, while Democrats castigated it as both heartless and fiscally irresponsible.

The sharp divide seemed to shatter the spirit of bipartisanship that both parties had cultivated since the Democrats captured control of Congress in November's elections.

Democrats complained that they saw no evidence of declining war costs, and they railed against Bush's single biggest spending constraint: holding down the growth of Medicare.

"This budget represents more of the same wrong priorities: placing a higher priority on huge tax cuts for multimillionaires than on urgent national needs," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco). "Democrats are prepared to work with Republicans to make the tough choices that will return our budgets to fiscal responsibility, but today's budget from the president is simply not the right approach."

The coming face-off over outlays for the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan, social programs and tax cuts will offer a preview to the debates likely to dominate the 2008 elections.

Bush, in his written budget message to Congress, challenged lawmakers to balance the budget by 2012, as his plan would, without raising taxes.

"My formula for a balanced budget," he said, "reflects the priorities of our country at this moment in its history: protecting the homeland and fighting terrorism, keeping the economy strong with low taxes and keeping spending under control while making federal programs more effective."

Bush's plan to balance the budget in five years echoed the plan advanced last year by congressional Democrats during Congress' attempt to write its own budget for 2007. The Democrats' plan died when Congress was unable to agree on either party's budget.

Bush proposed that the government spend $2.9 trillion next year — that's $5.5 million a minute — on revenues of $2.7 trillion.

Revenues would overtake spending five years from now, according to Bush's calculations, with spending of $3.2 trillion and revenue of $3.3 trillion.

The president's plan would balance the budget mostly through spending cuts rather than tax increases.

"Balancing the budget by raising taxes would put our economy at risk," Rob Portman, director of the White House Office of Management and Budget, told reporters.

Bush's across-the-board tax cuts, enacted in 2001 and 2003 to expire at the end of 2010, would be made permanent. The expiration date had been a way to reduce the theoretical price tag.

The alternative minimum tax, designed four decades ago to prevent the very wealthy from sheltering most of their income from taxes, would be repealed before inflation could drive more middle-class and upper-middle-class taxpayers into its clutches. The revenue loss would be offset after next year by unspecified increases elsewhere in the tax code.

"We want to work with Congress to reform the [alternative minimum tax] because we believe it is a misguided tax policy," Portman said.

The president's proposals also include stepped-up tax enforcement, acceding to complaints that nearly $300 billion in revenue is not collected each year.

Treasury officials suggested in a briefing Monday several ways to improve tax collection, including increasing the enforcement budget for the Internal Revenue Service and passing new provisions to help the government keep tabs on taxpayers' income. One proposal, they said, would make it easier to calculate capital gains taxes for stock transactions: Investment houses would have to report how much money a stockholder originally paid for a stock, not just how much he received when he sold it. The provision would take effect for stocks purchased after 2008, the officials said.

On the spending side, the administration proposed defense outlays of historic proportions, asking for more than $623 billion for the Pentagon in the budget for the 2008 fiscal year, which runs from October 2007 to the end of September 2008. And for the first time since fighting in Afghanistan and Iraq began, the administration's request included an estimate for the cost of the wars, which totaled $142 billion on top of the Defense Department's normal budget of $481 billion.

In addition, the Pentagon asked for $93 billion in war funding this year, which would bring the total war costs for 2007 to more than $163 billion. If both requests were approved, the cumulative cost of both wars would top $687 billion, according to the Pentagon's budget documents — more than the entire cost of the Vietnam War, even adjusted for inflation.In healthcare, Bush proposed his deepest cuts yet in one of the biggest and most politically popular federal entitlement programs: Medicare. The reductions would total $66 billion over five years, which when combined with a proposed $10 billion in administrative savings would slow the growth in Medicare spending.

The president also proposed a $5-billion increase for a federal-state program to provide health coverage for uninsured children. Democrats say the program needs an increase of $15 billion to maintain coverage at current levels.

In energy, Bush proposed to boost spending on basic science research by $4.4 billion, seeking energy-saving technology breakthroughs to improve economic competitiveness. In addition, he asked for $148 million for solar power research; $179 million for development of ethanol from corn, wood chips and switch grass; $81 million for "plug-in" hybrid vehicle technology; and $309 million to support development of hydrogen fuel vehicles.

In education, the administration proposed deep cuts in federal subsidies for student loans, an idea that sent the stock price of Sallie Mae, the largest lender, plummeting. The president also suggested eliminating two loan programs: the Perkins Loan and the Supplemental Education Opportunity Grant. The savings would be used to increase the budget for Pell Grants.

Under the president's scenario, the deficit would remain virtually unchanged next year at $239 billion, then decline every year until 2012, when it would record a small surplus.

But that surplus develops only because the administration does not include the budgetary effects of waging the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan, nor of shielding middle-income taxpayers from the alternative minimum tax.

Both Democrats and nonpartisan experts said the president's budget policies were unlikely to result in a surplus in 2012 or anytime in the foreseeable future.

"The president's budget is filled with debt and deception, disconnected from reality, and continues to move America in the wrong direction," said Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), chairman of the Senate Budget Committee. "This administration has the worst fiscal record in history, and this budget does nothing to change that."

Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, which lobbies for budget austerity, said: "A lot of things would have to come out just right" for the budget to balance. U.S. troops would have to withdraw quickly from both Iraq and Afghanistan, he said, and Bush and Congress would have to agree on a "miracle" source of revenue to replace the alternative minimum tax, which Bush proposes to eliminate.

"He also has to hope there are no more emergencies," Bixby added. "Forget about 9/11; there can't even be any more Hurricane Katrinas."

Bush also relied on no growth, even accounting for inflation, in outlays for the vast range of government programs whose spending levels are set not by benefit formulas, like Social Security and Medicare, but by annual appropriations bills. For 2008, Bush spelled out how much he would allot to each program, but for the subsequent four years he merely promised austerity without spelling out how he would achieve it.

With defense and benefit programs growing fast, it is the so-called domestic discretionary part of the budget that has absorbed most of Washington's budget discipline. A number of lawmakers think Congress has cut education, environmental and other spending in this category just about as far as it can.

House Budget Committee Chairman John M. Spratt Jr. (D-S.C.) said, "While the president has endorsed the goal of balancing the budget, under realistic assumptions his budget remains in deficit every year."

Democratic Budget Chairs Blast Bush Plan (MCT)

By James Rosen

McClatchy Newspapers, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - The new Democratic chairmen of the congressional budget committees assailed President Bush's spending plan Monday as a fiscal ruse that's based on inflated government revenue projections and understated future war costs.

Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., and Rep. John Spratt, D-S.C., gave caustic reviews to Bush's 2008 fiscal year budget, the first of the annual fiscal proposals he has submitted to a Democratic-controlled Congress.

"I would characterize this proposal as filled with debt and deception," Conrad said. "It's disconnected from reality. And it continues to move America in the wrong direction."

Spratt accused Bush of using budgetary sleight of hand to buttress his claim that the federal deficit - projected at $172 billion this year by the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) - would disappear by 2012 under his plan.

Among the most costly false assumptions alleged by Spratt:

-U.S. annual costs in Iraq and Afghanistan will fall to $50 billion, less than a third of current outlays, by 2009, with no subsequent expenses.

-The optimistic revenue forecasts clash with CBO projections and conceal $155 billion in future costs.

"If you look at the economic criteria on which their forecasts are based, what you'll see is in every case at the margins they're pushing for a little bit better, more favorable underlying circumstances," Spratt said.

Rob Portman, Bush's budget director, denied that the spending plan is built on overly optimistic projections of future government revenues or other unrealistic assumptions.

"It's a credible and more transparent budget," Portman said. "Instead of painting a rosy scenario on revenues to get to balance, we take a cautious approach."

White House press secretary Tony Fratto said, "We have a pretty high degree of confidence that we'll be able to get to balance by 2012."

Spratt, though, said Bush's budget understates future costs by easing the burden of the alternative minimum tax for only the 6 million Americans who now pay it. Providing relief for the 39 million people or families projected to be paying it by 2012, the final year of the president's five-year plan, would cost far more, Spratt said.

Congress created the alternative minimum tax to capture revenue mainly from high-income filers, but more and more people slide into the tax each year because it isn't indexed for inflation, unlike the standard IRS tax tables. Lawmakers from both parties say the alternative minimum tax must target fewer people.

Conrad and Spratt gave Bush credit for providing more detail of current and future costs for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, but they said that the White House figures still come up short.

Spratt said the $145 billion that Bush allocated for the wars next year will likely grow with a supplemental spending request. Even if the number of U.S. troops falls, Spratt said the 2009 cost will likely exceed $50 billion.

Portman admitted that the $50 billion figure in 2009 fiscal year war costs was little more than a guess.

"We have no idea what those costs will be," he said.

Spratt and Conrad said Bush raided important programs in education, health care and the environment in order to pay for almost $2 trillion in tax cuts.

Bush has joined congressional leaders from both parties in calling for a balanced budget by 2012, but there's little agreement on how to achieve it. Analysts say the Democrats now in charge of Congress will face tough choices if they try to balance the budget in their own spending plans.

Conrad and Spratt deflected questions from reporters asking whether Democrats would consider raising taxes in order to help balance the budget. They said Congress will develop its spending proposal in the coming weeks.

"We're here today to discuss the president's budget submission," Conrad said.

In many ways, the emerging budget debate echoes the debate over spending priorities of the 1990s, only then Democratic President Bill Clinton tussled with House Speaker Newt Gingrich and the GOP-led Congress.

Conrad repeated some of Clinton's main themes, accusing Bush of providing tax cuts for millionaires while trying to trim programs ranging from community cops to heating funds for low-income people.

Like Clinton a decade earlier, Conrad and Spratt said Bush wants to cut Medicare; his budget contains continued increases, but it slows Medicare's rate of growth - from the current rate of 7.4 percent to 6.7 percent over the next 10 years, according to Portman.

Addressing Wealth Gap (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

In a speech last week, President Bush said: "The fact is that income inequality is real; it's been rising for more than 25 years."

In his new budget yesterday, Mr. Bush proposed some modest ways to restrain the wealth gap, particularly by offering new tax breaks to help the uninsured buy health insurance, but did little to fundamentally strengthen existing government efforts to alter the distribution of income. Included in his budget also was a proposal to extend his 2001 and 2003 tax cuts, which Democrats say benefit the rich over everyone else.

Chief among Mr. Bush's plans that would, over time, tend to reduce inequality are his proposals to create a tax deduction for health insurance that would help lower- and middle-class families who don't receive insurance through their jobs, to spend more on grants to low-income college students and to create $3,000 personal accounts that workers may use for education and training, a proposal he has made before. The president also proposed cutting grants for dislocated workers to get training and limiting eligibility for a state-federal health-insurance program for low-income children.

Democrats attacked the budget, saying Mr. Bush was putting the needs of the wealthy above everyone else. "Its priorities are disconnected from the needs of middle-class Americans," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said in a statement. "His budget hands out favors for the oil and gas industry, while eroding health coverage for children and seniors."

While the economy has expanded nearly 15%, after inflation, since the last recession ended in 2001, many Americans haven't seen their paychecks increase fast enough to keep up with rising prices. Incomes at the top keep rising, with the top 20% of households claiming 50.4% of all the income in 2005 -- up from 46.6% in 1990 -- but median household income remains below its 1999 peak, adjusted for inflation.

Rather than using the tax code to redistribute income more than it does already, Mr. Bush's budget looks to address inequality largely by helping people afford health insurance and providing more money for education, including increased Pell grants for college.

The White House said the president, while seeking to restrain overall spending, identified "three key issues that are on the minds of many Americans" as budget priorities -- "the quality and cost of their children's education, access to affordable health care, and our nation's dependence on foreign sources of energy from unstable parts of the world."

The president's health plan would for the first time make employer-provided health insurance taxable but provide a standard tax deduction of as much as $15,000 for families who get insurance. Administration officials predict that the plan would help to restrain health costs and, ultimately, raise wages. The Treasury says the proposal would "make the tax system more progressive, with the benefits concentrated on low- and middle-income Americans" -- those with incomes below $87,750 a year.

Several of Mr. Bush's economic advisers have argued that the best response to widening income disparities, particularly the widening gap between those with education and those without, would be to improve K-12 education and encourage more Americans to go to college. The president "felt that the way to deal with this was to make sure that everybody had the opportunity to invest in the kinds of skills necessary to advance in this economy," the chairman of his Council of Economic Advisers, Edward Lazear, said in a C-SPAN interview.

To that end, Mr. Bush proposed increasing Pell grants -- which provide needy students with money that doesn't have to be repaid -- to $4,600 in the 2008-2009 academic year from the current $4,050, and to $5,400 in 2012-2013 and boosting funding for the No Child Left Behind education law, Mr. Bush's school-improvement program.

Critics say the budget would exacerbate inequality by weakening programs that many middle- and low-income families rely on, such as 'energy assistance, child health care and job training.

"Rather than lean against this trend toward increased inequality, the budget would aggressively accelerate the trend," said Robert Greenstein, executive director of the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. While he said some of the president's proposals, like the Pell grant increase, would be modestly helpful, "those proposals are dramatically outweighed by the others in the budget."

For the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which helps states to cover low-income children, Mr. Bush proposes an increase of about $5 billion over five years, much lower than advocates say is needed to keep the current enrollees in the program. The budget also calls for limiting the eligibility to 200% of the federal poverty level, or $41,300 for a family of four for 2007. At least 17 states have expanded the eligibility, to as much as 350% of the poverty level.

The proposal contrasts with the idea of covering all children, which is favored by many Democrats and several governors. Mike Leavitt, Secretary of Health and Human Services, says that while the S-Chip program was intended to cover children in the poorest families, some states have expanded it to cover children from higher-income families and even adults.

The president's budget proposes cutting two Labor Department programs aimed at helping individuals who have lost their jobs, including a 17% cut to adult employment and training and a 14% cut for dislocated worker and employment training. Those cuts would be offset with funding for "career advancement accounts," which would provide $3,000 to individuals to be used toward school or training.

Another program aimed at retraining workers whose jobs are eliminated because of global trade would see flat funding, while cash benefits provided as part of Trade Adjustment Assistance -- which provides displaced workers with unemployment benefits, retraining and education -- would increase about 8% to $606 million.

As in years past, several social-welfare programs are slated for cuts, including a 30% cut to social service block grants, which are used by states to provide child care, child welfare and a variety of other services to vulnerable families. The budget also proposes to eliminate funding for community services block grants, down from $630 million. When President Bush has proposed similar cuts in the past, Congress hasn't accepted them.

Rep. Brad Miller, a North Carolina Democrat who campaigned heavily on the issue of income inequality, said the budget "doesn't appear to be any great shakes for the middle class." He said Democrats would undoubtedly press ahead with their own plans to help address the wage gap, including more money for education and job training.

$623B Marked For Pentagon Spending (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush's defense budget reflects the toll of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, proposing money to increase the size of the Army and Marine Corps and replace war-damaged weapons and equipment.

The budget also proposes buying new weapons and spending $141 billion to continue fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan next year. Bush's budget brings Pentagon spending to $623 billion for 2008. It also includes a supplemental request for $99 billion to pay for fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan and other costs of the war on terror for the rest of this year.

"The sums involved in the defense budget requests are staggering," House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton, D-Mo., said. "We cannot provide an adequate national defense on the cheap, but neither can we afford to simply ratify the president's request without performing the due diligence and oversight our Constitution requires."

Steven Kosiak, a defense analyst with the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, said the increases, accounting for inflation, would bring Pentagon spending to its highest level since 1946. Much of the increase can be traced not to the wars, he said, but to modernization efforts.

"This is an enormous amount of money for defense," Kosiak said. "We're back to spending levels that are slightly higher than the heyday of defense spending in the 1980s."

Highlights of the Pentagon budget proposal for 2008:

•Adding 7,000 soldiers to the Army and 5,000 new Marines. The president's goal is to add 65,000 soldiers to the Army by 2012 for a total of 547,000. The Marine Corps would grow by 27,000 Marines by 2011 for a total of 202,000. That would cost $12.1 billion in 2008, Pentagon comptroller Tina Jonas said.

•Spending $27 billion for new warplanes, including 20 F-22A Raptor fighter jets, 24 F/A-18 Hornet fighters, and 28 Predator unmanned aircraft. That represents an 18% increase compared with 2007.

•Spending $14.4 billion on new ships, an increase of $3.2 billion compared with 2007, or 29%. It would include funds for an aircraft carrier, a submarine and three fast, shallow-draft ships.

Bush's proposal also includes emergency spending to pay for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and other war on terrorism costs. His request of $99 billion for the rest of this year comes on top of $70 billion approved by the last Congress.

Here's how that money would be spent:

•$13.9 billion would be used to replace worn out or destroyed equipment, including helicopters and jets.

"This is repairing, replacing and upgrading combat losses or equipment that's experienced wear and tear in the theater," Jonas said.

•$39 billion for supplies, support and maintenance.

•$8 billion for better armor for troops and their vehicles and $2.4 billion to counter homemade bombs or improvised explosive devices.

Overall, the proposal calls for $4.3 billion for efforts against improvised explosive devices in 2007 through regular and supplemental funding. In 2008, it calls for $4 billion more.

•$5.9 billion to train and equip Afghan forces, and another $3.8 billion for Iraqi troops. The money would support training and equipment for 362,000 Iraqi security forces and 152,000 in Afghanistan.

"This initiative is, I think, key to the strategy in Iraq and Afghanistan," said Vice Adm. Steve Stanley, the Pentagon's director of force structure, resources and assessment.

Defense Spending Is Set For Sharp Rise (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe And Jonathan Karp

President Bush is asking for almost $625 billion in defense spending in 2008, a big increase but one that may not be enough to cover the rapidly increasing costs of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, additional personnel and the military's appetite for new weapons systems.

In a boon to defense contractors, weapons spending is set to rise even faster than the overall Pentagon budget. The administration is requesting $101.7 billion for new weapons purchases, a $20 billion increase over 2007. Including research and development, total weapons spending is set to grow to $176.8 billion, and just about every major weapons system is set to get more funding than in the current fiscal year.

Rep. Ike Skelton, the Missouri Democrat who chairs the House Armed Services Committee, suggested the Democratic-led Congress may move to pare back the defense budget. "We cannot provide an adequate national defense on the cheap, but neither can we afford to simply ratify the president's request without performing the due diligence and oversight our Constitution requires," Rep. Skelton said.

Excluding war costs, the White House is submitting an annual Pentagon budget of $481.4 billion, up 11% from enacted 2007 defense spending. But even if President Bush gets all the money he is asking for in the current budget, his plan to increase defense spending still leaves some big questions unanswered.

Some defense analysts say the Pentagon hasn't set aside enough money to pay for the 92,000 soldiers and Marines President Bush plans to add. To cover shortfalls in these personnel accounts, the military might have to raid its weapons modernization accounts. President Bush's budget also doesn't make any cuts to big weapons programs, such as fighter jets, ships or space programs, which are scheduled to grow even more expensive in the coming years as they hit full production. These surging costs could force Mr. Bush or his successor to make some hard decisions about how much new hardware the country can afford.

In addition to the annual Pentagon budget, Mr. Bush is requesting a further $93.4 billion to cover the costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan in 2007, bringing the total so-called emergency spending this year to $163.4 billion. For 2008, the president is seeking $141.7 billion for war expenses in a request that assumes his decision to send an additional 20,000 troops to Baghdad will have significantly reined in the sectarian bloodletting and disorder by the beginning of 2008 and that overall war spending will fall as these troops begin to come home. "This is our best judgment at this time," said Tina Jonas, the Pentagon's budget chief. She called the troop surge into Baghdad and restive al Anbar province a "near term initiative."

In virtually every other area of defense spending, ranging from personnel to weapons modernization, the Pentagon is projecting costs will continue to grow over the coming years. President Bush announced recently that he plans to add about 92,000 Marines and soldiers to the current force at a rate of about 12,000 troops a year. To that end, the White House has asked for about $12 billion to cover the costs of the new people as part of $137 billion in personnel spending.

But some defense analysts have suggested the real personnel costs could be more. The Bush administration will ask Congress to force military retirees to pay a greater share of their overall health-care costs. If that request is rejected -- as it was last year -- the Bush administration would have to find about $16 billion to cover the additional personnel costs over the next five years, says Cindy Williams, a defense analyst at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Boston.

If the military continues to struggle to recruit new soldiers and Marines, the Bush administration could be forced to find more money for recruiting bonuses, pay increases or to increase the number of recruiters on the street. "Recruiting has been a big struggle and it is reasonable to think that it might require even more resources," Ms. Williams said.

The big increase in weapons and war spending suggests the administration is banking on continued economic strength to absorb the rising costs.

Each of the services' main weapons programs are to get increased funding in 2008, but the increase masks some longer-term cutbacks. For instance, the Army's ground-forces modernization program, a Boeing Co.-led program called Future Combat Systems, is to get $3.7 billion in 2008, up from $3.4 billion this year, but the program has been pared to 14 manned and robotic vehicles, down from 18, and the program lost $3 billion, or 10% of expected funding, between 2008 and 2012. The request for F-35 Joint Strike Fighter Aircraft, a Lockheed Martin Corp. fighter jet for the Air Force, Navy and Marines, jumps to $6.1 billion in 2008 from $5 billion this year. But ambivalent about the new stealth fighter, the Navy plans to scale back purchases of the plane over the five following years. Lockheed's F-22 fighter for the Air Force, which entered service last year, is slated to get $4.6 billion, up from $4 billion in 2007.

Missile defense, President Bush's top strategic priority, is slated to receive $8.9 billion, or $500 million less next year than in 2007. Still, the administration's plan to buy more interceptor missiles for the Boeing-led program could face resistance from congressional Democrats. Michigan Sen. Carl Levin, chairman of the Senate Armed Forces Committee, has questioned the value of buying additional missiles until the shield's effectiveness is proven.

The administration's budget would take weapons funding to the highest level since the 1980s buildup under Ronald Reagan, said Steven Kosiak of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, an independent Washington think tank. He noted that the latest Pentagon plans call for another budget increase in 2009 before spending tapers back to 2008 levels in four years.

"One has to question the affordability of all this over time," he said. "There is still a significant mismatch between the Pentagon's long-term plans and the funding levels."

Bush's Defense Budget Biggest Since Reagan Era (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

President Bush's defense budget request of $481.4 billion -- an 11 percent boost over last year -- pushes U.S. defense spending to levels not seen since the Reagan-era buildup of the 1980s.

In addition, the president is seeking a projected $141.7 billion in emergency supplemental funding for 2008 for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and for broader anti-terrorism efforts -- bringing the total spent in those arenas since 2001 to $661 billion, eclipsing in real terms the cost of the Vietnam War.

Congressional Democrats and Republicans welcomed the fact that for the first time the administration had submitted its supplemental war funding requests at the same time as its defense budget, thus offering a clearer look at overall defense spending.

"This will help Congress and the American people gain a more realistic picture of the budget impact of the war in Iraq, the war in Afghanistan, and the broader war on terrorism," said Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

Pentagon officials noted that the 2008 supplemental request does not include additional funding for Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. The most recent 2007 supplemental request of $93 billion includes $5.6 billion to add five Army brigades and 4,000 Marines to the force in Iraq.

Undersecretary of Defense Tina W. Jonas called the troop increase "a near-term initiative," echoing recent suggestions by Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates that the increase is anticipated to last only several months.

Defense analysts have long argued that the war spending should be viewed in conjunction with the regular defense budget.

"We can't make heads or tails of the defense budget without understanding global war on terrorism funding," said Steven M. Kosiak, director of budget studies at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments (CSBA), a defense think tank. He said that because wartime supplemental budgets receive less scrutiny, there was an incentive for the military services to shift costs for modernization programs into those budgets.

The latest 2007 supplemental request, for example, includes $400 million for two of the Pentagon's most modern aircraft, the Joint Strike Fighter, to replace F-16 fighter jets that were lost in combat. "When in doubt, it's a war cost," Kosiak said.

Pentagon officials stressed that the 2008 supplemental request is likely to change depending on the progress of the wars.

"We know that it will be wrong," Jonas said at the briefing. She said the 2008 war spending request assumes pre-"surge" U.S. troop levels of 140,000 in Iraq and 20,000 in Afghanistan. "Conditions will change and we'll have to adjust," she said.

One of the biggest areas in which such an adjustment is likely is in funding to replace and repair equipment. So far the administration has asked for $37.5 billion for reconstituting equipment in 2007 and yesterday projected an additional $37.6 billion for 2008.

Army officials said yesterday that the addition of five Army brigades in Iraq probably would lead to additional equipment repair costs beyond the $13.6 billion the Army has budgeted for 2008. "That was based on an assumption of 15 brigades in combat. Now we're up to 20," said Lt. Gen. David Melcher, director of Army programs.

Reflecting another major cost of the Iraq and Afghanistan wars, the latest 2007 supplemental funding includes an additional $2.4 billion for the Pentagon organization tasked with combating roadside bombs, with an additional $4 billion projected for 2008.

The defense budget increases the proportion of overall defense spending that would go to the Army (from 25.4 percent to 27 percent), and the Marine Corps (from 3.7 percent to 4.3 percent), while lowering that for the Navy (25.5 to 24.8 percent) and Air Force (from 29.7 percent to 28.2 percent). The shift reflects the preponderant role of ground forces in today's wars but could also foreshadow intensified rivalry between the services, defense experts said.

"You're going to see a period of new intra-service rivalry," said Robert Work, a senior defense analyst at CSBA.

Part of the growth in the Army's and Marine Corps' budgets includes $12 billion toward an increase in those branches of 92,000 troops over the next five years. The 2007 supplemental also includes $3.6 billion to speed up the creation of two Army brigades and one Marine regimental combat team -- aimed at reducing stress on active-duty soldiers and Marines who now spend as much time in combat as at home.

Bush Budget Gives Boost To Defense (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

The Bush administration budget released yesterday provides $623 billion for defense in 2008, an increase of 4 percent from the current year and the largest sum in inflation-adjusted dollars since 1946 after the end of World War II.

Including national security programs of other agencies, such as the Departments of State and Energy, the United States would spend more on security next year than the rest of the world combined.

"Our priority is to protect the American people, and our priority is to make sure our troops have what it takes to do their jobs," Mr. Bush said after a Cabinet meeting.

The budget for fiscal 2008, which begins Oct. 1, provides $142 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, marking the first time Mr. Bush has estimated the cost of the two conflicts in advance. Congress also will be asked for an additional $93 billion in the current year.

Other Pentagon operations would be funded at $481 billion in the budget, which allocates $37 billion for the State Department and its foreign-aid programs.

According to the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute, total world defense spending amounts to about $1 trillion. The Defense Intelligence Agency, the Pentagon's intelligence arm, estimates that China comes in second after the United States by spending up to $100 billion annually. Russia is third at about $50 billion, followed by France, Japan, Britain, Germany and Italy.

DOJ_NMG_0128255

The budget estimates spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan at substantially less than the $170 billion being spent this year. It provides $50 billion for fiscal 2009 and nothing after that, but the White House insisted that the numbers do not indicate troop reductions.

"There will be no timetable set, and the reason why is because we don't want to send mixed signals to an enemy, or to a struggling democracy, or to our troops," Mr. Bush said.

Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman, said the budget numbers are not final and that it was "very, very difficult to project costs in future years."

The Pentagon's budget proposes a 3 percent pay increase for military members. Since 2001, military salaries have jumped by 32 percent. The proposal adds $4 billion to continue reducing the threat to troops in Iraq and Afghanistan from roadside bombs, which account for about 70 percent of U.S. battlefield casualties.

The Army, the military branch that bears the heaviest war burden, would receive the largest percentage increase in its budget: more than 20 percent to $130 billion. The Air Force, the Navy and the Marine Corps would get increases of 8 percent, 9 percent and 4 percent, respectively.

The overall budget to purchase weapons would total $102 billion, up more than 20 percent from fiscal 2007.

Mr. Bush's request, which faces significant opposition in Congress, calls for a budget increase of about 12 percent for the State Department.

Randall Tobias, the department's director for foreign assistance, said Israel and Egypt will remain the top recipients of U.S. aid. They will be awarded $2.4 billion and $1.7 billion respectively, he said, slightly less than last year.

Other top aid recipients are Afghanistan ($1.67 billion), Pakistan ($785 million) and Sudan ($673 million). Aid for Kosovo, the Serbian province that is moving toward independence, would nearly double to $151 million, Mr. Tobias said.

The budget of the Millennium Challenge Corp., which awards assistance using business principles such as setting fiscal and other benchmarks for developing nations, would almost triple to $3 billion.

The request proposes further cuts in support of counternarcotics efforts in South America.

Bush's 2008 Budget Request Doubles Spending On Replacing Military Equipment (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5 — More than a quarter of the money the Bush administration is requesting in the 2008 fiscal year for military operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere would go toward repairing and replacing military equipment, according to budget figures released Monday by the Pentagon.

The scale of the request illustrates the toll that years of combat in Iraq and Afghanistan are taking on the military's vehicles, aircraft, weapons and other equipment. But some budget experts say its size also raises questions about whether the military is using the argument that troops fighting in the field need equipment in top condition to increase purchases of equipment generally.

The budget request, if approved by Congress, would allocate $37.6 billion for refurbishment, from a war budget of $141 billion in the fiscal year beginning on Oct. 1.

To meet war costs between now and then, the administration is asking Congress for an immediate $93 billion, in a supplemental budget request that would add to what Congress approved months ago. And of that, $14 billion is for replacing equipment, bringing this year's total refurbishment budget, as well, to $37.6 billion.

Last year only half that much was spent for replacing equipment used up or worn out in the fighting.

The requests come at a time when the Senate is embroiled in a divisive dispute over whether to pass a resolution disapproving President Bush's war strategy. At the heart of the debate is the question of whether the resolution should promise not to cut spending for fielded forces.

Steven M. Kosiak, a military budget expert at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, said the military appeared to taking advantage of the political support for paying for whatever the troops need to provide in the budget for other items.

The Air Force, Mr. Kosiak noted, would receive $400 million for two F-35s, ostensibly to replace planes that were lost in the war. But the F-35 is an advanced fighter that is still on the drawing board and will not even be delivered for three more years, as replacement for other, older aircraft.

"We're not trying to get back to where we were," Mr. Kosiak said, "we're trying to get back to where we would like to be."

The Pentagon comptroller, Tina W. Jonas, said that officials had rejected efforts by the military services to insert expensive new hardware into the budget for replacements and refurbishments; but she said that the F-35s qualified as replacements for three other, older fighters that the Air Force had lost in recent years.

"We used a pretty tight rule set to scrub these budgets," Ms. Jonas said, "and we did return to the services some of their ideas. We've got a pretty careful scrub." She added that "combat losses are fair game here, and so we included them."

But Defense Department officials concede that some weapons systems are also being modernized, to make them more useful in Iraq and Afghanistan. Budget documents say the Army's M1A1 Abrams tank would receive an unspecified "system enhancement program" to improve its performance against urban threats "such as Baghdad."

As it has in the past, the Pentagon's long-term budget shows the costs of the war declining in the years ahead; Congress more than likely will be asked to increase expenditures in future years unless the fighting eases up.

The total war budget of $163 billion, sought in the 2007 fiscal year, is projected to be $141 billion in 2008 and just $50 billion in 2009, far enough in the future that the estimate is little more than a place holder.

Ms. Jonas said that the 21,500-troop increase Mr. Bush recently ordered for Iraq was not financed beyond the end of the 2007 fiscal year, when it is assumed for the sake of making a forecast that American troop levels will drop back to 140,000. Military officials say that the duration of the reinforcements will depend on security conditions, but that they could well last into next year.

The administration's overall request for $481.4 billion for 2008 for Defense Department costs excluding military operations represents an increase of about 11 percent in spending. It reflects the beginnings of what could be a long, costly increase in the size of the military.

Mr. Bush said last month that he wanted to increase the Army by about 7,000 soldiers a year, until reaching 547,000 troops by 2012, and by 5,000 marines annually until achieving a force size of 202,000 by 2011. The budget also provides $12.1 billion for increases in the Army and Marine Corps in 2008, officials said.

Democrats Face Limits In Changing Bush's Budget (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5 — With its military spending increases, reductions in popular domestic programs and calls to extend tax cuts, President Bush's $2.9 trillion budget for 2008 drew fire from Democrats the minute it landed on Monday.

But while Democratic critics may wish to challenge the administration's blueprint, political and fiscal constraints will make it hard for them to assert their own priorities.

In theory, the budget presents the Democrats their first real opportunity to rewrite the administration's policies, especially on tax cuts, that they have been attacking for six years.

But in practice, Democrats know that the only way they can find the revenue to restore the administration's proposed spending cuts would be to cut back on military spending, delay their stated intentions to balance the budget or rescind the Bush tax cuts in future years. They are not especially eager to do any of these.

The most likely result, even some Democrats acknowledge, will be a limited reshaping of the budget by restoring some proposed cuts in a variety of domestic programs, including children's health care, Head Start and home heating assistance for the poor and the elderly.

But few Democrats are expected to look for new revenues by calling for an end to Mr. Bush's tax cuts, instead of extending them as the president proposed Monday, or to deal with the looming costs of Social Security and Medicare as the postwar generation retires, all of which pose huge budget problems in future years.

"The long-term budget crisis appears so distant that it's going to be very hard to get politicians excited about it this year," said Robert D. Reischauer, president of the Urban Institute. "The economy is strong, and the deficit seems to be at manageable levels right now. No one wants to risk popular support by doing something courageous."

Since 2001, Democratic leaders have made a point of saying that the Bush tax cuts are unfairly weighted toward the wealthy and dangerous to American solvency. But the tax cuts expire in 2010, and Democrats acknowledge that they are not ready to move on them now.

One development could reopen the tax cuts to revision this year, Democrats say: a signal from the administration that it would be willing to consider a repeal of some cuts for the wealthiest as part of a deal to pay for other priorities.

The issues most often mentioned that might entice Democrats to the bargaining table with the administration would be a package to finance future Social Security benefits, possibly combined with a curb on some benefits. Democrats might also want to cut a deal over the alternative minimum tax, which was devised to make sure that wealthy taxpayers with numerous deductions paid some taxes but which is increasingly ensnaring the middle class because of inflation.

Democrats say that in both cases the administration would have to move first to put discussion of taxes on the table.

Both Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. and Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, have dropped hints of such deals, ruling out "preconditions" for talks on Social Security. The implication is that private investment accounts to replace Social Security for future retirees are not a requirement for a deal.

"By saying there are no preconditions and we should all come to the table, that was a change in position," Mr. Portman told reporters Monday, noting that in the past the administration had pushed its plan for the investment accounts from the outset.

He also said it was an "olive branch" to propose the accounts but to delay their enactment until 2012.

Democrats remain skeptical and distrustful. They note, for instance, a recent comment by Vice President Dick Cheney to Fox News that overtures by Mr. Paulson and Mr. Portman did not signal a change in administration attitudes on taxes, only a desire to get Democrats to negotiate.

Moreover, despite Mr. Portman's talk of olive branches, Democrats see only trapdoors. They say Mr. Bush's claim to reach the goal of balancing the budget by 2012 rested on what they see as shaky assumptions.

Mr. Portman acknowledged, for instance, that the budget assumed only a nominal cost — $50 billion — for the Iraq war in 2009 and no cost after that. In addition, the administration assumes that tax increases due to kick in years from now will do so, in spite of the near certainty that Congress will prevent them from occurring, widening the deficit further.

Another constraint on the Democrats is their adoption of a "pay as you go" approach, meaning that they have to find savings in other parts of the budget for any new spending they want to make.

The Democrats fear after campaigning on the promise of avoiding widening the budget deficit, they cannot afford to waver on that score now.

Still, not everyone in the party is a deficit hawk. Among the 2008 presidential candidates, former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina has already said that he would defer the goal of a balanced budget to finance health, education and help for the poor. Other Democrats, including several in the Senate, may well have to follow suit.

Last week, without much fanfare, House Democrats passed a stopgap spending bill for the current year that increased federal spending in cherished areas by only about 1 percent — exactly the rate of increase that the administration says it seeks in domestic programs for the coming year.

The box that the Democrats find themselves in is likely to remain a factor in their spending decisions this year.

Even Senator Kent Conrad, the North Dakota Democrat who is chairman of the Senate Budget Committee and the biggest Cassandra in Congress about the perils of continued deficits, seemed to acknowledge that he had had trouble convincing even fellow Democrats of the urgency of the long-term fiscal problems.

"Let me be frank," Mr. Conrad said at a recent budget hearing. "We're having a very difficult time persuading our colleagues and the administration of the need for urgent action."

Although Mr. Bush traveled to a Democratic retreat over the weekend and promised to try to accomplish "big things" with their help in his last two years of office, Democrats and their supporters tend to view the likelihood of budget fixes to be tiny, not big.

The Bush Budget: What's In $2.9 Trillion? (CSM)

By Peter Grier And Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON

President Bush's new proposed budget represents an attempt to make permanent some of his key changes in US domestic policy, while challenging the fiscal priorities of the new Democratic - controlled Congress.

What it may not represent is an easy pathway to the land of black ink. While the White House plan projects a balanced budget by 2012, some of its assumptions about future government spending are unrealistic, say some budget analysts.

In essence, the Bush budget may promise a budgetary nirvana in the future, while avoiding some of the messy details about the way that nirvana might be reached.

"They're trying to get you to focus on 2012 instead of 2008," says Stan Collender, a veteran federal budget expert and managing director of Qorvis Communications.

The release of the massive amount of paperwork that represents the executive branch's proposed budget for the coming fiscal year is a much anticipated annual event in official Washington, like the appearance of Punxsutawney Phil on Groundhog Day, or the March return of the swallows to San Juan Capistrano in California.

A president's opponents routinely deride his budget as dead on arrival. Despite this, months of congressional hearings on its details follow. In the end, much of the plan will provide a blueprint for the day-to-day operations of many federal departments and agencies.

It is the top lines of total spending and receipts, plus key budgetary assumptions, that can prove controversial. In this, President Bush's proposal for fiscal 2008 is no exception.

"I doubt that Democrats will support this budget, and frankly, I will be surprised if Republicans rally around it either," said House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt (D) of South Carolina, in a statement after the plan's release.

Mr. Bush's plan calls for $2.9 trillion in 2008 spending. It would make permanent his first-term tax cuts – reductions that, at this point, may well represent Bush's signature change in domestic policy.

Military spending would represent the government's largest area of growth. The Bush proposal calls for a Pentagon budget of $624.6 billion for fiscal 2008, up from $600.3 billion in 2007. Included is an estimated cost of $141.7 billion for fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan – the first time war costs have been wrapped into the annual budget instead of dealt with separately in supplemental appropriations.

The $141.7 billion may not represent the final spending figure for Iraq and Afghanistan, however. And the budget's longer-term projections include just $50 billion in war costs for fiscal 2009, and zero after that.

Considering the nature of wars, it is "very, very difficult to project costs in future years," said White House spokesman Tony Fratto on Monday.

Healthcare spending, by contrast, represents one of the budget plan's primary areas of restraint. The White House would squeeze $66 billion in savings from Medicare, the health insurance program for seniors, over the next five years, primarily by slowing the rate of growth of payments to healthcare providers. In addition, some $12 billion would be pared from Medicaid, the federal program for the indigent.

In addition, US government outlays for domestic discretionary spending – a category that includes everything from the FBI to the Food and Drug Administration – would be held to 1 percent growth, before inflation. Because costs are likely to rise more than 1 percent over the next year, this cap represents a cut, in real terms.

Republicans in Congress say that, overall, Bush showed fiscal responsibility with his plan, and that if the new Democratic majority on Capitol Hill were serious about balancing the budget, it should work with the White House, not criticize it.

"If they want to show they can govern, the path has been laid for them to control spending," said the ranking GOP member of the House Budget Committee, Rep. Paul Ryan (R) of Wisconsin, in a phone interview with reporters.

Critics of the Bush plan, however, say it is notable for what it excluded. For one, the White House made no serious attempt to pencil in post-2008 war costs, says Mr. Collender of Qorvis.

Nor did it include the cost of changing the Alternative Minimum Tax (AMT), a levy aimed at the wealthy that increasingly hits middle-class taxpayers. An AMT change is anticipated by lawmakers of both parties.

"Proposals that provide long-term savings are fully included in the Bush budget," says Collender. "Proposals that provide long-term increases [in spending], like the Iraq war or an AMT change, are not included."

Under assumptions that the Concord Coalition, a budget watchdog group, considers more plausible, Uncle Sam will remain $400 billion in the red in 2012. These assumptions include discretionary spending that keeps up with the increase in the gross domestic product, and a continuation of other current policies.

Bush Wants To Means-test Middle-class Benefits (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Krishna Guha

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

President George W. Bush presented his $2,900bn budget to Congress on Monday, setting the stage for a confrontation with Democrats by making greater means-testing for middle-class benefits a central part of his proposals to address entitlement reform.

The budget represents a challenge to parts of the system of entitlements enacted as part of the Great Society agenda of the 1960s, with plans to cut Medicare spending, the main publicly funded health insurance programme for those over 65, by raising premiums for wealthier recipients.

That could save $66bn over five years, according to budget estimates, and up to $9,000bn during the next 75 years, according to some analysts.

Michael Franc, vice-president for government relations at the Heritage Foundation, said Mr Bush had considered means-testing as part of Social Security reform. “Now there is a shift to applying it across the board for all entitlements. The big change concerns the wealthy. Democrats want to tax them more. Republicans say they want to make them pay more for their middle-class benefits and shoulder more of the burden.”

The progressive tilt was also underlined, Mr Franc said, by Mr Bush’s recent proposals to extend healthcare insurance by limiting large tax deductions for some employer-funded schemes, and his plans to cap the amount of farm subsidies granted to a single entity.

The budget underscored Mr Bush’s political priorities for his final two years, with proposals to aggressively fund defence, the Iraq war, homeland security and US diplomatic operations generously. According to budget forecasts, the deficit will decline from 1.8 per cent in fiscal 2007 to 1.6 per cent in fiscal 2008, before declining further to turn into a surplus of 0.3 per cent of gross domestic product in 2012.

Democrats, however, expressed doubts about the budget, with one committee chairman dismissing the rise in defence spending to a record $481bn, as “staggering”, while others questioned the political viability of the entitlement cuts. John Spratt, chairman of the House budget committee, said: “I doubt that Democrats will support this budget,” while Max Baucus, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said the proposed Medicare cuts “are more than the president has asked from any previous Congress during his administration”.

In addition to the proposals to increase means-testing in Medicare and other plans intended to slow the growth in entitlement spending in the long term, the budget set out to demonstrate it is possible to eliminate the federal deficit by 2012 while making the Bush tax cuts permanent. Energy policy was also confirmed as an important legacy issue in the budget with plans to encourage more aggressive use of renewable fuels.

Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, welcomed Mr Bush’s focus on fiscal conservatism.

“Balancing the budget by 2012 and making the tax cuts permanent is important, but more important is that by 2012 the share of GDP the government spends is set to fall from 20.3 per cent to 18.3 per cent.”

New Drug Benefit Could Have Higher Price For Some (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

WASHINGTON — Higher-income Medicare beneficiaries — those earning more than $80,000 individually or $160,000 as a couple — would pay more for the new drug benefit under the president's budget released Monday.

The plan is part of a package of proposals aimed at slowing the growth in the Medicare program, whose hospital trust fund may go broke in 11 years. It comes as part of a package of proposals to:

•Trim $66 billion from Medicare over five years. About $42 billion would come from limits on annual inflation adjustments for hospitals, nursing homes, hospices and surgical centers.

•Reduce Medicaid spending by about $13 billion over five years.

•Increase funding for the State Children's Health Insurance Program (CHIP) by $5 billion over five years. But it would place restrictions on the amount of money states can get if they choose to cover children in families above 200% of the federal poverty level, or about $40,000 for a family of four.

"This is an aggressive and responsible budget," Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said.

The budget proposals drew fire from some Democrats, such as Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., and patient-advocacy groups such as Families USA, that want increased funding for the children's health program.

"It could take as much as $15 billion additional simply to maintain CHIP coverage for children already enrolled, but I intend for the Finance Committee to do even more to keep kids healthy," Baucus said in a statement.

The administration says the program needs to remain focused on its original target market: children in homes at or below 200% of poverty. At least 16 states have added kids whose families earn more, resulting in about 400,000 additional children being covered. States could continue to cover kids above the 200% poverty level, but would receive a smaller percentage of federal matching funds for them.

Medicare advocates, such as the AARP and the Medicare Rights Center, opposed the plan to increase costs for beneficiaries.

"The president is looking to save money in all the wrong places," said Bob Hayes of the Medicare Rights Center, who says that savings should first come from allowing Medicare to negotiate drug prices and reductions in payments to insurers who offer alternatives to traditional Medicare.

Some conservatives, however, such as Joe Antos at the American Enterprise Institute, said the Medicare trims will be a small help, but more is needed.

"To the extent we can generate a little bit more in premiums, it's going to help a little bit," Antos says. "The bigger fix is to find away to improve the efficiency of the program."

Under the Medicare proposal, the president would phase down federal premium subsidies to beneficiaries who earn more than $80,000 a year, meaning the members would pay more. A similar measure is already in effect for higher-income beneficiaries under Part B of the program, which covers such things as doctor visits.

Currently, the federal government pays 74.5% of the average national premium for the drug benefit and the member picks up the rest. Under the proposals, singles earning between $80,000 and $100,000 — the income limits double for couples — would see the subsidy reduced to 65%.

Those singles earning $100,000 to $150,000 would get a 50% premium subsidy; $150,000 to $200,000, would get 35%; those earning more than $200,000 would have a 20% subsidy.

Medicare estimates the plan would affect 868,000 people, about 2.7% of Medicare members, the first year, rising to 1.2 million in 2012. Savings would be $3.2 billion over five years.

Bush Budget Pinches Domestic Spending (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, February 6, 2007

President Bush unveiled a $2.9 trillion budget Monday that rewards the Pentagon with a record $50 billion budget hike but pinches programs cherished by Democrats, including health research and heating subsidies for the poor.

DOJ_NMG_0128261

In control of Congress for the first time in a dozen years, Democrats accused Bush of trimming domestic programs, using smoke and mirrors to predict a balanced budget in five years and ignoring a hidden tax threat to middle-class families. His $245 billion request for Iraq and Afghanistan has given lawmakers sticker shock.

Despite common agreement that something must be done soon about the spiraling cost of benefit programs such as Social Security and Medicare, Bush recommended mostly modest steps — while refusing to consider tax hikes that could draw Democrats into negotiations.

"There's a lot of skittishness on both sides about coming to the table," said Sen. Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, the top Republican on the Senate Budget Committee. "The White House is afraid of taxes and the Democrats are afraid of controlling spending."

Democrats went on the attack.

"The president has simply offered more of the same, proposing a budget that cuts ... from Medicare and Medicaid, while sending $240 billion more in American taxpayer dollars to Iraq," said Rep. Rahm Emmanuel, D-Ill. "This is not a tradeoff the American people want."

Bush touted his fiscal blueprint as "protecting the homeland and fighting terrorism, keeping the economy strong with low taxes and keeping spending under control." He said after meeting with his Cabinet, "Congress needs to listen to a budget which says no tax increase, and a budget, because of fiscal discipline, that can be balanced in five years."

Bush said $245 billion is needed for military and diplomatic operations in Iraq and Afghanistan over the next year and a half, bringing total Pentagon funding for the wars to $662 billion. But his budget assumes, at least on paper, that no additional war funding will be needed after 2009.

Bush also proposed modest cuts to the rapidly growing Medicare and Medicaid health care programs, but failed to address chronic shortfalls in future years that would force painful sacrifices on beneficiaries. Instead, Medicare providers such as hospitals, nursing homes and home care providers would face payment cuts, while higher-income beneficiaries would pay greater premiums.

Less ambitious Bush proposals went nowhere when Republicans controlled Congress last year, and the budget process broke down amid election-year acrimony. Health care providers promised to lobby hard to kill the proposals again.

"Today's budget is devastating news for children, seniors and the disabled who depend on the Medicare and Medicaid programs," said Rich Umbdenstock, president of the American Hospital Association. "They are being unfairly singled out to carry the burden of achieving a balanced budget."

The cuts to Medicaid would come in part from curbing payments to states for administrative costs, which advocates for the poor say would force states to pass those cuts on to the poor.

Democrats griped that Bush would meet his five-year balanced-budget goal by forecasting far higher tax revenues than nonpartisan congressional estimators expect. His budget predicts a $61 billion surplus in 2012, but the plan would generate almost $100 billion in red ink that year instead under more cautious Congressional Budget Office revenue estimates.

White House officials countered that their estimates are in line with mainstream economists and are produced by career professionals at the Treasury Department.

"Instead of painting a rosy scenario on revenues to get to balance, we take a cautious approach," said Budget Director Rob Portman.

Extending Bush's tax cuts, most of which are to expire in 2010, would cost $211 billion in 2012 and $1.6 trillion over the next decade, according to budget documents.

Iraq continues to weigh on the nation's finances, accounting for well over half of the current year's projected deficit of $244 billion. For 2008, the budget year that begins Oct. 1, Bush sees just a slight decline in the deficit to $239 billion. He expects the decline to continue until reaching a surplus in 2012, three years after he has left office.

Democrats challenged those projections, contending that Bush would achieve a surplus only by leaving out the many billions of dollars Congress is expected to spend to keep the alternative minimum tax from ensnaring millions of middle-class taxpayers. His budget includes an AMT fix for just one year.

In theory, this could be a productive year on the budget since there's no election. Also, it can be easier to make painful budget choices when there is divided government. That's because it's virtually impossible for one political party to pass politically painful cuts to programs such as Medicare all by itself, but the job can be made easier if both parties agree to make the leap.

Thus far, however, there's no sign of that. Bush is focused on Iraq and is sagging in opinion polls. He doesn't seem inclined to exert much political muscle on the budget, and Democrats won't take the lead on their own.

"The president really does have to play a leadership role and he's got to be willing to use up some of his capital," said Bob Greenstein, who heads the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. "And I just don't see it happening in the current environment."

Bush proposes to eliminate or sharply reduce 141 federal programs totaling $12 billion. But Congress has ignored these same recommended cuts in the past, including an attempt last year to kill the Commodity Supplemental Food Program, which provides nutritionally balanced boxes of food to about a half-million poor people per month.

Democrats also promised to restore cuts from low-income heating subsidies, Head Start for preschool children, rural health programs and the Corporation for Public Broadcasting by shifting some portion of Bush's big defense hike to domestic programs.

In addition, they are sure to again kill many proposed fees such as a medical care enrollment fee on higher-income veterans and higher co-payments for their prescription drugs. Congress has rejected both four years in a row. But Bush dropped a much-reviled increase in airline ticket taxes to pay for security screenings.

Bush is proposing a few high-profile spending boosts, such as an increase in the maximum Pell grant for low-income students, from the current $4,050 to $4,600. The $15 billion cost over five years would largely be borne by cutting subsidies to lenders issuing student loans.

The president's budget also includes an initiative — billed as "dead on arrival" by Democrats — to expand health care coverage to the uninsured. The complex proposal would give every family a $15,000 tax deduction for purchasing health coverage but would make current employee-supplied health coverage taxable for certain taxpayers.

Bush's plan would save most taxpayers money, but Democrats say it would lead many employers to stop providing health insurance.

Bush Plan Reins In Domestic Spending (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

President Bush took aim yesterday at domestic spending as part of a plan to balance the budget in five years without raising taxes while increasing funding for the Iraq war and permanently expanding the military.

With the $2.9 trillion budget he submitted to Congress, Bush signaled he would attempt to squeeze spending on health care, education, housing and other domestic programs important to the Democratic majority for the duration of his term. Overall domestic spending would be held below the rate of inflation in the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1 and frozen thereafter.

The new Bush budget would also seek to reduce the rapid rate of growth in Medicare and Medicaid, trimming $101 billion from the two programs over the next five years by reducing payments to health-care providers and forcing wealthier seniors to pay more for physician services and prescription drug coverage. And it would provide additional funds for the Children's Health Insurance Program, but not enough to maintain the same enrollment over the next five years, according to independent analysts.

Bush said his plan would bolster national security while "keeping the economy strong with low taxes and keeping spending under control." But Democratic leaders, who will control the budget process for the first time since Bush took office, immediately denounced the plan as an irresponsible attempt to make costly tax cuts for the wealthy permanent and to finance the war by shortchanging children, the elderly and the nation's long-term fiscal health.

"It is disingenuous for the president to suggest cuts to Medicare and Medicaid that he knows the Congress will not support," said House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.). "It's not going to happen."

Some Democrats also questioned the president's math, saying his budget plan relies on a series of rosy economic assumptions to transform the nation's $248 billion deficit into a $61 billion surplus by 2012. Even if the plan is successful,

Democrats noted, the president would only be restoring the country's fiscal condition to the surplus he inherited when he took office in 2001.

"This budget is filled with debt and deception, disconnected from reality, and continues to move America in the wrong direction," said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.).

While the spending blueprint met resistance from Democrats, it appeared to shore up the president's position with conservatives in his own party, who have been deeply unhappy with the growth of federal spending over the past six years. In comments to reporters yesterday, Bush emphasized his desire to reduce the number of congressional pork-barrel projects, known as earmarks, and acquire a line-term veto -- favorite initiatives of fiscal conservatives.

Extending Bush's first-term tax cuts, a collection of rate reductions and tax credits that has kept more than $1 trillion in taxpayers' pockets since 2001, would cost the Treasury an estimated $374 billion between 2008 and 2012, according to the administration. Most of the cuts are scheduled to expire in 2010.

Bush's advisers yesterday credited the tax cuts for the nation's healthy economy and said keeping them in place is essential to maintaining economic growth. A growing economy, in turn, they said, will continue to stimulate tax collections, making it possible to balance the budget even while paying increasing sums for the Iraq war.

White House budget director Rob Portman stressed that point in a briefing for reporters. "The cost of the war is reflected in the administration's deficit projections," he said. "In fact, there has been a $165 billion decrease in our deficit over the past two years, and that includes all of the war costs that we've incurred during that time."

Bush's proposed fiscal 2008 budget would provide another big boost in spending for the war and overall defense and diplomatic spending. The budget plan includes $623 billion for the military next year, including $141 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and a $50 billion down payment on the president's plan to permanently increase the size of the armed forces by 92,000 over the next five years.

The State Department would receive nearly $35 billion, an increase of more than 20 percent over current spending estimates, plus $3 billion in emergency spending related to the administration's "global war on terror."

Federal agencies other than State, the Pentagon and Homeland Security would receive increases of about 1 percent over 2007 spending estimates, with requests for eight agencies -- including education and environment -- falling below fiscal 2006 levels.

Bush proposes a number of new initiatives, including a plan to boost the size of Pell grants to help students pay for college, a program to fund pilot projects to reduce traffic congestion and a new effort to raise $3 billion in public and private matching funds to improve national parks. But those programs' costs would be offset with cuts elsewhere.

For example, the Education Department's request for discretionary funding would rise $10 million over the 2007 estimate -- about 1 percent less than the agency received in 2006. The increase for Pell grants and an extra $1.2 billion for elementary and secondary education would be paid for in part by slashing subsidies to the banks that provide student loans and eliminating a student loan program for students at vocational and technical schools.

The Justice Department would get about a 1 percent increase, including substantial boosts for counterterrorism and counterintelligence programs and more than 220 new FBI agents. But law enforcement groups say the proposal would effectively cut grants and other assistance to local police by 75 percent at a time when violent crime is rising nationally.

And state officials complained that the president is seeking an 18 percent reduction in funds to provide heating assistance to 5.6 million low-income families, a proposal that would force states either to contribute more money or cut off assistance to about 1 million families.

Democratic budget leaders decried the cuts, many of which have appeared in previous Bush budgets.

"These things have been around the track numerous times and never made it to the finish line," said House Budget Committee Chairman John M. Spratt Jr. (D-S.C.). "It's doubtful they're going to pass."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) also criticized the president for allowing the alternative minimum tax to expand to millions of additional families by 2012, subjecting them to substantial tax increases. The tax was originally conceived as a way to ensure that wealthy Americans did not escape paying taxes.

Grover G. Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform and a staunch administration advocate, said conservatives are likely to applaud the package. "By putting a line in the sand that says that 'You can -- and I have -- balanced the budget without raising taxes,' then the Democrats have to do the same," Norquist said.

Bush's Austere Health Proposal Draws Complaints (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — The budget President Bush proposed Monday calls for the deepest Medicare cuts of his six years in office and falls short in expanding health coverage to uninsured children -- a top priority for congressional Democrats this year.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt acknowledged the budget's austere tone but said action was needed to rein in programs growing at an unsustainable pace.

"A very clear priority of the budget has been to reach balance in 2012," he told reporters Monday, "and that has forced many of the hard decisions."

Consumer and industry groups -- including AARP, the American Medical Association, the American Cancer Society, the Alzheimer's Association and the California Hospital Association -- roundly criticized Bush's plan, and their opposition signaled that it is unlikely to gain traction.

Rep. Pete Stark, D-California, chairman of the House Ways and Means subcommittee on health, dismissed the budget as "an exercise in make-believe intended to incite partisanship, not invite policymaking."

Separately, Bush's proposed tax deduction of up to $15,000 for health insurance ran into more problems after an independent analysis concluded that most of the tax break would go to higher-income households that already have private insurance.

Bush had outlined the plan last month in his State of the Union address. But a study by the Lewin Group, a health-care consulting company, found that only about 21 percent of the tax breaks would go to families with one or more uninsured person. Just over half the benefit would go to families earning $75,000 or more.

"The money is not being targeted at those who are most in need of it," said John Sheils, a Lewin vice president.

The budget's curbs on Medicare spending included reductions in payments to hospitals, nursing homes, hospice programs, home health providers and ambulance companies. Also, upper-income beneficiaries would have to pay higher premiums for prescription coverage and doctors' services.

But the proposal left Medicare managed-care plans largely alone, to the chagrin of Democrats who see the private plans as undermining the traditional government program.

The Medicare cuts -- described by an HHS budget official as the biggest Bush has ever proposed -- would total nearly $66 billion over five years. Administrative and anti-fraud measures would save an additional $10 billion. Taken together, the proposals would slow the rate of increase in Medicare spending by about 1 percentage point between 2008 and 2012, to 5.6 percent.

Bush also called for almost $26 billion in cuts for Medicaid, which provides health care for the poor, over the same period.

Some congressional Republicans expressed misgivings. "These are alarming proposals to our health-care system, and many have already been denied by Congress," said Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore.

Sen. Michael Enzi of Wyoming, the ranking Republican on the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, stopped short of criticizing the budget but noted: "At the end of the day, the House and Senate control the purse strings ... (and) the final document may look very different from the president's proposals."

On children's insurance, Bush proposed to renew the politically popular State Children's Health Insurance Program, which is set to expire this year. The federal-state program provides coverage to as many as 6 million children whose parents make too much to qualify for Medicaid but too little to afford private insurance.

But where Democrats estimate it will take as much as $15 billion in additional spending over five years to maintain the current caseload, Bush proposed only about $5 billion. Administration officials said their calculations show no children would lose coverage, but activists for the poor were highly skeptical of such assurances.

Even if Bush's health-care budget is unlikely to survive as a whole, Democrats might resurrect parts of it to help pay for their priorities -- such as an expansion of coverage for children.

"This is like a menu of issues on the table," said David Certner, a top lobbyist for AARP. "These are much larger cuts than Congress would entertain, but members may pick and choose among them as they put together their own proposals."

How Plans To Expand Health Coverage Could Affect Insured (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

New prescriptions to help the uninsured are proliferating by the day, but some of the proposals would have a big impact on another group -- people who already have health insurance.

Yesterday, Democratic presidential hopeful John Edwards became the latest entrant in the health-overhaul derby, announcing that he would raise taxes to expand coverage. (See related story.1) His plan, like those of many states working to expand coverage, would require employers to "play or pay" -- meaning cover their workers or pay a new tax. He would also require most Americans to have insurance, helping middle- and lower-income people by offering tax credits. Both the uninsured and those who already have insurance through work would have the option to get coverage through new public pools called Health Markets.

Mr. Edwards's plan joins an array of proposals already being advanced by the White House, several states (including California, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania), members of Congress and insurance and consumer groups. With health care shaping up as a major issue in the 2008 elections, more plans are on the way, including from Democratic presidential candidates Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama.

The blueprints aim to reduce the number of uninsured people in the U.S., currently at 46 million, but use different strategies. Two of the plans -- by President Bush and Sen. Ron Wyden, an Oregon Democrat -- have the potential to affect nearly all Americans by fundamentally altering the employer-sponsored system that now provides coverage to 175 million people.

On the federal level, the chances of any of these proposals being enacted this year are slim, given that there is little consensus and little money to spend on any plan that would increase subsidies. Still, activity in this area is building and, if Congress and the White House are looking to make a deal on something major, they might look to health care.

The states have a better chance of quick action, with Democrats and Republicans working to find consensus. In Massachusetts, a plan has already been passed and is being implemented.

Here's a look at how the plans work, and some potential winners and losers:

PRESIDENT BUSH'S PLAN: Under the Bush plan, employer-provided health insurance, now excluded from workers' taxable income, would be subject to income and payroll tax. As a tradeoff, all taxpayers with insurance would get a standard deduction of $15,000 for a family and $7,500 for an individual.

Among the winners would be those whose coverage costs less than $15,000 a year -- or about 80% of workers who have job-based insurance, the White House says. For example, a worker with a family policy costing him and his employer $10,000 a year would still be able to take the full deduction of $15,000. Losers would include people with family policies worth more than $15,000, including executives with generous benefits and some union workers who have traded wage increase for better health coverage. They would be taxed on the amount that exceeds the deduction.

But winners could turn into losers with time. Even people with policies under the cap could eventually hit the ceiling as health costs rise. That's because the cap would be indexed to general inflation -- not health-care inflation, which has risen more rapidly in recent years.

Clear winners would be the 17 million people who buy insurance on the open market. Currently, they don't get any tax break for purchasing health insurance. But like any tax deduction, the one for health-insurance would be most valuable in dollar terms for people with high incomes who pay the most taxes. Low-income people who don't owe any income tax wouldn't be able to use the deduction -- they would have their payroll taxes reduced instead. But that could cause a serious, unintended problem: Since those taxes go into the Social Security coffers, people paying in less would get lower benefits in retirement.

"This could translate into a very substantial drop in retirement living standards," concluded an analysis by the Tax Policy Center, a joint venture of two liberal-leaning think tanks, the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution.

The White House acknowledges that changing the tax treatment of insurance would reduce the number of uninsured by only three million to five million. It has proposed a separate initiative that would redirect federal funds from hospitals that provide indigent care to help states expand coverage to the uninsured.

Some experts see another potential problem: If younger, healthier employees use the tax deduction to buy insurance on their own, rather than through their employers, then employer health plans could end up with mostly older, sicker workers, resulting in higher premiums. "It's good for you if you're a healthy person who will do well on your own," says Paul Fronstin, director of health research and education programs at the Employee Benefit Research Institute. "It's bad if you are not."

But Joseph Antos, a health-policy expert at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, doubts many people would jump into the open insurance market, considering it's so much easier to stay in an employer plan. "It takes a lot to get people to move," says Mr. Antos.

SEN. WYDEN'S PROPOSAL: Sen. Wyden's plan, in many ways, is the most radical one on the table. He would sever the link between employment and insurance altogether and require everyone to buy coverage directly from insurance companies, much like people now buy auto insurance. He initially would require that employers pay their workers the cash that they had been spending on health insurance. He argues that employers would ultimately continue the practice, even when no longer required, to keep the best workers.

Beyond that, he would provide a tax break to help people pay their insurance premiums, and give low-income Americans direct subsidies for coverage. A new tax on employers would help pay for the program. New rules would require insurance companies to cover anyone who applied for insurance, even ones with existing medical conditions, and would bar the companies from charging sick people higher premiums.

Under this plan, people with insurance will have a greater choice of health plans than most get from work today, given that the market is likely to produce more options. But as health costs and insurance premiums rise, families would have to absorb the increase. As is, employers pass the cost of rising health care to their workers through higher premiums and lower wages, but workers don't always feel the impact, says John Sheils of Lewin Group, a health-care consulting firm that helped develop the Wyden plan. Everyone would be required to buy insurance even if they don't think they need it. Sen. Wyden describes a young, healthy man he met in central Oregon who told him that he didn't think he needed coverage. Sen. Wyden noted that the young man was a skier and asked him, "What if you crack up on the mountain?" The man replied that if he got hurt he would buy insurance then. "That's not how insurance works," Sen. Wyden says. "This is going to be a huge education job."

STATE EFFORTS: Several states including Massachusetts, California and Pennsylvania are working to expand health coverage through a combination of approaches: People without insurance would be required to buy it. Low-income families would get subsidies to do so. All but the smallest employers would have to provide coverage to their workers or pay fines. And states would make it easier for individuals and small businesses to buy coverage from central pools.

These approaches wouldn't directly affect those who already have insurance, though if more healthy people were added to the insurance pool, it could reduce the cost of coverage for everybody, says Mr. Fronstin of the Employee Benefit Research Institute. The biggest impact would be on the low-income uninsured who would be eligible for new subsidies, says Paul Ginsburg, president of the Center for Studying Health System Change, a Washington think tank. "They are out-and-out winners."

A COALITION PROPOSAL: A diverse collection of consumer, business, medical and insurance groups called the Health Coverage Coalition for the Uninsured is recommending another approach that tries to reduce the number of people without insurance without affecting people who already have it. It suggests making it easier to enroll the 6.6 million children who are eligible but not yet signed up for Medicaid, the state-federal health program for the poor and disabled, or the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which targets low-income kids who don't qualify for Medicaid.

It also recommends a new tax credit to help low-income families pay for private insurance, including coverage that may be offered through work.

If this plan became law, families who earn less than 300% of the federal poverty level could get help paying for health coverage. And single adults, even if they don't have kids, would become eligible for Medicaid if they were below the poverty line. Taxpayers would pick up the cost -- an estimated $60 billion over five years.

While many want to expand the Children's Health Insurance Program, the Bush administration wants to scale it back. States have been adding children and some of their parents to the program's rolls, but yesterday the administration proposed cutting enrollment of all adults, as well as children in families with incomes over 200% of the poverty level.

JOHN EDWARDS'S PLAN: Former Sen. Edwards's plan wouldn't require any changes of employees currently getting insurance on the job, although employers would have to provide coverage or pay 6% of their payroll. He would use a blend of new tax increases, tax breaks and subsidies to expand coverage. Under his proposal, people who don't get insurance through work could buy into public pools called Health Markets, with tax credits to help pay the premiums. Further, insurance companies wouldn't be able to charge sick people extra and would be required to insure everyone who applied. Mr. Edwards also would expand Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program, to cover more families and, for the first time, poor adults without kids. Once it was all in place, he would require nearly all Americans to get coverage one way or another.

The uninsured, though, would have a handful of new options. Those with particularly low incomes may become newly eligible for government programs. Others, including families with incomes up to $80,000 a year, could get new tax breaks to buy insurance from the Health Markets. Those with insurance through work could also opt to get it from the Health Markets as well, where there might be more choices.

Slow Growth In Health (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

President Bush would increase current funding levels for the state-federal Children's Health Insurance Program by $5 billion over the next five years -- far short of the $12 billion or more that experts say is needed to keep covering the 6 million children now in the program. The program, which costs about $5 billion annually, helps provide health coverage to children whose families earn too much to qualify for Medicaid but still cannot afford insurance on their own. The administration wants states to focus on serving children whose families earn 200 percent of the poverty level, or $41,300 for a family of four.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) said, "Congress must do more to fund the Children's Health Insurance Program than the president suggests here."

In Medicare and Medicaid, which serve nearly 93 million Americans, Bush would slow growth in spending for both programs by a combined $101 billion over five years, partly through changes in Medicare payments to hospitals, nursing and rehabilitation facilities, and home health agencies, and through changes in the way Medicaid pays for prescription drugs. He also proposed triggering across-the-board cuts in provider payments if Medicare spending reaches certain levels.

In the Medicare prescription drug benefit, individuals who earn more than $80,000 annually (and couples who earn more than $160,000) would have to pay higher premiums than less affluent beneficiaries enrolled in the same drug plans. The change would affect 1.1 million people in 2008.

Health Industry Cool To Bush Budget Cuts (AP)

By Kevin Freking

AP, February 6, 2007

Health care providers would see their reimbursement rates from the federal government go up less in coming years when they care for the elderly, poor and disabled under President Bush's budget.

The recommendations, if adopted by Congress, would trim Medicare spending by $66 billion over five years. Also, the administration will move to trim another $10 billion in Medicare spending through regulations.

Together, the changes sought for Medicare means the program would grow at a 5.6 percent clip rather than 6.5 percent, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said Monday.

"The program will continue to grow. It will have robust growth," Leavitt said.

Bush also calls for reducing Medicaid spending by about $25 billion over five years. That change would just slightly dent the more than $1.2 trillion the federal government will spend on the program during that span. Congress would have to sign off on about half of the proposed Medicaid savings. The remainder are regulatory changes the administration will pursue.

The two programs account for about $1 out of every $5 spent by the federal government. The president called for smaller reductions last year, and those proposals went nowhere.

Democratic lawmakers were cool to the recommendations. Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif., said that trimming Medicaid will make it harder for states to fund health care for the poor and the uninsured.

Stark, who oversees the House Ways and Means Committee's health subcommittee, said savings can be achieved by targeting payments to health care providers, but not in the ways that Bush sought.

For example, Stark said that he believes Congress can lower payments to insurance companies that provide managed care for seniors, a concept the administration opposes.

Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, noted that the proposed Medicare reductions are more than the president asked from any previous Congress.

Baucus took issue with the changes that Bush seeks for the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which provides health coverage to about 6 million people.

The program cost about $5 billion annually. The president called for an additional $4.2 billion in funding over five years, but Baucus said it may take as much as $15 billion over the same period to maintain current health insurance coverage.

"Simply put, Congress must do more to fund the Children's Health Insurance Program than the president suggests here," Baucus said.

Some Republican lawmakers defended the president's budget. They said that entitlement programs are growing at an unsustainable rate.

"We must reform these programs in order to save them," said Rep. Jim McCrery, R-La.

But hospitals, nursing homes and other providers say that they can't afford lower payments from the government. They said that the payments won't keep up with the cost of providing health care.

The effect of the budget on providers would differ depending upon the specialty, but almost all would be affected one way or the other. The reimbursement rates for providers increase each year to account for inflation and other factors. The president wants to limit those updates, and, in some cases, such as with home health agencies and nursing homes, the payments would be frozen next year at 2007 levels.

The administration will also ask wealthier beneficiaries to pay higher premiums. Individuals who make more than $80,000 a year and couples who make more than $160,000 would pay a higher premium for their prescription drug coverage under Medicare Part D.

They already pay higher Medicare premiums for doctor visits. Under the president's proposal, the income threshold would not be indexed to increase at the rate of inflation. As a result, more and more people would fall into that category as inflation pushes incomes upward.

Many of the agencies within Health and Human Services will have to make do with about the same amount of money as they got this year.

"We are serving our citizens with compassion while maintaining sensible stewardship of their tax dollars," Leavitt said.

The budget recommends an estimated $50 million reduction for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, which is the principal agency for protecting the health and safety of all Americans. Funding for the agency would total $5.76 billion. Grants to states for bioterrorism preparation would be reduced, and funding remains at current levels for preventing the nation's leading health problems — heart disease and cancer.

Meanwhile, funding for the National Institutes of Health, which oversees medical research, would rise nearly 2 percent to about $28.7 billion.

The president upped his recommendation for the Food and Drug Administration to about $2.1 billion. That's a $106 million increase compared to what he requested last year. The increases focused on strengthening food safety and getting more generic drugs to the market.

Numerous advocacy groups took issue with the president's budget.

"This is not a budget that the nationwide cancer community was hoping for after the president's visit to NIH last month to tout an historic decline in cancer deaths," said Daniel E. Smith of the American Cancer Society.

The AARP's Bill Novelli said the Medicare and Medicaid savings reflect an annual rite in Washington — "piecemeal cuts that threaten to damage critical programs without addressing the fundamental problems that exist in our entire health care system."

Bush's And Spitzer's Budgets Hit New York Hospitals Hard (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peña

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

The budget that President Bush proposed yesterday includes deep cuts in spending to train young doctors, cuts that would hit New York especially hard, eliminating several hundred million dollars a year in payments to teaching hospitals around the state.

The proposals arrived just days after Mr. Bush put forward a different set of cuts that would affect New York much more than the rest of the country, and after Gov. Eliot Spitzer proposed significant health care cuts of his own.

The combined reductions would total more than 4 percent of New York hospitals' total incomes — well over $1 billion a year — a prospect that left industry officials and elected officials struggling to describe the dire effects.

"This is the worst, the most damaging scenario," said Kenneth E. Raske, president of the Greater New York Hospital Association.

In particular, the cuts would take money from the academic medical centers that teach new doctors and do a large share of advanced medical research. New York City has by far the largest concentration of teaching hospitals in the country, training about one in seven of the nation's interns and residents, many of whom go on to practice elsewhere.

A hospital-by-hospital analysis by Mr. Raske's group shows how uneven Mr. Spitzer's proposed cuts would be, with the losses concentrated in the city. In all, the governor would cut about 1 percent from hospitals' revenue.

While some hospitals would actually gain money from the changes, others would see significant cuts, like two hospitals in Brooklyn that are already short of cash — Interfaith Medical Center, which would lose 6 percent of its total income, and Brooklyn Hospital Center, which would lose 4 percent.

On seeing the plans laid out by Mr. Bush, Senators Charles E. Schumer and Hillary Rodham Clinton, members of the new Democratic majority in Congress, vowed to fight them.

"Much of the damage that the president seeks to do will be undone, but to say we can eliminate all of it would not be right," Mr. Schumer said.

He called the president's proposals "an all-out assault on graduate medical education" and a "dagger to the heart of New York health care."

In its budget summaries, the Bush administration described the changes as needed to rein in rapidly growing health care spending, and to fight the practice of expanding government programs beyond their intended boundaries.

Medicare, the federal health plan for the elderly and the disabled, is a major supporter of training programs for interns and residents at teaching hospitals. In New York and some other states, Medicaid, the program for the poor, also pitches in for that training — known as Graduate Medical Education, or G.M.E. — while other states have opted not to take that step.

Mr. Bush proposed gradually eliminating that use of Medicaid money — about $600 million a year in federal funds for New York, more than any other state.

"Current law does not explicitly authorize such payments," the administration's budget summary said. "Paying for G.M.E. is outside of Medicaid's primary purpose, which is to provide medical care to low-income individuals."

The president also called yesterday for abolition of one type of Medicare payment for doctor training — again, a cut that would disproportionately affect New York. The hospital group estimated the cost to New York hospitals at more than $100 million a year.

DOJ_NMG_0128270

Two weeks ago, Mr. Bush proposed a different sort of cut in Medicaid that would affect only certain public hospitals, particularly New York City's Health and Hospitals Corporation. The corporation and New York State estimated the cut to the city hospitals at $350 million a year.

Mr. Spitzer has proposed cutting $1.2 billion a year in health care costs, including more than $350 million in hospital payments.

But the loss to individual hospitals would vary widely, depending on their reliance on Medicaid, how many doctors they train, and how much those training programs have changed in size over the last 25 years.

Under the Spitzer plan, St. Barnabas Hospital in the Bronx would gain more than $7 million a year, while Beth Israel Medical Center in Manhattan would lose almost $15 million, the most for any single hospital, according to the Greater New York Hospital Association. New York-Presbyterian hospital, actually two very large hospitals that merged, would lose almost $24 million a year.

Just 15 hospitals would absorb more than half the losses for all of the state's more than 200 hospitals, and 14 of the 15 are in New York City. Most of the big losses would be suffered by hospitals that are relatively successful financially and in relatively affluent neighborhoods, but there are notable exceptions, like Interfaith and Brooklyn.

Mr. Spitzer has described his changes as reforms designed to make the health care system more sensible and responsive to patient needs. The industry and its main union, 1199 United Healthcare Workers East, say that in pursuit of abstract theories, the governor would make cuts that are so abrupt and deep that they would make health care worse, not better.

Jennifer Cunningham, a consultant to 1199, said, "The Bush and Spitzer cuts to teaching hospitals would be a double-whammy — more than double."

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg weighed in yesterday, saying that the governor had "set the right overall priorities," but that he feared damage to teaching hospitals that are "one of the stars in the crown" of New York health care.

A Look At Winners, Losers In The President's Proposed Budget (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, February 6, 2007

Some agencies would win big under President Bush's fiscal 2008 budget proposal, while others would suffer slashed funds. Here are some notable winners and losers:

WINNERS:

-Defense Department: $624.6 billion, a 4.1 percent increase over 2007. The Army would get $130.1 billion, a 20.4 percent increase. Some $37.6 billion would go to fix or replace equipment destroyed in battle.

-Veteran Affairs: $84.4 billion, a 13.3 percent increase over 2007. The VA will treat nearly 263,000 Iraq and Afghanistan war vets; the budget seeks $36.6 billion for medical care, including $3 billion for mental health.

-State Department: $37.4 billion, a 12.9 percent increase over 2007. Seeks to triple funding for the Millennium Challenge Corp., to $3 billion. The corporation provides aid to 11 fledgling democracies that meet U.S.-set fiscal criteria.

-Interior Department: $10.1 billion, a 4.1 percent increase over 2007. Seeks $1.9 billion for national parks, a 13 percent increase, including 40 percent more for daily park operations than when Bush took office. Seeks a $100 million match from citizens' contributions.

-Labor Department: $50.4 billion, a 7.9 percent increase over 2007. Seeks $313 million for the Mine Safety and Health Administration, a 13 percent increase from 2007 request.

LOSERS:

-Amtrak: Seeks $800 million, $500 million less than fiscal 2007.

-Environmental Protection Agency: $7.1 billion, a 4.9 percent cut from fiscal 2007.

-Low Income Home Energy Assistance: Seeks $1.8 billion, down from $3.2 billion, a 56 percent cut.

-Corporation for Public Broadcasting: Seeks $350 million, down from $460 million in fiscal 2007.

-Education Department: Seeks $62.6 billion, a 5 percent cut from fiscal 2007. Would eliminate more than three dozen programs.

DOJ_NMG_0128271

-Labor Department's Bureau of International Labor Affairs: Would cut from $73 million to $14 million, nearly 81 percent.

-Office of Disability Employment Policy: Would cut from $28 million to $19 million, or 32 percent.

-Centers for Disease Control and Prevention: Would cut by $550 million.

A Closer Look At Where The Money Will Go (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

President Bush would increase the Department of Homeland Security budget by $2.3 billion, to $34.4 billion, boosting spending to secure the borders and detect nuclear materials. There would also be $1 billion for better communications systems for first responders.

Other priorities include $1.8 billion for a "virtual fence" at the border, 3,000 new Border Patrol agents and 600 new detention beds; $80 million more for nuclear detection; and $224 million to hire airport security checkers.

But states and cities would see cuts of $1.2 billion in grants for anti-terrorism, law enforcement, firefighters and emergency medical teams.

The story was similar at the Justice Department, where overall spending would increase about 1 percent, to $20.2 billion, with new outlays targeting terrorism, violent crime and illicit drugs. But the budget would cut $1.7 billion from local law enforcement assistance, such as the popular Community Oriented Policing Services program, according to the International Association of Chiefs of Police.

Congressional leaders immediately criticized the cuts. Rep. David E. Price (D-N.C.), chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on homeland security, accused the White House of "depriving our communities of the critical support they need to operate in the post-9/11 world."

In other homeland security spending, funding for the Coast Guard's troubled fleet-replacement program would fall from $1.1 billion to $800 million. But the FBI would be a big winner, with its budget growing about 13 percent, to $6.4 billion.

Budget Winners And Losers (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 6, 2007

The budget that President Bush sent to the Congress yesterday contains nuggets of good news for federal employees: Their numbers would grow, as would their salaries.

But those retiring after relatively short careers would lose part of the standard health insurance subsidy. And many employees not involved in national and homeland security would see their programs operate with flat or reduced funding in fiscal 2008.

According to the president's plan, executive branch employment, excluding the Postal Service, would increase to more than 1.87 million civil service workers, up by 2.8 percent compared with fiscal 2004. The budget numbers show that the government would add 40,000 full-time employees to the 2006 tally of 1,832,800.

Much of the hiring would be in response to added duties for homeland security and fighting terrorism, the budget said. The Department of Homeland Security, for example, would receive funding to hire an additional 3,000 Border Patrol agents.

The budget also would add staff at the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, the Food and Drug Administration, the Federal Aviation Administration, the Energy Department's National Nuclear Security Administration and in federal prisons. The Census Bureau would also grow by opening regional offices in preparation for the 2010 census.

But some agencies would lose employees. The biggest loser would be the Agriculture Department, which would decline by about 5,000 workers in 2008, compared with 2006.

Civil service and military personnel would receive a pay raise of 3 percent in 2008, according to the budget. The proposed raise, announced Friday by the Office of Management and Budget, will be reviewed by Congress.

The National Treasury Employees Union objected to the budget's proposal to allow the president to allocate some of the pay raise to address recruitment and retention challenges in government. Colleen M. Kelley, the union president, said the raise should be at least 3.5 percent, given that the 2007 raise was the lowest in 20 years.

Bush's budget also included a discussion of military compensation that said "military members are compensated well above comparably aged and educated civilians" in the private sector. That argument rested largely on the higher deferred payments for health-care and retirement benefits for military personnel. Overall, the budget said, current and future pay and benefits average more than $100,000 per service member.

The budget would make changes to the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program. The biggest policy change would reduce the subsidy that the government provides for retiree health-care costs.

Currently, federal employees who retire with five years of continuous service receive the same subsidy as they did when they were working. Under the formula, the government pays about 70 percent of the health insurance premium.

The budget proposal would require employees to have 10 years of government service for the government to pick up 70 percent of the premium. The government would pay only half of the subsidy, or 35 percent, on behalf of those with only five years of service and would phase in higher contributions for those with more than five but less than 10 years of service.

Each year, the government has about 550 employees who retire with more than five but less than 10 years of service, the Office of Personnel Management said. They make up a small part of the annual retirement exodus that ranges from 60,000 to 70,000.

Linda M. Springer, director of the OPM, said the budget proposal sought to "create greater equity" between those who served a full career in government and those who joined relatively late in their careers, perhaps motivated by the opportunity to claim relatively generous health benefits in retirement. "We don't want people just coming opportunistically to join us," she said.

But Judy Park, legislative director for the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association, suggested that the proposal could hamper the government's ability to hire mid-career professionals at a time when federal agencies will be coping with substantial numbers of baby boom retirements. "If the government is trying to be more competitive in getting middle-management people to fill those positions, then is this not tearing down their competitive edge?" she asked.

The changes to the health benefits program also affect the Patent and Trademark Office, requiring the agency to set aside money to cover retiree health-care liabilities. OPM officials said the patent office operates through fees and should take over its retiree obligations, much as the U.S. Postal Service has for its retirees.

The administration also seeks to allow the largest carrier for the Federal Employee Health Benefit Program, Blue Cross and Blue Shield, to offer a third health insurance option, probably a high-deductible plan featuring a health savings account. Currently, Blue Cross is limited to two options.

Democrats See Holes In President's Budget Plan (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan And Alec Macgillis

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

President Bush's proposed 2008 budget would provide hundreds of millions of dollars for projects in the Washington area, including a new Homeland Security complex in Southeast and improvements to roads and Metro.

But Democratic lawmakers said it does not include enough for homeland security, health care and cleanup of the Chesapeake Bay.

"We're now in another year where the president has sort of said one thing in the State of the Union but the reality of the budget is very different," Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.) said after reviewing the proposal, released yesterday, for the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1

The staffs of federal lawmakers from the D.C. area were still wading through the voluminous document last night to more clearly gauge its potential impact on the region. Sharp increases for the departments of Defense and Homeland Security seemed certain to benefit the local economy, with its profusion of contracting firms.

But legislators said proposed cuts in some programs could harm local residents.

For example, a Homeland Security grant program for state preparedness was slashed by 60 percent -- to $465 million nationwide -- and another for state and local training was reduced by more than half -- to $95 million. That could lead to smaller amounts from those anti-terror programs for Maryland, Virginia and the District.

"This year's budget fails to acknowledge the role that the national capital region, and Maryland, plays in protecting our nation from future attacks," Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.) said in a statement. She complained that funds for port-security grants, for example, were kept at 2007 levels instead of increased to address continuing threats.

Jarrod Agen, a federal Homeland Security spokesman, pointed out that the department would get an extra $1 billion to distribute nationwide in grants for communication equipment for police and other first-responders.

"When you factor in that $1 billion with the rest of the totals, it's roughly about the same as what the allocations were last year" for national homeland security spending, he said. The Washington region also stands to potentially gain money through an anti-terrorism program for urban areas that was revamped when legislators complained last year that it shortchanged high-risk areas.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) played down concerns about local homeland security cuts in Bush's proposed budget, calling the proposal a "starting point" and adding that Congress would likely be able to avert funding cuts.

"We'll take care of it," Davis said. The administration has "got to make everything balance out. Congress will get its two cents in."

The budget request includes almost $347 million to build a Homeland Security complex and Coast Guard headquarters on the campus of St. Elizabeths Hospital in Southeast Washington, according to Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.).

In a statement, she said that the complex was her "major economic development project for the District" and that the funding would mean that groundbreaking could begin soon.

But sources on Capitol Hill said the $120 million portion designated for the Homeland Security offices might be targeted as Congress looks to make up for the cuts in the state and local homeland security grants.

The budget proposal gives the D.C. area hundreds of millions of dollars in funds for transportation, moving forward programs approved in past years. Metro, for example, is slated to get $35 million for rail cars to relieve crowding. And a highway planning and construction program would provide $133 million for the District, a 20 percent increase from last year; $515 million for Maryland, a 17 percent increase; and $868 million for Virginia, a 15 percent increase. The latter program is funded mainly through gasoline taxes.

The project to extend Metro to Dulles International Airport would receive part of a $72 million pot of money for public transit, said Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.).

The $4 billion project is expected to be approved for its full allotment of federal funding, about $900 million, late this year. But worries over federal approval have risen as the project suffers delays and cost increases, partly because of the debate over whether to change the route to go below ground in Tysons Corner.

"It's a good sign," said Dan Scandling, Wolf's spokesman. "It's another step in the right direction for rail out to the Dulles corridor."

The budget provides $7.4 billion, the same amount as last year, for construction related to the program of closing or retooling military bases.

Members of Maryland's congressional delegation were concerned over what they called insufficient funding to clean up the Chesapeake Bay. Under the president's proposal, Maryland would receive $16.6 million for a special state revolving fund to upgrade sewage treatment plants. That's a cut of nearly 50 percent from 2001, according to the office of Sen. Benjamin L. Cardin (D).

An additional $26 million in federal funds would again go to the Chesapeake Bay Program.

Mikulski reproached the Bush administration for cutting money for another local priority: the consolidation of the Food and Drug Administration offices in White Oak in Montgomery County. The president has asked for $58 million in 2008, compared with $178 million last year, the senator said, adding that the lower amount could delay the project by years.

In the District, officials were pleased by the budget requests for several projects. They include $12 million for the D.C. Water and Sewer Authority to reduce sewer overflows into the Anacostia and Potomac rivers as well as Rock Creek, a jump of $5 million. The budget would also provide $10 million for a forensics laboratory and $5 million to reimburse the FBI for the use of its laboratory.

The proposed budget also includes $10 million to renovate the D.C. central library and its branches.

Cultural Agencies See Boost From Bush Budget (WP)

By Jacqueline Trescott

The federal cultural agencies and museums received solid support yesterday from the White House in the proposed budget for fiscal 2008.

The Bush administration proposed $678.4 million for the Smithsonian complex, the largest of the cultural accounts. If passed by Congress at that level, the budget would include an increase of more than $20 million for utilities, rents and salaries; $10 million for improvements to a storage facility for anthropological and art collections in Suitland; $9.9 million for planning for the National Museum of African American History and Culture; and $18 million for improvements at the National Zoo, including $9 million for the new elephant habitat.

The cultural organizations are in budget limbo -- as are other government agencies -- because the fiscal 2007 budget was not passed by both the House and the Senate. The appropriations are spelled out in a continuing resolution, an interim funding measure. If the continuing resolution becomes law, the Smithsonian would received $637 million for fiscal 2007.

Despite the uncertainty, the chairmen of the arts and humanities endowments yesterday said they were satisfied.

In the president's proposal, the National Endowment for the Arts is to get $128.4 million.

"We're pleased that the budget requests a $4 million increase for the arts endowment, which continues a steady restoration of funding for the agency," said NEA Chairman Dana Gioia.

The National Endowment for the Humanities was slated for a increase of $400,000. "The president's budget request reaffirms his long-standing support of the endowment and its 'We the People' program," said NEH Chairman Bruce Cole. The "People" initiative encourages the study and teaching of American history and culture.

A third federal agency, the Institute of Museum and Library Services, would get $271.2 million, with the lion's share going to support libraries. Yet the museum portion of the institute's budget has steadily increased in recent years, with a proposed $39.8 million for fiscal 2008. "The administration understands the essential role these institutions play in connecting people to information and ideas," said director Anne-Imelda M. Radice.

The proposals for the arts agencies are just a trickle of the $2.9 trillion package the White House announced yesterday but are essential to the Washington area because of the national museums' importance as tourist destinations and their workforce.

The administration proposed $39.3 million for the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, which receives funding for its operations and capital repairs. That is a slight increase over last year's proposal but an increase of $9 million over the last official budget in 2006. The increase would cover costs for the renovation of the Eisenhower Theater, which will close in May for the 16-month job.

The National Gallery of Art is slated for $116 million in the proposed budget, the same amount the president proposed last year.

The U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum was relatively flat with a target of $44.9 million.

New Spending For No Child Left Behind (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

President Bush proposed $56 billion in Education Department funding, level with his proposal for the current fiscal year but 3 percent less than what Democrats are expected to approve for this year. He also sought about $1 billion in new spending related to the landmark No Child Left Behind law.

Democrats and education groups attacked Bush's proposal. Critics said Bush's budget would slash key education programs and fall short of full funding for the federal school law.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said cuts in inefficient programs are necessary to achieve a balanced budget. Officials also said that the plan, if approved, would mean that funding for No Child Left Behind has risen 41 percent since the law was enacted five years ago.

The budget would add about $1 billion for the education law, most of it directed toward high schools to help pay for a proposed expansion of testing and other programs. It would add $300 million for school vouchers and cut special-education grants to states, compared with the Democrats' proposal for this year.

"The cuts in this budget for students with disabilities and for young children are reprehensible and undermine the efforts of students and teachers who are working hard in classrooms across the country," Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, said in a statement.

The budget also would increase the maximum size of Pell grants for low-income college students to $4,600 from $4,050. The administration would pay for the boost by eliminating other student aid programs and cutting billions of dollars in subsidies to private companies that lend money to students.

The $2.9 trillion spending blueprint calls for establishing a national expectation that all high school students will graduate on time and be prepared for college or the workplace.

Bush is seeking more than a $1 billion increase in Title I grants for students attending high schools in low-income areas and $100 million for reading programs. Some $412 million is being sought to help pay for achievement testing.

The budget calls for greater emphasis on math and science. It also seeks to improve performance at struggling schools and more school choices for students currently attending below-average schools.

The budget provides for nearly $91 billion in financial aid for college students, increasing maximum Pell Grant awards from $4,600 in 2008 to $5,400 in five years. Academic Competitiveness Grants also would increase awards to deserving low-income students by 50 percent.

Why Are We Still Free? Because We're Vigilant and Nuclear-Equipped

With all due respect to Hiroshima Mayor Tadatoshi Akiba ("With 20/20 Foresight, Mayors Around the World Join to End Nuclear War," Letters, Jan. 23), nuclear deterrence has protected U.S. soil from conventional attack, keeping our country inviolate since a few years after Imperial Japanese forces landed in the Aleutian Islands in June of 1942. For more than 60 years, the U.S. nuclear triad (aircraft, naval vessels and ICBMs) has provided the guarantee of massive retaliation in response to an attack by a rogue state, a deterrent unmatched by any other means of defense.

Prior to the development of nuclear weapons, the security of nations rested on conventional forces. These forces, while strong, were not infallible and could be bested by a dastardly surprise attack, as evidenced by the terrible events of Dec. 7, 1941. With no fear of instantaneous obliteration by way of an irresistible retaliatory nuclear strike, a nation, even in the 21st century, might feel emboldened to launch a bold strike against a fellow nation.

While the events of Sept. 11, 2001, prove that the U.S. faces a new enemy of a stateless nature, the remnants of 20th century rogue states, like Iran and North Korea, remain a threatening reality in the new millennium.

Mayor Akiba refers to the cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki as the victims of nuclear attack. I'd ask him to consider those cities as the victims of Imperial Japanese national arrogance and temporary insanity, from a sad period in history when Japan was a rogue nation, perpetrating brutalities upon the peace-loving peoples of several countries. Until the propensity to launch ruthless surprise attacks is somehow removed from the human psyche, I must respectfully disagree with Mayor Akiba and call for the retention of U.S. nuclear retaliatory capabilities.

As an American, I sleep soundly knowing that Trident-equipped U.S. naval submarines lurk deep beneath the waves, Minuteman III missiles wait silently in their silos on the Great Plains and Air Force bombers are ready to deploy, should any nation attempt some desperate gambit and attack our country. The U.S. has the stated position of using nuclear weapons only in retaliation to an attack on our country. Until we abrogate that commitment, I support our remaining vigilant, resolute and nuclear-equipped.

Strict Rules Threaten Release of New Drugs

As a physician, I am concerned about the serious impact the Vioxx scandal may have on patient care by changing the drug-regulation landscape for the worse ("Drug Makers Try to Bring Back Cox-2 Inhibitors," Marketplace, Jan. 19). The general opinion held by most pharmaceutical-industry insiders and drug-stock analysts is that the Food and Drug Administration will now exhibit stricter drug-approval standards because of the accusations it has faced concerning drug safety. This may lead to the FDA requesting excessively detailed safety data before licensing a medicine. Should such a cautious approach not be welcomed? Will drugs not be safer as a result? Isn't this how things should have been done all along?

Stricter drug-approval standards won't necessarily be good for the public if it means that ground-breaking drugs spend longer in clinical trials and, hence, take a greater period of time to reach the market. I fear that patients with life-threatening diseases may have to wait longer than necessary to receive novel drugs in years to come.

With the arrival of the genomic revolution, we are about to enter a period of great and sustained drug advancement. In the next decade or two, personalized medicines -- drugs that are tailored to a person's genes -- will become reality and assist in the fight against the world's biggest killer diseases. Wouldn't it be a pity if the Vioxx scandal was to slow down such ground-breaking drug development? I think so.

Russ Displays Moxie

Kimberley A. Strassel is right to recognize Russ Feingold as one of the few in Congress with the courage of his convictions regarding our future course of action in Iraq ("Senator Feingold's Sin," Potomac Watch, Feb. 2). Whether you agree with him or not, and I for one decidedly do not, he's at least standing for something other than re-election. Chuck Hagel, John Warner and the majority of their peers seek to fashion themselves as leonine statesmen in the mold of Pericles, Cato and Henry Clay. In reality they're more like Bert Lahr in "The Wizard of Oz": They talk a great game, but lack either the moral fortitude or political courage to actually put their high-sounding words into action.

Vouchers Divert Funds From Public Schools

Your Jan. 30 editorial "Voucher Comeback" endorses the use of public funds for private school tuition as a way to give parents "more education choices." The real choice is whether every child deserves an opportunity to attend a good school, or not. That's an easy choice for most parents and voters, which is why vouchers have been rejected at the ballot box by a cumulative margin of two to one in 13 states and the District of Columbia.

Experimental voucher projects have been tried in some places, including Milwaukee, Cleveland and Washington. In none of those cities have vouchers led to any sustained improvement in the academic performance of the students who participated.

By diverting much-needed public funds from our public schools, the widespread use of vouchers would actually reduce attractive choices for most parents. Since most elite private schools charge higher fees than vouchers would provide, they would only serve as a subsidy for students already attending private schools as the Cleveland experiment has proven. Everyone else would be left in public schools with dwindling resources.

The way to give parents more positive choices is to improve our public schools. The NEA agrees with President Bush that the No Child Left Behind Act should be reauthorized; meantime, we have a positive agenda to improve the law.

Kill the Income Tax By Spending Restraint

Thank you for drawing national attention to the important movement to abolish state income taxes ("Rich States, Poor States," Review & Outlook, Jan. 25). Here in Georgia we have a unique opportunity to reduce and even abolish the state income tax; however, we take issue with Georgia Majority Leader Jerry Keen telling the Journal that the only options on the table are the flat tax or expanding the sales tax to pay for income tax cuts.

Americans for Prosperity-Georgia has introduced a plan modeled on Gov. Mark Sanford's proposal for South Carolina that would use spending restraint to phase out the income tax to complete repeal, without raising any other tax.

Designed by economist Barry Poulson of the University of Colorado, our plan, based on the most conservative possible assumptions, could eliminate the income tax by 2021 exclusively through spending restraint. The key to this plan would be the adoption of a constitutional amendment to place a cap on spending growth, which has been introduced as Senate Resolution 20. While states are considering pro-growth tax reform measures like income tax reduction and elimination, it is crucial that they also restrain spending to keep the overall burden of government under control.

Bush Plan Would Raise Grants To Low-income Students (USAT)

The budget President Bush proposed Monday would increase federal grants to low-income college students by 33% over five years and pay for it by reducing subsidies to private lenders.

The Bush plan calls for raising the maximum Pell grant, which hasn't been increased since 2003, to $5,400 from $4,050 over five years. To offset the cost, the administration proposes reducing interest-rate subsidies to private lenders by half a percentage point. The reduction would save the government an estimated $12.4 billion over five years, the Bush administration said.

Lenders that provide federally guaranteed student loans denounced the proposal. Sallie Mae, the largest lender, said in a statement that the cuts would cause fewer lenders to participate in the federal loan program.

Also critical was the Consumer Bankers Association, which said the cuts would slash lenders' profit margins by about 20%.

"Driving away banks from this program will leave students with either a government monopoly or an oligopoly of loan providers and few, if any, of the benefits currently provided by competition," CBA President Joe Belew said in a statement. "Without banks in the student loan program, graduates can look forward to IRS-style quality of service."

News of the plan sparked a sell-off in shares of publicly traded lenders. Sallie Mae's shares fell $4.09 to $42.37, a decline of 8.8%. Shares of Nelnet, a Lincoln, Neb.-based lender, fell $2.65 to $25.05, a drop of 9.6%.

Consumer groups and student advocates countered that lenders are highly profitable and could easily withstand lower subsidies. Student lenders are "one of the most heavily subsidized and lucrative financial industries" in the country, said Luke Swarthout of the U.S. Public Interest Research Group's Higher Education Project.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, called the current level of subsidies "outrageous," and said the Bush plan "shows how a Democratic Congress is changing the nation's priorities on student aid."

Robert Shireman, director of the Project on Student Debt, said the proposal will spark a healthy debate in Congress, which must approve any final budget plan. "This is a good time for Congress to look at what the level of subsidies should be and how do we get the most bang for our taxpayer dollars," he said.

Though Pell grants are the primary source of federal aid for low-income students, the value of the grants hasn't kept up with tuition inflation.

Pell grants covered only 33% of the average cost of tuition, fees, room and board at a public college or university in 2005-06, down from 42% in 2001-02, according to the College Board.

Twenty years ago, the maximum Pell grant covered nearly 60% of that cost.

Bush Budget Proposes Cut In Student-Lender Subsidy (WSJ)

By John Godfrey

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush is proposing a 50-basis-point cut in student lender rate subsidies and increasing lender risk as part of a plan to save the government $95 billion in entitlement spending by 2012.

The proposal would affect Sallie Mae, Student Loan Corp. and Nelnet.

"Student lenders are the big issue this morning. It really caught people by surprise," said Brian Gardner, Washington research analyst with Keefe, Bruyette, & Woods, Inc.

Sallie Mae and other student lenders came out against similar proposals earlier this year, warning that cutting the margins will hurt students.

"Our margin on a guaranteed student loan is 50 basis points, so it is a razor-thin margin," Sallie Mae spokesman Tom Joyce said last month.

Mr. Gardner said Mr. Bush's proposal "has the potential to drive lenders away from the industry as margins shrink. It has the ability to reduce capital available to college students."

Mr. Bush is also asking for another $5.5 billion hike in premiums paid to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., a follow-up to legislation he signed into law last year that would weaken in the near-term pension funding rules. The premium increase would bring those premiums closer to what a private financial institution would charge for insuring the same risk, according to the White House.

"These reforms would improve PBGC's financial condition and safeguard the future benefits of American workers," the budget document said.

The bulk of the savings in that plan, $66 billion, would come from changes to Medicare, including increased Medicare premiums for upper-income Americans. Details of the Medicare proposal were leaked this weekend and Democrats have already begun to criticize it.

"Rather than trying to solve our health care crisis by lowering costs and covering more people, the president's plan will make the crisis worse by raising costs and failing to cover those who need it most -- our nation's children," Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pension Committee Chairman Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.), said.

Sen. Kennedy and the Democratically controlled Congress is far more likely to propose cuts in subsidies to health insurers if they decide to seek out savings in Medicare.

But Sen. Kennedy and other Democrats had already begun looking to subsidies to student lenders to finance education spending increases they prefer.

Under the Bush administration plan, the government would pay lenders $13.5 billion less over the next five years, according to White House estimates.

Another $3.3 billion would be saved by reducing subsidies to student loan guaranty agencies and another $3.2 billion would be saved by eliminating the Federal Perkins Loan revolving funds entirely.

The bulk of those student loan savings under Mr. Bush's plan would be used to gradually increase the Pell Grant maximum to $5,400. The bulk of that increase would not take effect until after Mr. Bush had left office in 2009.

Net of the spending increase, overall changes to student aid programs would save the government an estimated $2.9 billion over the next five years.

The proposal is substantially more ambitious than one being pursued in Congress, in which lawmakers also reduced lender guarantees, but cut the lender rate subsidy by just 10 basis points.

The proposal, approved 356 to 71 on Jan. 17 by the House of Representatives, would save the government $5.9 billion in lender subsidies and another $1.2 billion in guaranty agency subsidies.

The House bill would use the savings to offset the cost of cutting student loan interest rates to 3.4% from 6.8% over the next five years. Mr. Bush opposes that plan, arguing that "student debt loads have soared in recent years, and it is not clear that encouraging more loans is a wise course," according to a statement released by his Office of Management and Budget.

The Senate is expected to consider a similar student-loan interest-rate cut, but the author there, Sen. Kennedy, would prefer to offset the cost of the rate cut by pushing students into direct student loan programs, in theory generating savings for the program by cutting out private lender middlemen.

Bush '08 Budget Falls Short On Money For Border Fence (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Jerry Seper

President Bush's new budget would pay for only about half of the 700 miles of U.S.-Mexico border fence he and Congress four months ago promised to build.

With Mr. Bush trying to prove to Republicans he is serious about immigration law enforcement, his budget makes good on his promise to fund 3,000 new U.S. Border Patrol agents, putting him near his goal of doubling the agency's size. He also included funding for 22 new Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) teams to identify and deport illegal aliens serving time for criminal convictions.

The White House budget asks for $1 billion in new money to build the fence. Even coupled with $1.5 billion appropriated in the past two years, this would not pay for the entire fence called for in a bill Congress passed and the president signed into law in October.

"If you mean double-strand or double-fence for 700 [miles], no," said Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman. The $2.5 billion could pay for either 700 miles of single-tier fence, or 370 miles of double-tier fence, along with cameras, sensors and other technology to build a "virtual fence" along the other parts.

The Department of Homeland Security has argued that only 370 miles of actual border fencing is needed, saying a "virtual fence" would suffice elsewhere. Congress, though, rejected that and insisted on 700 miles of double-tier fencing, even specifying its general locations in the bill.

Congressional fence supporters said Mr. Bush must make good on the entire fence.

"We want to see the full fence built -- every smuggler's corridor is designated with a time and physical description to see a double fence," said Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican, who wrote the first bill to put fencing along key crossings.

While the fence would cover about 700 miles of the border, Mr. Hunter said it would amount to 854 miles of actual fencing. He said by his calculations, enough money is either already in the pipeline or included in the new budget to build all or almost all of that.

Overall, the Homeland Security budget would increase 1.3 percent -- a figure Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat and chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, called "ridiculous."

And Rep. David E. Price, North Carolina Democrat and chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on homeland security, said his panel will scrub the request to try to figure out what changes are needed.

"The subcommittee will need to take a fresh look at whether essential security priorities would be adequately supported under this budget," he said.

Border security fared best among Homeland Security Department programs.

Spending on U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) would rise to $8.8 billion, up from $6.4 billion this year, and ICE spending would increase from $4.4 billion to $4.8 billion.

But the biggest challenge in meeting the hiring goal is to recruit and train agents.

T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, said the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center in Artesia, N.M., can't handle the load.

"They clearly have to look beyond Artesia," he said. "There's only so far you can expand that, and part of the problem is the community itself isn't large enough to house all the instructors."

CBP Commissioner W. Ralph Basham told The Washington Times in an interview last year that an aggressive recruiting effort by the agency had resulted in "no want for applicants."

Mr. Basham said an ongoing attrition rate for the Border Patrol of about 4 percent -- significantly down from previous years -- meant that 8,800 new agents ultimately would have to be hired and trained by 2009 to fill the 6,000 slots Mr. Bush called for in a May speech that sought to boost the Border Patrol's numbers to 18,000.

To meet the president's goal, Mr. Basham -- who once headed the training center -- said the agency had reduced the total number of days the trainees attend the academy, "but not the training they receive." He said the overall training schedule was reduced in October from 92 to 81 days.

Bush Plan Leaves Alternative Minimum Tax Untouched (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush's budget ducks tough issues such as shoring up Social Security and overhauling the alternative minimum tax, which threatens to punish millions of middle-class taxpayers in coming years.

The tax was intended to close loopholes for the rich, but it wasn't indexed to adjust for inflation, so income that once was considered rich is today middle-class and threatened by the AMT.

For several years, Congress has avoided the AMT's impact on middle-class families by passing one-year patches. Bush's budget assumes no more patches after the 2008 tax year. He also assumes that new revenues from the AMT will help him balance the budget by 2012. Congress is unlikely to go along, however.

"The budget rests on the assumption that the AMT will be allowed to expire and affect more than 40 million households in 2012, something nobody believes would be allowed," said Robert Greenstein, executive director of the liberal Center for Budget and Policy Priorities, a research organization.

The president takes a pass on how he thinks the AMT issue will be resolved. With each passing year it would rake in more revenues for the Treasury if left unfixed - $93 billion by 2012, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office.

Bush also assumes that Congress will make permanent his first-term tax cuts, which are set to expire in 2010. If the tax reductions were made permanent and the AMT were allowed to hit millions of Americans, the AMT would reclaim any benefits from the cuts for many taxpayers.

On Social Security, the president repeats his 2005 call to let individuals divert portions of their payroll taxes into stocks and bonds. He now envisions this beginning in 2012, three years after he's left office. He offers no long-term fix for the retirement program, despite the impending retirement of the baby boom generation, which will strain its finances.

On health care, Bush pledges to squeeze $78 billion from projected federal spending increases over the next five years. He'd cut the rate of payment increases for health-care providers and increase premiums for wealthier retirees.

He also proposes a new $15,000 standard deduction for health-insurance costs but offers no comprehensive solution for the 46 million Americans who lack health insurance.

The AARP, the powerful lobby for older Americans, on Monday accused the president of punting on health care with "piecemeal cuts that threaten to damage critical programs without addressing the fundamental problems."

The Budget Battle And Your Wallet (WSJ)

By Tom Herman And Anne Marie Chaker

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

With Democrats now in control of Congress, many proposals President Bush made yesterday affecting individuals' wallets -- including killing the estate tax and overhauling the tax treatment of health-insurance benefits -- appear to be heading for the cutting-room floor.

But a few others, such as giving the Internal Revenue Service more money to pursue tax dodgers and protecting millions of people for another year from being ensnared in the alternative minimum tax, could attract bipartisan support.

Here is how the president's proposed $2.9 trillion budget may affect your pocketbook.

TAXES: The president is asking for nearly $2 trillion in net tax cuts over the next decade, mainly by extending provisions scheduled to expire in coming years. For example, the top 15% rate on long-term capital gains and most corporate dividends is set to expire at the end of 2010. So are today's federal income-tax rates, which range as high as 35%. Without legislation, those rates would head higher starting in 2011.

Don't expect Congress to act soon on the president's proposals to make those tax rates permanent. Lawmakers effectively have punted that issue into the elections of 2008, and beyond, amid continuing concern about reining in the federal budget deficit.

The budget also includes a plan to prevent the rapid spread this year of the alternative minimum tax, a parallel tax system designed originally to prevent a small number of wealthy people from dodging federal income taxes completely. Because the AMT wasn't indexed for inflation, it's now hitting many middle-income families, too. A Treasury official said about four million taxpayers will get hit by the AMT for 2006, and if Congress does nothing, that number will soar to about 25 million people for 2007.

Some kind of AMT fix is likely to win congressional approval. Among those already feeling the pinch of the AMT are many people who live in high-tax areas, such as New York City, New Jersey, and California and those with large families.

As expected, the president reiterated his request to Congress to kill the federal estate tax permanently. Under current law, this tax will disappear in 2010 but only for that one year.

Democrats are clear they won't go along with permanent repeal. Instead, look for an eventual compromise that includes raising the basic exclusion from the tax and cutting the top rate, thus reducing the number of people affected by it. This year, the basic estate-tax exclusion is $2 million, and the top rate is 45%. Some lawmakers have discussed increasing the exclusion to somewhere in the range of $3 million to $5 million.

Part of the budget calls for new steps to attack the nation's so-called tax gap, the difference between what the government collects each year and what it should be collecting. IRS researchers have estimated the gap is about $290 billion. .

One proposal: The president wants Congress to require many securities brokers, mutual funds and others to report what investors pay for stocks and funds. The information is relevant in figuring tax on capital gains, or the profit investors make when they sell. Treasury says it would increase compliance on capital-gains taxes.

The budget estimates the measure, which would apply to securities acquired after 2008, would rake in about $6.7 billion over 10 years. Key details of the plan aren't yet available, said a Treasury spokesman. Some Democrats have already come out in favor of similar legislation.

This proposal is "very constructive," said a spokeswoman for the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, a trade group.

STUDENT FINANCIAL AID: President Bush proposed cutting the subsidy that banks and other student-lending companies receive from the federal government. Lenders say this would likely mean cuts in student benefits, such as 24-hour hot lines and discounts for on-time payments. Democrats have proposed a similar move, so the question will be, how deep the cuts?

The president also proposed cutting entirely certain student-aid programs, including the Perkins Loan, Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant and Leveraging Educational Assistance Partnership grants for needy students. Mr. Bush tried, and failed, to eliminate some of these programs in the past and it's doubtful he'll succeed this year with a Democratic Congress.

The administration wants to apply the savings to other aid that affects more students, including raising the annual loan limit on subsidized Stafford loans by $2,000 for third- and fourth-year students. Stafford loans, which have a current limit of $5,500, are the government's biggest student-loan program.

The administration also proposed raising the annual limit students receive from the Pell Grant program -- which provides needy students with money that doesn't have to be repaid. The limit would be increased to $4,600 in the 2008-2009 academic year from the current $4,050, and ultimately to $5,400 in 2012-2013.

Pell Grant recipients are likely to see some increase. A Democratic bill introduced last month would boost the limit by a greater amount. But it's uncertain what will happen with subsidized Stafford loans. While Mr. Bush proposed raising loan limits, Democratic legislation that passed the House last month would cut interest rates.

HEALTH: Mr. Bush proposed requiring more higher-income seniors to pay more for Medicare. Currently, about 1.5 million seniors -- individuals with incomes above $80,000 a year and couples with incomes above $160,000 -- pay higher premiums in Medicare's Part B, which covers physician and outpatient services. Those income levels currently are indexed for inflation, but the president's proposal would eliminate that and expand the means testing to include the the new drug benefit, Part D. Officials expect the means testing of Part D to affect more than 1.1 million seniors in 2008. It's not clear how this proposal will fare in the Democratic-controlled Congress. While many Republicans and some Democrats have supported the limited means testing in Medicare that has already begun, many Democrats have opposed it. And senior citizens' groups aren't likely to support expanding means testing unless the resulting savings are used to improve the program, which isn't part of the Bush proposal.

The budget also calls for major tax-law changes designed to make health insurance more affordable, but also threatens to raise taxes on many upper-income Americans. But with so many competing health plans on the table, there is little chance the president's proposal will be enacted. (See related article.4)

Funding For Treating Sewage At Mexican Border Is Sought (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

The White House, stepping into a controversy over cross-border pollution from Mexico, asked Congress for $71.7 million to enhance treatment of sewage drifting from Tijuana to communities in Southern California if a plan to use a private contractor falls through.

Until 2000, the U.S. had planned to expand treatment of sewage from Tijuana at an existing government-owned treatment plant on the border in San Ysidro, Calif. The intent was to help stem pollution from raw sewage causing beach closings and damaging a wildlife estuary on the U.S. side.

The amount of sewage produced by Tijuana, Mexico and sent gushing toward the U.S. has jumped over the years. See photos.2

The article reported that Bajagua recently missed crucial deadlines spelled out in its contract, including for obtaining land, permits and financing. The White House proposal, part of the president's 2008 budget plan, would expand treatment at the San Ysidro plant if Bajagua fails to meet the requirements by May 2, 2007.

Federal officials say the proposed appropriation was spurred mainly by worry that the government may violate a federal-court order on treating the sewage if the Bajagua project doesn't materialize. However, if Bajagua does meet requirements, the proposal calls for spending $3 million to cover a month's worth only of the Bajagua project's initial costs.

The San Ysidro plant currently takes 25 million gallons a day of raw Tijuana sewage and treats it only to preliminary standards before discharging it into the Pacific Ocean. That fails to meet the federal Clean Water Act standards, and the federal agency that operates the plant is under a strict order by a federal court to upgrade the treatment by late 2008. The new budget proposal for the first time would make funds available for additions to the San Ysidro plant if the Bajagua project falls through.

A Budget Ax Over 'Harry Potter Crowd' (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

Christian Science Monitor, February 6, 2007

ASHLAND, ORE.

In a corner of southwestern Oregon, a century's worth of American history is bumping up against the politics of federal spending. As a result, all 15 public libraries in Jackson County could be shuttered in a few weeks for loss of federal payments.

Washington, Alaska, Montana, and other states would be affected as well. In California, more than 4,500 schools face imminent teacher and administrator layoffs.

As a portion of President Bush's $2.9 trillion budget sent to Congress Monday, not much money is involved: about $800 million or so. But the cutoff in funding has united lawmakers across the political spectrum – from Sen. Ted Stevens (R) of Alaska on the right to Sen. Barbara Boxer (D) of California on the left. Normally mild- mannered Sen. Gordon Smith (R) of Oregon is threatening to filibuster a $464 billion continuing resolution meant to fund the federal government for the rest of the fiscal year because of what is, in essence, a quirk of history.

The controversy also highlights the difficulties of fairly allocating federal money in rural areas where the government owns so much of the land. On one hand, federal ownership crimps growth and constrains the tax base. On the other hand, residents in some of these localities pay less in state and local taxes than residents in other states.

The story starts about 100 years ago when Congress allotted 25 percent of timber harvest revenues from national forests to rural counties and school districts. Forty-one states around the country benefited from the program, mostly in the West where much (in some states most) of the land is owned by the federal government.

"For generations, these timber receipts provided funds to offset the fact that local communities cannot tax the federal government," Senator Smith said on the floor of the Senate recently.

Then came federal environmental laws, including the Endangered Species Act. Combined with what critics said was overcutting and the loss of timber jobs, the industry saw its revenues fall by some 70 percent in the 1990s. As a result, says Smith, "When timber harvest evaporated, so did county budgets."

In 2000, Congress passed the "Secure Rural Schools and Community Self Determination Act" meant to make up the difference. It covered more than 700 counties in 39 states, with Oregon getting the largest amount because it had been most affected – including when the federal government back in 1937 took over more than 2 million acres of timberland from a railroad company charged with fraud.

But that law expired last year. With budget deficits and expensive foreign wars, western lawmakers face an uphill battle getting it renewed.

DOJ_NMG_0128284

As a result, says Jackson County commissioner Dave Gilmour, "We're now in a terrible situation with funding." At a recent public forum in the old National Guard armory in Ashland, Ore., he said the county plans to lay off 30 positions in health and human services, reduce the number of jail beds, and cut back on information technology slots.

But it's the libraries that have gotten the most attention. Rallies have been held, and book lovers have packed public hearings.

At a county commission meeting last week, grade-schooler Bronson Samel-Garloff could barely see over the podium as he offered the perspective of the "Harry Potter" crowd: "I'm reading three series of books right now, so I guess I'll have to buy the rest of them."

Erin Brender juggled her squirming 11-month-old son Sulayman as the two of them led those present in a chorus of "Itsy Bitsy Spider." The point, she said, was that "the-babies-in-the-library program lays the foundation for a lifetime of literacy and learning."

Not everyone feels this way. In letters to the editor and website postings, some have questioned the place of libraries filled with books when more and more people are getting their information online. Others wonder why federal taxpayers should foot the bill when the per capita state and local tax burden here is lighter than in 34 other states. And there are those who say the situation argues for a resumption of logging.

However it turns out, it's one more chapter in the continuing story of a region transitioning from "old West" economies based on natural resources to a "new West" of high-tech and recreation.

Fiscal Revelation (WSJ)

Politicians are typically late in picking up trends, so it will be interesting to see how long it takes Washington to acknowledge the big story in the Fiscal 2008 budget that President Bush unveiled yesterday: To wit, with a little spending restraint, Congress could balance the budget in no time.

You wouldn't know this from all the garment-rending yesterday in response to Mr. Bush's proposal to spend the not-so-meager sum of $2.9 trillion. Our favorite agonist is Kent Conrad, the Senate Budget Committee Chairman, and he didn't disappoint. "The President's budget is filled with debt and deception, disconnected from reality, and continues to move America in the wrong direction," said the Senator who was himself blocked from sneaking nearly $5 billion in "emergency" farm spending into a military construction bill in the final days of the last Congress. The North Dakotan needs to keep shouting disaster in a crowded political theater so he can justify his desire for a big tax increase.

The news Mr. Conrad won't broadcast is that over the past three years the federal deficit has shrunk by 58%. The Congressional Budget Office -- not the White House -- is estimating that the current year's deficit (for fiscal 2007) will fall to $172 billion. That's not bad given continuing Katrina relief spending, $30 billion for homeland security, and a couple hundred billion or so to fight the war on terror.

The White House is projecting that its new budget will eliminate the deficit by 2012 assuming Mr. Bush's tax cuts are extended after 2010. We don't put much stock in future budget forecasts because they depend on so many variables. But even CBO predicts the deficit should remain near or below 1% of GDP for the rest of the Bush Presidency. That's well below the 40-year average of 2.4% of GDP.

This also means that the federal debt burden will continue to fall. Alarmists point to the $1.4 trillion rise in total federal debt from 2003-2006, but that amount is dwarfed by the $14 trillion in new household wealth created over the same period. And for all the international scolding of an allegedly profligate America, U.S. federal debt as a share of GDP is falling again (see the top chart nearby). At 37% in 2006 and heading south, the U.S. figure compares to 52% in Germany, 43% in France, and 79% in Japan. Once again rising total "debt" is a scare word used to justify higher taxes.

The real game to watch isn't debt or deficits but spending. Here, too, Mr. Bush has an improved track record in his second term. From 2001-2005, outlays ballooned by $609 billion, or 33%, and Mr. Bush never did veto a spending bill. By contrast, on current pace his second term outlays will grow by 21% -- hardly tightfisted, but a third slower.

The other news you won't often hear concerns the soaring tax revenues in the wake of the 2003 supply-side tax cuts. Tax collections have risen by $757 billion, among the largest revenue gushers in history. Receipts, especially from high-income individuals and corporations, have been growing for some two years at nearly twice the rate of spending, which explains the falling deficit. Economic growth is always the key to eliminating red ink, which is why keeping this 63-month expansion rolling needs to be the main domestic priority. This requires making those lower 2003 tax rates permanent, rather than letting them expire in 2010 and socking the economy with the biggest tax increase in history.

The more immediate budget brawl between Mr. Bush and Democrats will be how to divide that mere $2.9 trillion between guns and butter. Mr. Bush wants $245 billion more for Iraq and Afghanistan for 2007 and 2008. His overall Pentagon request of $606 billion in 2008 has been lambasted by Speaker Nancy Pelosi as a "huge number" and Democrats are moaning that their cherished social programs will suffer.

In fact, Mr. Bush's request would only bring defense outlays to 4.2% of GDP, or about 20% of total federal spending. That compares to 4.7% of GDP even under Jimmy Carter, and 6.2% of GDP in 1986 at the peak of the Reagan defense buildup (see bottom chart). Budgets are about setting priorities, and if Democrats agree that defeating terrorism is vital they will put it ahead of funding the National Endowment for the Arts.

Or how about capping subsidies to farmers with incomes above $200,000? Senator Conrad could lead by example in accepting that White House proposal, and in return zero out Mr. Bush's $200 million political sop for state and local police.

All in all, the fiscal news is so good that the tax hike lobby has had to do a bait-and-switch and fret about the "long-term." Somehow this wasn't a priority when Democrats and Republicans alike were trying to kill Social Security reform in 2005. But all of a sudden penury is said to be right around the corner. Well, Congress could always reform those programs, but don't hold your breath. Mr. Bush is proposing a very modest $96 billion reduction in the growth of Medicare and other entitlements over five years, and Democrats are already outraged.

The best news in yesterday's budget may be that Mr. Bush seems to be rediscovering some fiscal nerve. His proposals won't raise taxes, while using the power of the market to combat problems in health care, and putting a tight leash on domestic discretionary programs. Defense gets the bulk of spending increases, as it should in a time of war. Maybe we'll finally get a debate over national spending priorities.

Mr. Bush's Deficit Dance (WP)

HAVING PILED UP record deficits, President Bush now promises black ink by 2012 -- three years after he leaves office. The fiscal 2008 budget the president submitted to Congress yesterday shows Mr. Bush's purported path to a $61 billion surplus by 2012. Some of its approaches, particularly the effort to restrain the growth of Medicare through additional means-testing and cutting payments to providers, are commendable; they merit more serious consideration by Congress than they appear destined to receive. The administration also deserves credit for a more candid acknowledgment of the likely cost of the war in Iraq than in budgets past. For the first time, the administration included a realistic estimate of the cost of operations in Iraq and Afghanistan for the coming year, $145 billion.

Yet Mr. Bush's balance is more illusory than real. It ignores known costs such as ameliorating the impact of the alternative minimum tax, which would top $90 billion in 2012 alone; the administration, once again, would simply affix a one-year patch for 2008. It assumes the government will collect far more revenue than the Congressional Budget Office projects, amounting to a $150 billion difference in 2012. No one should start spending Mr. Bush's projected surplus.

The more fundamental problem with Mr. Bush's supposedly balanced budget is its fundamentally unbalanced approach. He squeezes social programs while his tax cuts remain untouchable. An administration serious about fiscal prudence would have acknowledged that political and fiscal reality -- a new Democratic Congress, the ever-mounting costs of war -- demand reconsideration of some of the tax cuts. Instead, Mr. Bush yesterday insisted once again on extending them, at a cost of $1.6 trillion over the next 10 years.

That's not sustainable, particularly in light of the squeeze the administration wants to put on domestic spending. On top of emergency spending for the war, it would hike outlays for defense and homeland security by 10.7 percent next year and 23 percent over five years. By contrast, domestic discretionary spending would, depending on how you measure it, grow slowly -- 1 percent over each of the next five years, according to the administration's figures -- or actually shrink slightly.

Either way, the money available would increasingly fall behind as the population grows and inflation erodes the funding's purchasing power. A Democratic Congress is not going to accept -- nor should it -- cutting health insurance for low-income children or fuel assistance for the elderly while extending tax cuts for millionaires.

If Mr. Bush's budget is dead on arrival in this Congress, that increases pressure on the leadership there to come up with its own approach. Democrats have a new responsibility to propose realistic solutions to difficult problems and to demonstrate that they are willing to make the kinds of painful trade-offs for the country's long-term fiscal health that the president, once again, has ducked.

The Other Defense Budget (NYT)

American troops under fire in Iraq and Afghanistan deserve every penny requested for them in President Bush's new $622 billion Pentagon budget. And the overstretched Army and Marine Corps clearly need support, along with the extra troops that will eventually come their way. But that still leaves more than half of the overall request for Congress to carefully scrutinize and significantly prune.

Apart from war costs and personnel increases, this budget slips in more than $40 billion in other spending increases, compared with last year. Since Mr. Bush took office, the Pentagon budget has more than doubled. It is now higher, in real terms, than it has been in the past half-century.

Congress should direct particular attention to the roughly $140 billion in weapons procurement, research and development costs that are not part of the Iraq and Afghanistan section of the budget. Far too many of these programs are products of cold war strategic thinking and have outlived their rationale in a world with no superpower arms race.

That includes the $4.6 billion slated for the Air Force's F-22 stealth fighter, the $2.6 billion for the Marine Corps' tilt-wing V-22 Osprey, the $3 billion for the Navy's DDG-1000 stealth destroyer and $2.5 billion for the Virginia-class attack submarine. It also includes much of the $15.9 billion going to space weapons and missile defense.

Several of these programs can be canceled outright. The F-22 is one of three new-generation stealth fighters, and the most expendable because it was originally designed for air-to-air combat against Soviet-style MIG fighters. Likewise, the Virginia-class submarine was designed to track enemy nuclear submarines. The DDG-1000 is a blue-water fighting fortress, when what the Navy really needs these days is smaller, faster ships that can operate in shallow coastal waters.

It makes sense to provide the Navy and Air Force with adequate means to maintain their current comfortable margins of superiority over any probable foe. That can still be done for billions of dollars less than President Bush has just requested.

If the new Democratic-controlled Congress is serious about reducing budget deficits and finding the money to pay for acute domestic needs, it will have to pare back the most extravagant elements of this fantasy weapons wish list. Special responsibility falls on the Armed Services Committee chairmen in both houses, Senator Carl Levin and Representative Ike Skelton. Addiction to military pork is the one area in which bipartisanship has flourished in Washington in the past six years.

This nation can afford to pay for all of its legitimate military needs. What it cannot afford are costly jobs programs disguised as defense and the wasteful weapons projects promoted by an army of well-connected Washington lobbyists.

Fudging The Budget (NYT)

By Steven Rattner

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

WHEN President Bush sent his new budget to Congress yesterday, he trumpeted a continuing decline in the deficit and projected a swing back into the black by 2012.

But the accounting in the thick volumes issued by his Office of Management and Budget bears about as much similarity to the practices of private sector companies as Sanskrit does to Chinese. For sometimes obscure and sometimes political reasons, the federal government reports its finances in a way that portrays them far more favorably than they deserve.

The "official" deficit figure for the 2006 fiscal year is just under $250 billion. But a more accurate calculation would indicate a deficit nearly three times higher, and that is even without including some vast obligations the government owes. And while a strong economy is pushing down that headline deficit, the government's financial commitments actually grew more rapidly last year than in 2005.

In fact, the federal government itself obliquely acknowledges this chimera in a flotilla of other reports, including the obscure Financial Statement of the United States, prepared by the Government Accountability Office using methods closer to what a shareholder would find in an annual report.

These adjustments concentrate on one gap in federal budget bookkeeping: the government's failure to properly account for the cost of pensions for its own workers. Simply incorporating this liability would increase the federal deficit by roughly $200 billion.

But the official accounting is also misleading another way — specifically, in the way it handles Social Security. In 2006, the federal government received $185 billion more in Social Security taxes than it paid out in benefits. Unlike a private company, which keeps such overages in its pension fund to cover future benefits, the White House pockets the money and declares the deficit to be smaller.

Interestingly, until 1968, the federal government followed private sector practice by putting trust funds like Social Security in separate budgetary silos. Then President Lyndon B. Johnson appointed a commission that brought these programs into a new "unified budget."

While the commission argued that a single federal budget would be less confusing and more reflective of the government's overall impact on the economy, skeptical commentators noted the salubrious effect — in the midst of the Vietnam era guns-and-butter debate — of wrapping in the Social Security surplus.

Even if we adjusted properly for pensions and entitlements, we would leave unaddressed the largest financing gap, unheralded by President Bush yesterday: by some estimates, $39 trillion would have to be set aside now to pay for Social Security, Medicare and similar benefits that have already been promised. Just a year ago, those future obligations were $3 trillion less. Taken as a whole, the federal government's commitments have grown from $20 trillion in 2000 to $50 trillion today.

To be sure, arcane and even misleading accounting policies long predate the current administration; for the past 10 years, the G.A.O. has cited "material weaknesses in financial reporting" by the government. In recent Congressional testimony, David M. Walker, comptroller general of the accountability office, said, "Our fiscal and financial condition is worse than advertised."

And of course, the private sector has its shortcomings, particularly in providing medical benefits to retirees. But when it comes to pension obligations, the disparity is striking. Just two weeks ago, the consulting firm Towers Perrin reported that at the end of 2006, the pension funds of the Fortune 100 companies were actually overfinanced.

Meanwhile, in Washington, the damage from gaming federal accounting idiosyncrasies grows exponentially. When President Johnson created the unified budget for the 1969 fiscal year, the ultimate effect was to turn a deficit of $507 million into a surplus of $3.2 billion. Today, our budgetary sleight-of-hand obscures hundreds of billions of dollars of shortfalls.

Sadly, the solutions to this problem are well known and painful: more revenues (yes, including from rolling back President Bush's tax giveaway to the rich) or less spending (at long last, public outrage seems to be curbing the pork barrel "earmarking" process in Congress).

But we'll have to go further than that. To make meaningful progress, we will need to tackle Social Security and Medicare. One glimmer of hope regarding Social Security has emerged from Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, whose many years of studying corporate financial statements doubtless contribute to his offering to work toward solutions with "no preconditions." Both Democrats and Republicans should pull up chairs at Secretary Paulson's table with open minds.

Building a political consensus behind difficult measures would be easier if the public were more accurately apprised of our fiscal condition. Unfortunately, simply importing private sector accounting practices wouldn't properly express the complexity of the federal government's activities and obligations.

Instead, we need to elevate "accrual accounting," which better measures the government's future pension responsibilities, to the same level of public visibility as the "cash accounting" figures that are now emphasized. And our primary measure of our deficit should exclude the Social Security surplus. Finally, our obligations for future entitlements payments — the $39 trillion — should also be emphasized in reports like today's.

Back in 1802, Thomas Jefferson beseeched his Treasury secretary to adopt finances for America "as clear and intelligible as a merchant's books" so that "every man of any mind in the union should be able to comprehend them." More than 200 years later, that advice remains regrettably unheeded.

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act tried to reform misleading private sector practices. The federal government needs a similar effort.

Tax-Law Crackdown To Raise $29.5 Billion (WSJ)

By Rob Wells

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration is launching an effort to collect an estimated $29.5 billion in uncollected taxes, partly through new reporting requirements on securities sales.

The proposals to close part of the estimated $290 billion tax gap are included in the White House's proposed $2.9 trillion budget plan for the 2008 fiscal year, released Monday. (See related article1.)

Overall, President Bush's fiscal 2008 budget calls for $1.85 trillion in tax cuts over the next 10 years, primarily by making his first-term tax cuts permanent law. As he has in years past, Mr. Bush wants Congress to make into permanent law the repeal of estate taxes, reductions in income tax rates, and lower capital gains and dividends taxes. These tax cuts are due to expire in 2011.

Several new proposals this year would address the "tax gap," a measure of uncollected taxes. The Bush budget would require corporations, investors and merchants to report more details of their business dealings to the Internal Revenue Service. This is part of a move to boost the overall compliance rate with the tax code, which was 86% in 2001.

A key proposal in this expanded "information reporting" includes new reporting requirements for the basis of publicly traded securities, which involves a measure of stock purchase price plus any necessary adjustments. The Bush budget has few details of the plan and a Treasury spokeswoman declined immediate comment.

Underreporting of capital gains resulted in $11 billion of the tax gap, according to a 2001 IRS estimate.

Proposals to address capital gains shortfalls have been made on Capitol Hill, however. Congress' Joint Committee on Taxation last year proposed brokers to report to the client and to the IRS the adjusted basis of publicly traded securities sold during the preceding taxable year.

One congressional tax expert, Marc J. Gerson of the law firm Miller & Chevalier, said the Democratic-controlled Congress would find such a proposal attractive, particularly under new budget rules that require any tax benefits to be offset with revenue increases.

"Congress will be looking for money and they will gravitate towards this," said Mr. Gerson, a former Republican staff member on the House Ways and Means Committee.

Industry groups have warned about the burden posed by such plans. The Securities Industry Association has said such a tax basis reporting requirement "presents substantial challenges for brokers."

Other changes to tax information reporting would involve certain payments to corporations, expanded "broker information reporting," and reporting on merchant payment card reimbursements. It would also require a certified tax identification number from nonemployee service providers. And it would require increased information reporting for certain government payments for property and services. The plan also involves increased penalties for incomplete tax information returns.

The Bush budget plan also would expand a variety of tax penalties to deter wrongdoing by tax preparers, punish failure to comply with electronic filing requirements or for filing erroneous tax refunds.

Another major change would involve the airline ticket tax. The budget envisions a $69.7 billion tax cut due to modifying the "Airport and Airway trust fund," beginning in fiscal 2009. The budget said this proposal involves changing the funding of the Federal Aviation Administration.

"The FAA's current excise tax system, largely based on taxes on the price of airline tickets, does not have a direct relationship between the taxes paid by users and the air traffic control services provided by the FAA," the budget said.

"Under the reauthorization proposal, FAA would collect user fees from commercial aviation operators for air traffic control services starting in 2009," the proposal said.

New initiatives include revamping tax treatment of employer-provided health care. The President's proposals are designed to encourage more people to buy private health-care policies instead of relying solely on employer-provided plans.

This proposal would cost $121 billion through 2012, but it more than pays for itself through 2017, the budget contends, bringing in $5.15 billion over the 10 year period.

The proposal would classify employer-provided health insurance benefits as taxable income. It would give all taxpayers the same deduction for health insurance, $15,000 for families, $7,500 for singles. As a result, workers with a generous health plan, or "Cadillac" health plans, would pay taxes on the amount exceeding the deduction.

The budget also proposes expanding and making Health Savings Accounts more flexible, a $10.4 billion benefit.

In other areas, the Bush budget proposes $33 billion in tax incentives to boost savings and charitable giving, make health care more affordable, strengthen education and help the environment. It would permanently extend the corporate research and development tax credit, a proposal made in prior years.

It would repeal two energy tax breaks, such as a more favorable recovery period for natural gas distribution lines and write-offs for geological and geophysical exploration expenses. This would bring in $1.5 billion through 2017.

The budget would extend relief from the Alternative Minimum Tax for one year, in fiscal 2008, at a cost of $47.9 billion. The AMT was created in 1969 and was designed to halt tax evasion by the wealthy.

Congress failed to index the AMT to inflation and so it is capturing an increasing number of middle-income taxpayers in high-tax states such as New York, California and New Jersey. According to the Congressional Budget Office, with no change in law, the number of taxpayers subject to the AMT is expected to rise from four million in 2006 to 39 million by 2017.

Bush Proposes Change In How FAA Is Funded (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

President Bush told Congress he wants to scrap the passenger-ticket taxes used to help fund the air-traffic control system and replace them with user fees for commercial airlines.

The result, however, will be some air travelers, commercial airlines and corporate jet owners are likely to end up paying more to fly to pay for a new generation of traffic control technology.

If approved, the proposed changes would take effect in 2009 and mark a major shift in how the Federal Aviation Administration is funded. Fees would be assessed for flights depending on how much traffic controllers are used to guide them through the skies. It isn't yet clear if these fees would show up on tickets.

The current system uses a mixture of ticket taxes, fuel taxes and other add-ons to pay for air-traffic control. Business jets represent more than 18% of all flights, but they pay just 5% of those FAA fees. Airlines, which represent some two-thirds of flights but pay more than 90% of the fees, have long complained they are overpaying. They see this proposal as a victory of sorts.

"Whether there are three or 300 passengers on an aircraft, to an air traffic controller, a blip is a blip on the radar screen," said James C. May, president of the Air Transport Association, the leading airline trade group.

A major obstacle to getting the plan off the ground, though, is that the chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, Rep. Jim Oberstar (D., Minn.), has argued that the current tax system doesn't need changing.

"The proposal is pretty sketchy at this point," said Mr. Oberstar's spokesman, Jim Berard. "Until they can provide convincing evidence to change the system, then he isn't going to change the system."

There are 7,836 commercial airplanes and approximately 16,658 corporate aircraft registered in the U.S., according to the FAA. While the number of corporate aircraft is higher, commercial jets are used much more frequently and often fly longer distances, which adds to the workload of air traffic controllers. President Bush says the new system will better assess costs for using the air-traffic-control system.

Under the budget proposal, corporate jets and perhaps private aircraft would still fund the FAA through fuel taxes, albeit higher ones. That worries corporate fliers.

"We will be in overdrive" to lobby against the proposal, said Steve Brown, senior vice president of operations for the National Business Aviation Association, a Washington-based lobbying group. "We will contact all our members and you name it we will be out there."

FAA Administrator Marion Blakey demurred on details such as how much more in user fees would be generated to pay for the system. She said that more details would come "as early as next week" when the Bush administration plans to submit its plans for the reauthorization of FAA funding, due to expire later this year.

Next week, the Transportation Department is likely to spell out how the user-fee system would work, whether it would count the number of planes in the sky, how long they stay in the air, or landings and takeoffs.

What is clear though is that these proposed changes side with public commercial airliners rather than private corporate jets fliers in their debate over which is the fairer way to pay for use of the air traffic control system.

Commercial airliners pay through ticket taxes, the ones that Bush proposes to eliminate, and to a lesser extent fuel taxes.

Corporate fliers pay higher fuel taxes than commercial airliners for use of the system. But because corporate jets don't have ticket-paying passengers, they aren't subject to that tax.

Ms. Blakey said that there would be an increase in the fuel tax under the proposed system. "I think we will see increase on the fuel tax. I am talking about shifting of costs, not increasing of costs" overall.

McConnell Focuses On Judges As GOP Defines Top Priorities (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 6, 2007

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) is signaling to colleagues that he will take a personal and leading role in pressuring Democrats to confirm President Bush's judicial nominees, an issue that has received little attention since the election.

Republican senators agreed to make judicial nominees one of their top priorities at a one-day retreat held Friday at the Library of Congress before a meeting with Bush at the White House. Other key concerns, which senators designated in questionnaires they submitted to the Republican leadership, are fiscal policy, taxes, budget, healthcare, energy security, immigration reform and national security.

While Bush has said he still wants to push Social Security reform, the senators did not include it in their broad agenda for the next two years, indicating a lack of support for the measure.

At the retreat, various committees' ranking members led discussions on the GOP's highest priorities for the 110th Congress. Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), the top Republican on the Budget panel, led the discussion on fiscal policy and the budget. Sen. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.), ranking Republican on the Health Committee, led the debate on healthcare, and Energy and Natural Resources ranking member Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) spearheaded the talk on energy security.

McConnell kicked off the private talk on judges and reiterated his expectations of Democrats on judges during a press conference Monday.

"Senate Republicans expect that Bush be treated the same way during the last two years of his presidency as each of the last three presidents were treated in the last two years of theirs when the Senate was controlled by the opposition party," McConnell said yesterday.

McConnell said that during the last two years of the Reagan, the first Bush, and the Clinton administrations, the Senate confirmed an average of 17 circuit court nominees, adding that conversations with Senate Majority Leader Reid (D-Nev.) have left him optimistic "that standard will be met."

But that baseline would set a slightly faster pace for judicial confirmations than what the Senate followed in the last Congress when it confirmed 16 circuit nominees, according to the Department of Justice.

"That's a recognition that the best leverage we have isn't on the committee but on the floor, the ability to use leverage on the floor to insist on an up-or-down vote for judges," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), vice chairman of the GOP conference and a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

With a one-seat advantage on Judiciary, Democrats could slow the pace of judicial nominations to a trickle. But Republicans can pressure the panel to move more quickly by holding up Democratic legislative priorities on the chamber floor.

"I'm very encouraged by Sen. McConnell's personal interest in the subject," Cornyn said. "The role of the retreat was to agree on an approach and priorities."

With the conference priorities in hand, GOP leaders will begin working on specific policies. "The retreat helped us focus on the issues that most concern our constituents," said Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), the Senate GOP conference chairman. "The next step is working with the Policy Committee and our ranking members to add legislative detail to the guiding principles the conference crafted at our retreat. This is an ongoing process that will give every member an opportunity to help shape our agenda."

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the ranking Republican on Judiciary, said he was comfortable with McConnell's role. Specter worked with McConnell on the presentation before the meeting.

"McConnell started the discussion as to the confirmation process and then he asked me to supplement his views, which I did," Specter said. "He's the leader and I'm the ranking member. That sequence gave appropriate consideration to my position."

Specter said Democrats seem willing to approve Bush's court picks at an acceptable rate, noting that the committee approved five district court judges for a vote last week.

"Chairman [Patrick] Leahy (D-Vt.) has been entirely cooperative in moving judges," he said. "The indicators are that Democrats will be responsive to continuing the confirmation of judges. I'm anticipating a cooperative approach."

Sen. Mel Martinez (Fla.), the only Hispanic member of the GOP conference, led the discussion on immigration reform, an issue that split Senate Republicans last year. Martinez was careful not to spark another clash, emphasizing Republican consensus on such issues as the need to enhance border security and to ensure "the rule of law," an allusion to the blind eye that law enforcement sometimes turns to illegal immigration.

Specter, who is known for his outspokenness and independence, said Martinez has special expertise on the issue, but cautioned that all facets of the challenge must be addressed.

"While you have to deal with two subjects appropriately, you have to handle the 11 million and the guest worker program as well," he said, referring to America's estimated 11 million illegal immigrants.

On national security, Republican lawmakers have reached a consensus on the need to increase the size of the military, something Bush made a priority in the budget his administration made public Monday. Republicans have also reached a rough consensus on opposing Democratic plans to cut funds for base closings in the continuing funding resolution that will soon reach the floor. A GOP leadership aide said that Republicans will raise the issue repeatedly when the Senate considers that measure.

On the issue of fiscal discipline and taxes, Republican senators discussed the need to produce legislative proposals that give voters a better understanding of how GOP policies benefit their personal finances.

"One of the big points was that we have to explain our economic policy and how we feel about budgeting and taxes," a retreat participant said.

9th Circuit Steps Up En Banc Reviews (LAW)

DOJ_NMG_0128292

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, February 6, 2007

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals appears bent on reining in potential conflicts between its precedents and those in other circuits before they catch the eye of the U.S. Supreme Court.

The nation's largest federal appellate court issued 25 orders to rehear appeals by 15-judge en banc panels in 2006, the highest number in decades, with a whopping nine orders in one five-week period between Dec. 21, 2006, and Jan. 23, 2007, according to court records.

The latest spate of nine orders all came in criminal or habeas petitions.

"This is a noteworthy flurry of activity," said Arthur Hellman, a professor at the University of Pittsburgh School of Law who has written a book about the circuit and follows it closely. "One thing it says is the court is being proactive in clarifying its law."

Judge Alex Kozinski, a 9th Circuit judge since 1985 and slated to be chief judge at the end of the year, agreed. "There seems to be a greater willingness on the part of judges to view the en banc process as a continuing part of our responsibility in shaping circuit law," he said.

Circuit rules provide that a majority of the court's 26 active judges may order a full court reconsideration of three-judge panel decisions in a process known as en banc review. Because of the impracticality of all 26 judges sitting for rehearing, the circuit adopted a system of limited en bancs with random selections of 15 judges to rehear cases.

The en banc process is intended to eliminate conflicting panel decisions within the circuit and conflicts with precedents in other circuits.

In three of the nine cases that the court most recently voted to review en banc, the lower court panel had yet to issue a ruling. That generally happens when the three judges find a conflict within the circuit and refer the case to the entire court, according to Kozinski. Under circuit rules, three judges can't resolve the internal split; it must be done by en banc review.

PRO-GOVERNMENT RULINGS

Significant public policy issues may also drive en banc sessions, as in the case of a challenge to California's gubernatorial recall election that was reviewed and approved by an en banc panel in a nationally televised hearing.

In the late 1990s, former Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor encouraged 9th Circuit judges to take more cases en banc as a means of cutting down on its high reversal rate at the Supreme Court. The worst year for reversals was the high court's 1996-97 term, when it overturned 27 of 28 cases from the 9th Circuit.

After 1996, which had a low of 12 en banc reviews, the numbers fluctuated, with the highest, 23 cases, coming in 2003, until a new high of 25 cases was set last year, circuit figures show.

Hellman said one thing that stands out among the most recent cases taken up for en banc review is that in five of the panel decisions, four were in favor of the government and against the defendant. "I don't think you would see that in any other circuit, four out of five cases taken in quick succession to reconsider a favorable government ruling," he said.

In one of those cases, the court will examine the question of whether a potential airline passenger who passes successfully through a metal detector can then prevent the secondary screening by telling agents he has decided not to fly. U.S. v. Aukai, No. 04-10226. The three-judge panel said screeners should be allowed to search the passenger.

Another case under review held as harmless error the government's failure to disclose to the defense in a bank robbery case that someone who looked like the defendant had been convicted of nearby bank robberies. U.S. v. Jernigan, No. 05-10086.

Kozinski said the en banc process is "very disruptive and takes lots of resources." A lot of judges tend to vote against granting en bancs automatically because they philosophically oppose the en banc process. "It is a big bother and inconvenience," he said. But among newer judges, "it is viewed as an integral part of our work," he said.

He did not comment on individual cases but said, in general, "we pay attention to what other circuits do and if we look like an outlier we may take the case en banc." The thought is that the full court should do the extra work rather than create disagreement with another circuit, he said.

Snow Faults Bush Stand On Private Accounts (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0128293

NEW YORK -- Former Treasury Secretary John Snow said the Bush administration's first effort to overhaul Social Security failed because the administration was "intransigent" on private accounts.

Mr. Snow, Treasury secretary from 2003 to 2006, said the administration's insistence that a Social Security fix include private accounts carved out of the program shifted the focus from making the retirement program solvent. It would have been better, he said, to propose private accounts on top of the existing program, as some Democrats suggested. "You can't do health-care reform or Social Security reform ... without a bipartisan consensus," Mr. Snow said at the Private Equity Analyst Outlook conference last week, organized by Dow Jones & Co., publisher of The Wall Street Journal. "If we made a mistake, it was not approaching it in more of a bipartisan way." The administration's "condition for engaging" was private accounts carved out of the existing Social Security system, said Mr. Snow now chairman of private-equity firm Cerberus Capital Management.

Senate Seeks Intelligence Hub To Shield Satellites (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

Congress is calling for the creation of a new National Space Intelligence Center to better spy on space-based and other threats to U.S. military, intelligence and commercial satellites.

A provision of the Senate intelligence authorization bill for fiscal 2007 would require the Bush administration to set up the new center within the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (ODNI). The plan was disclosed in a little-noticed section of committee's report on the bill made public Jan. 24.

The report stated that threats to U.S. satellites are increasing, a fact highlighted by China's recent test of an anti-satellite (ASAT) missile interceptor that destroyed a Chinese weather satellite. U.S. reliance on satellites for both national security and commerce is increasing and "a loss of any or all of these assets could do tremendous harm to our economy and security," the report said.

Intelligence spending on spying "concerning threats to our interests in space has declined markedly," and only 10 percent of current intelligence resources are focused on threats to space systems, the report said.

"Recent international events have only served to highlight this problem," the report said in a reference to China's Jan. 11 anti-satellite weapon test, which has drawn international criticism, and an earlier incident involving a Chinese laser illumination of a U.S. satellite in what U.S. intelligence officials said was likely a ground-based laser ASAT test.

Further details about the new center are contained in the classified portions of the Senate bill.

A congressional aide close to the issue said the proposal has good support from Republicans and Democrats in Congress, and gained support after China's recent anti-satellite weapon test.

"We haven't been doing a very good job identifying what the threats are in space across the government," the aide said. "The idea of the center is basically to try to network the existing analytical staff around one office."

The White House said it supports improving space intelligence but has concerns about lines of authority in the current draft legislation.

Gordon Johndroe, a White House National Security Council spokesman, said the administration was "encouraged" by the committee plan to improve space-related intelligence, "but [we] are concerned that the National Space Intelligence Center will not solve the problems they are trying to address," he said, noting the legislation as now drafted "blurs lines of accountability and responsibility for space systems" between the ODNI and the Pentagon's intelligence policy office.

The Chinese ASAT test last month involved the launch of a missile into space with a nonexplosive warhead that destroyed the Chinese satellite. U.S. officials said it was a "wake-up call" on the danger of space weapons. According to U.S. intelligence officials, U.S. satellites have little or no ability to report whether they are under attack, or even threatened.

According to the Senate report, the space intelligence center would be devoted solely to gathering and analyzing intelligence on space threats, and would work closely with similar Air Force and Defense Intelligence Agency centers in Ohio and Alabama. The director would be the national Intelligence officer for science and technology.

Air Force Gen. Kevin Chilton, commander of the Air Force Space Command, the lead military unit for space defense and warfare, said recently there is an growing need for better intelligence on space threats because the danger of attacks on satellites is increasing.

"The knowledge base you need [for space intelligence] is different than the knowledge base you need for air-breathing intelligence, land intelligence or naval intelligence," he told reporters in September.

Pelosi Catches Nonstop Flights Home (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

Amid rumblings from conservatives that she is seeking special treatment, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D) will receive use of an Air Force jet larger than the one used by her predecessor, Rep. J. Dennis Hastert, so she can fly nonstop to her home in San Francisco.

Ever since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the speaker, who is next in line for the presidency after the vice president, has been given use of a government plane for security reasons. Hastert (R-Ill.), who had flown commercially before the attacks, was the first to have use of a plane. But the one he traveled in was too small to make it to California without refueling.

Yesterday, the House sergeant-at-arms issued a statement saying that the leadership is awaiting word from the Air Force on the rules for using the plane. It is unclear, for example, who can travel with Pelosi and whether she can return home from a political event on the taxpayer-funded plane.

Pelosi's office requested the guidelines, triggering a story in the Washington Times in which sources questioned whether she was asking for more than the former speaker received.

Democratic aides sputtered about a "right-wing hatchet job" to make Pelosi look bad. But, said one involved in the negotiations, "this is about security, not about convenience."

An aide in Hastert's office said yesterday that the former speaker used the plane for official business but not for political travel. He did at times transport his wife and staff when he was flying to and from Illinois.

Brendan Daley, a spokesman for Pelosi, said that she will not use the plane for political travel.

Inside Politics (WT)

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

Remember Reagan

Former President Ronald Reagan would have been 96 today. Rest assured, folks are celebrating -- and in splendid style.

Edwin I. Meese III, attorney general during the Reagan administration, will preside over activities at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library in Simi Valley, Calif., which include an Air Force flyover, a 21-gun salute, the 1st Marine Division Band, the U.S. Naval Academy Men's Glee Club, a wreath-laying -- and cake, of course.

Virginia-based Young America's Foundation, which operates an educational retreat for budding conservatives at Mr. Reagan's former ranch in the California foothills, will offer a daylong open house in the ranch conference center in Santa Barbara. The group also has begun a grass-roots effort to urge college professors across the nation to display the American flag in their classrooms.

"College conservatives can combat the lies their professors and administrators tell about Reagan. Students will distribute posters that highlight the success of the Reagan presidency, including a 5.1 percent increase each year in charitable giving, a 31 percent increase in the gross national product, an 18 percent increase in real disposable income per capita and 18.4 million new jobs created," the group said.

No surprise

"The only surprise about the Republican debacle in the 2006 congressional elections was that many conservatives found it surprising," Paul M. Weyrich and William S. Lind of the Free Congress Foundation write in the latest issue of the American Conservative.

DOJ_NMG_0128295

"Conservatism has become so weak in ideas that during the presidency of George W. Bush, the word 'conservative' could be and was applied with scant objection to policies that were starkly anti-conservative," the authors write, adding: "The next conservative movement will not be credible if it is led by people and institutions that sold out to today's equivalent of Rockefeller Republicanism."

Bush bashers

Evan Thomas of Newsweek says it is the job of reporters to "bash" President Bush.

Friday on WETA-TV's "Inside Washington" program, the topic was "whether the media's been unfair to President Bush, given his abysmal approval ratings," Tim Graham reports at www.NewsBusters.org. "NPR reporter Nina Totenberg said Bush received a 'free ride' for years, so now the worm has turned and the coverage is fierce."

Host Gordon Peterson then asked for Mr. Thomas' opinion: "What do you think, Evan? Are the mainstream media bashing the president unfairly?"

Mr. Thomas: "Well, our job is to bash the president; that's what we do almost."

Mr. Peterson: "But unfairly?"

Mr. Thomas: "Mmmm -- I think when he rebuffed, I think when he just kissed off the Iraq Study Group, the Baker-Hamilton commission, there was a sense then that he was decoupling himself from public opinion and Congress and the mainstream media, going his own way. At that moment, he lost whatever support he had."

Uniform response

Inquiring on the matter of "allowing gays and lesbians to serve in the military," a Harris poll released yesterday found that political parties disagree. "There is a large partisan split on this issue," the findings stated.

When asked whether homosexuals should serve openly in the armed services, 37 percent of Republican respondents and 69 percent of Democratic respondents agreed. The nationwide average on the question was 55 percent.

If they served in the military but kept their homosexuality a secret, 30 percent of Republicans and 10 percent of Democrats would approve; nationwide, the number was 19 percent. Should homosexuals be barred altogether from military service? Among Republicans, 21 percent agreed with the idea, and among Democrats, 7 percent. Nationwide, 13 percent agreed.

Harris conducted the poll of 2,337 adults from Jan. 11 to 18, with a margin of error of two percentage points.

MoveOn.org is seeking donations to air a TV ad featuring fake video footage depicting President Bush, Russian President Vladimir Putin and French President Jacques Chirac snoozing in their jammies. The spot is meant to "wake up" world leaders to global warming and one day may be broadcast in Washington and other major cities. The footage shows Mr. Bush cradling a teddy bear, Mr. Putin a gun and Mr. Chirac a satin pillow.

"The leaders of the world's most polluting countries will be meeting in Germany this June. The priorities for this summit are being decided right now," MoveOn spokeswoman Eli Pariser said yesterday.

The group also has started a global warming advocacy division, which features the spot at its Web site, www.avaaz.org. Avaaz means "voice" in Hindi, Urdu and Farsi.

The Arnold tapes

Oh dear. Once again, the Los Angeles Times got a hold of some recordings of closed-door staff meetings of California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and four of his closest aides. Of course, the paper published the details, deeming the tapes "a rare window onto the governor's operation" and a "complex portrait."

In the latest recordings, he describes Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata, Oakland Democrat, as a "very sick man" and Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez, Los Angeles Democrat, as "a political operator coming from the union background" who evinces no real "passion" about issues.

Mr. Schwarzenegger called Mexico our "trading partner," but he also said that Hispanics -- because they are so close to their homeland -- have more trouble assimilating than, say, Poles, Germans and the French.

"I made an effort," the Austrian-born governor said. "But the Mexicans don't make that effort."

Waiting for Hillary

DOJ_NMG_0128296

The brewing rivalry between Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois presents a significant political moment as black Democrats gauge their loyalties.

"Barack Obama may be the emerging rock star of the 2008 presidential field, but Hillary Rodham Clinton still is the queen of the stage among Michigan Democrats -- and even more so among black Democrats," the Detroit Free Press said yesterday.

The newspaper polled 87 black Democratic voters to reveal that they prefer Mrs. Clinton over Mr. Obama, 59 percent to 23 percent. State Sen. Tupac Hunter called Mr. Obama "the best candidate we've ever been able to produce as a community."

But Beverly Bellamy of Farmington Hills said of Mr. Obama: "I like him -- don't get me wrong," but Mrs. Clinton gets her vote.

"I've been waiting for her. I just think she has a lot to bring to the table," Mrs. Bellamy said, adding that Mr. Obama's relative lack of experience on the national stage -- he is two years into his first federal term of office -- counts against him.

In Senate, Flip-flops Come Easy For Both Parties (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 6, 2007

Just as Republicans did in 1995, Democrats took over Congress this year pledging to change the way that Washington, D.C., works. But listening to debate on the Senate floor over the past month, it's clear that no matter who runs the place, the script is largely the same.

Consider this scenario: The Senate Majority Leader takes to the floor decrying the death of an ethics and lobbying reform bill, blaming the minority party for insisting on an amendment that is not germane to the underlying measure.

"This amendment has nothing to do with lobbying reform or ethics reform of this body — something that is important, something that is the business of the Senate right now on the floor," the Majority Leader said. He added, "We had a totally unrelated amendment injected, I believe, for partisan purposes."

That may sound a lot like what Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said during debate on a lobbying and ethics bill two weeks ago when Republicans demanded a vote on an amendment to give the president limited line-item veto authority.

But the quote is actually from former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) on March 8, 2006, when — during debate on the exact same ethics and lobbying bill — Democrats insisted on a vote on an amendment to stop a Middle Eastern-owned company from taking over management of many of the nation's ports.

While Frist pulled the bill to avoid a vote on the ports issue, Reid negotiated with Republicans to postpone the line-item veto debate. But Reid's rhetoric was no less accusatory.

"They hate this bill, and this is their excuse to kill it," Reid said at a press conference Jan. 18.

It seems that no matter who is in the majority in the Senate, the ruling party bemoans the "obstructionism" of the minority, while the minority bristles at the majority's efforts to limit the number of amendments and debate time.

The irony of this sudden and wholesale shift in rhetoric hasn't been completely lost on Senators of both parties, even as they swear they are doing things slightly differently than their predecessors.

"We sent them all our scripts, and they sent us all of theirs," joked Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), acknowledging that Democrats have adopted the same stances once held by Republicans on the issue of how many and what amendments should be offered to bills.

But he still defended the new majority, saying, "I like to think we are taking a more reasonable approach. We want to give them time to amend without allowing them to obstruct."

Noting that Senate Democrats pulled the same stunt last year on the lobbying and ethics bill, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) defended his party's adoption of the standard minority script. "In fairness to Senate Republicans, to portray an effort to get votes on this bill as something unusual is truly astonishing," he said at the press conference.

Still, the two parties were parroting their predecessors again last week during debate on the minimum-wage bill.

Sens. Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) and Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) complained Jan. 30 on the Senate floor that Republicans were dragging out debate on the bill and that the chamber had been debating it for seven days, or as Dorgan noted, "some long while."

It's a refrain Republicans often struck in the past 12 years — counting every day that a bill technically has been up for debate on the Senate floor, even if some of those days passed in silent quorum calls. But now, by their own admission, they're using minority math.

"The minority will always count the days on a bill as those days we are allowed to vote. We only voted three out of seven," Sen. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) said on the Senate floor that same day. "We will insist we get votes on amendments as we proceed through this bill and other bills."

For the people who have to record what the parties are saying about each other, it has been a little surreal.

"It's hard for me to keep a straight face," one veteran Capitol Hill journalist said of listening to Republicans complain about the very practices they just months ago inflicted on Democrats.

Even aides who have to deal with the press acknowledge that their complaints are being ignored in large part.

"The arguments about unfairness mostly fall on deaf ears because Republicans had no problem running over Democrats when they were in the majority," said one GOP communications staffer.

Behind it all is a deep distrust between the parties about each other's motives for doing anything on the Senate floor.

"When Democrats were in the minority and were opposing things, we made no bones about it. We said, 'We're blocking this and this is why,'" said one senior Senate Democratic aide. "But the Republicans are being disingenuous. ... They don't want to vote for [the minimum-wage increase]. They do want to stall it."

Republicans, however, charged that the old Democratic minority actually wanted to kill legislation. The new GOP minority just wants to make it better.

"They did a lot of obstruction of getting things done," said Steering Committee Chairman Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), the author of several amendments Democrats have sought to avoid voting on this year. "But we've talked a lot in [the Republican] Conference about how not to do something just to obstruct, but to try to get some substantive changes through."

That sentiment was echoed by Chief Deputy Minority Whip John Thune (R-S.D.), who charged that Republicans filed motions to shut off debate on bills only 47 times during the entire 109th Congress, while Reid already has filed cloture eight times in four weeks.

"So far they're on a pace that totally eclipses us," Thune said. "We're simply asking for our prerogatives to offer amendments."

Still, if you ask DeMint about his ability to exercise his prerogatives, he estimates that things are slightly better for him given the minority's historic insistence on offering amendments.

"It's not a bad role. I've been able to get more amendments up and some passed than I did when I was in the majority," DeMint said. "So far, I like the role."

And Republicans continued to play their role Monday, causing Reid to grouse about GOP refusals to vote on a nonbinding Iraq resolution.

"Their excuse?" Reid asked. "A feeble claim that they haven't been guaranteed a vote on alternative amendments and resolutions."

Chief Justice Counsels Humility (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

Attention, Supreme Court practitioners! Absolutely free advice on how to make your briefs better-read, your arguments more closely followed, your justices more sympathetic, courtesy of the man who's been successful on both sides of the table, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.

First, pretend that you're not always right.

"We get hundreds and hundreds of briefs, and they're all the same," Roberts told a crowd of eager law students and faculty members last week at the Northwestern University School of Law in Chicago. "Somebody says, 'My client clearly deserves to win, the cases clearly do this, the language clearly reads this,' blah, blah blah. And you pick up the other side and, lo and behold, they think they clearly deserve to win."

DOJ_NMG_0128298

How about a little recognition that it's a tough job? Roberts asked.

"I mean, if it was an easy case, we wouldn't have it."

He dispensed advice for lawyers, law students and law-school deans during a question-and-answer session that followed a more formal address.

Roberts built a reputation as a powerful Supreme Court litigator, arguing nearly 40 cases as a government attorney and private lawyer and winning about 70 percent of the time. He was known for anticipating hundreds of questions from the justices and carefully practicing each response.

But after 16 months as a justice, he advised that lawyers try to become more "attuned" to what judges are asking. "I would try today to be much more receptive, try to process more effectively, 'Now what does that question tell me about what that judge is thinking?' and respond rapidly rather than trying to stick to my script," Roberts said.

The chief justice said an acknowledgment that the justices face a complicated case can attract sympathy from the bench, while an argument that a case is a no-brainer is a challenge to start looking for holes.

And for the truly brave-hearted advocate, Roberts offered this:

"You don't see it very often and it can obviously be risky, but for somebody to get up and say, 'The biggest argument against us is' whatever, 'this precedent that you decided six years ago, and if you were going to follow it down the line, my client should probably lose. Here's why I think you shouldn't follow it in this case.' " He added: "I think that type of an approach could be very effective."

As for law students, Roberts said he thinks they are more impressive than they were when he graduated from Harvard nearly three decades ago. "People who apply to be clerks [for the justices], for example, it's not just that they did well in law school -- they've got other degrees, they've spent time working in a business, they've written books and cured diseases," he said to laughter.

But he's not sure whether law grads are always able to put their knowledge to work.

"I don't think they spend a great deal of time with what somebody like a Cicero might refer to as rhetoric, or the idea of taking their understanding of ideas and being able to communicate them in a particular way," Roberts said, adding that the ability to advocate or negotiate is "such a big part of what lawyers do no matter where you go."

If he were dean of a law school, Roberts said, looking at Northwestern Dean David E. Van Zandt, he might spend more time on that.

And he took one other stand, when a student asked whether judges' terms should be limited, adding: "Some of our professors say that."

"Um, you know, I'm not in favor of term limits for judges," Roberts deadpanned.

Service Sector Extends Advance But Signals Pace Might Slow (WSJ)

The service sector, whose strength fueled the nation's economic growth last year despite a housing slump and higher interest rates, extended its robust performance into 2007.

The Institute for Supply Management, an Arizona-based group of corporate purchasing managers, said its index of nonmanufacturing business activity in the U.S. rose to 59 in January from 56.7 in December. Readings over 50 indicate expansion, and January's surge marked the 46th consecutive month that the service sector, which includes everything from massage therapists to financial planners, has grown.

Steady growth in the service sector, which makes up roughly 80% of the U.S. economy, is particularly important now because the manufacturing sector is struggling with high inventories and soft demand for houses and cars.

In January, the ISM measure of manufacturing activity fell below 50 for the second time in three months, suggesting that business at American factories is flat or even contracting.

"The services juggernaut is steamrolling forward and will contribute to a solid economic expansion in 2007," said Brian Bethune, an economist at consulting firm Global Insight, in a note to clients.

Despite the service industry's uptick in January, the ISM's measures of new orders, employment and inventories in the service sector pointed to a slower rate of expansion in the months ahead. "I don't see substantial growth, but in the same respect, people are pretty positive that it's going to be stable over the next few months," said Anthony Nieves, who oversees the survey and also is purchasing manager for Hilton Hotels Corp.

Meanwhile, in Europe, the service sector in the 13 nations that share the euro currency grew unexpectedly in January at the fastest pace in six months, and private-sector companies raised their prices more aggressively than at any time since November 2000.

The headline measure of service-sector activity in the euro zone rose to 57.9 in January from 57.2 in December, with activity strengthening in Germany, France and Italy, according to a survey of corporate purchasing managers conducted by NTC Research. Economists surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires last week had expected the purchasing managers index to fall to 56.7.

Private-sector companies reported that they continued to hire new workers for the 17th straight month, which suggests domestic demand in the euro zone should continue picking up.

Expansion In Services Sector Set Strong Pace In January (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

Weakness in manufacturing, especially the auto industry, may be damping economic prospects, but the bigger services sector appears to be more than making up for it.

The Institute for Supply Management, which is based in Tempe, Ariz., said yesterday that its index of business activity in the nonmanufacturing sector advanced to 59.0 in January, from 56.7 in December. Wall Street analysts had expected a reading of 57 for January.

A reading above 50 indicates expansion, while one below that indicates contraction.

The trade group's report on the manufacturing sector last week indicated that it contracted in January, in contrast to the services sector, which grew for the 46th consecutive month.

"Manufacturing is weakening as domestic auto manufacturers cut back and as residential construction declines," said Mark Vitner, a senior economist with Wachovia Securities, but he noted that manufacturing made up only about a quarter of the economy. The services sector, which represents about three-quarters of the economy, continued to grow.

Scott Brown, chief economist with Raymond James & Associates in St. Petersburg, Fla., said the "headline figure was stronger than the details," suggesting that the survey — like other recent economic data — was not sending clear signals about the near term.

He said the economy was still expanding, and projected economic growth of 2.5 percent to 3 percent.

The new-orders index weakened slightly to 55.4 in January, from 55.6 in December, while the backlog of orders strengthened to 49.0, from 48.0 the previous month.

Prices increased at a slower rate, with the prices index registering 55.2 in January, down from 59.7 in December.

Some of the respondents told the trade group that "costs are starting to come down — especially petroleum-related costs," the study said. Crude oil prices were up yesterday in reaction to frigid weather in major United States markets.

The services employment index, meanwhile, moved down to 51.7 in January, from 53.2 in December.

Dow Edges Higher On H-P But Microsoft Hampers Rise (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

The Dow Jones Industrial Average crept higher, helped by Hewlett-Packard but hampered by Microsoft.

Both technology bellwethers are components of the Dow, which gained 8.25 points, or 0.7%, to end at 12661.74, up 1.6% on the year. That left the blue-chip average 11.94 points shy of its closing record, set Thursday.

Hewlett-Packard shares rallied 1.8% after it agreed to acquire business-software firm Bristol Technology. Microsoft shares slid 1.9% after Apple warned that iPod users might experience compatibility problems with Microsoft's new Vista operating system.

The trading session was muted, following a frenzied week that included the first meeting of Federal Reserve policy makers this year and release of various economic data.

In the absence of big economic news yesterday, deal making and other company-specific events moved a few bellwether names but had little influence on the broader market.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.1%, or 1.40 points, to 1446.99, up 2% on the year. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index fell 0.2%, or 5.28 points, to 2470.60, up 2.3% on the year.

"In a bull market like the one we've had, there have to be some days like this," said Michael Cuggino, president and portfolio manager for the Permanent Portfolio Family of Funds.

Oil prices seesawed, at first aided by frigid weather in the Northeast that seems likely to spur demand for heating fuel in the days ahead. But comments by Nigeria's oil minister eased supply concerns, and crude futures ended lower.

Contracts for March delivery slipped 28 cents, or 0.5%, to $58.74 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The Institute for Supply Management's nonmanufacturing survey, a measure of the U.S. economy's service sector, rose faster in January than Wall Street expected.

By contrast, ISM's more closely watched manufacturing survey, released last week, was surprisingly weak.

Many investing pros interpret such mixed economic signals as confirmation of a gradual, relatively harmless slowdown in economic growth that could still leave room for a stock rally in the months ahead.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed1; bonds rose2. The 10-year note gained 5/32 point, or $1.56 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.81%. The 30-year bond rose 7/32 point to yield 4.91%.

The dollar was mixed3. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 120.41 yen, compared with 121.04 yen on Friday. The euro fell to $1.2928, compared with $1.2967.

Mixed News Produces Mixed Results (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, February 6, 2007

Mixed economic and corporate news Monday resulted in mixed and unexciting action on Wall Street.

The Dow Jones industrials gained 8.25 points to 12,661.74, while the Nasdaq composite index lost 5.28 points to 2470.60, and the Standard & Poor's 500 index lost 1.40 points to 1446.99.

On the plus side was Wal-Mart's report of stronger-than-expected sales in January at stores open at least a year. A burst of acquisitions underscored that big institutional investors see bargains in the market. Meanwhile, the Institute for Supply Management's (ISM) data showed stronger-than-anticipated growth by the service sector in January.

That good news was weighed down by more volatility in oil prices and the growing belief the economy may be too strong to allow the Federal Reserve to cut short-term interest rates soon.

But the fact the economy is growing should be viewed as a positive, says A.C. Moore, strategist at Dunvegan Associates. "The ISM reinforced the Goldilocks scenario (Fed Chairman Ben) Bernanke has been suggesting," Moore says. "That's a good combination for markets."

Investors, though, may have gotten too exuberant about stocks too quickly, perhaps setting them up for a fall, Moore says. "We're starting to correct from the flip up to new highs," he says. "That usually suggests markets could pull back."

This year, the Dow is up 1.6%, the S&P 500 2.0% and Nasdaq 2.3%.

What's cooling markets more than anything is that there's a lack of convincing news to keep bulls excited, says Michael Farr of Farr Miller & Washington. Corporate earnings seasons is a case in point.

While results "are coming in nicely," the growth has been shy of the double-digit-plus growth posted in the previous 18 quarters, he says. "We're looking for the next leg of the bull market, but we need a catalyst to get excited."

A.B.A. Panel Would Weaken Code Governing Judges' Conduct (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

A commission of the American Bar Association has recommended that the group weaken its code of judicial conduct by changing, from a mandatory rule to nonbinding advice, an instruction to judges to "avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety."

Supporters of the change say disciplining judges for violating a concept as vague as "the appearance of impropriety" is unfair. Opponents denounce any retreat from the longstanding and widely embraced standard, and one critic — Robert H. Tembeckjian, the administrator of the New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct — has resigned in protest as an adviser to the A.B.A. commission.

"At a time when the A.B.A. is defending judicial independence from relentless attack," Mr. Tembeckjian wrote in a resignation letter on Saturday, "I cannot imagine that either the judiciary or the public will applaud the A.B.A. for relegating the 'impropriety and appearance of impropriety' standard to a virtually meaningless phrase."

The change is part of what would be the first comprehensive revisions to the association's Model Code of Judicial Conduct since 1990; the revisions now go before the group's House of Delegates, which meets in Miami next week, before they can become formal policy. Individual states often look to the model code as a template for their own judicial ethics codes, violation of which can lead to punishment as severe as removal from the bench.

The change was a late-breaking development, coming more than three years after the commission began a periodic review of the code.

The very first canon of the proposed revisions continues to say that judges "shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety."

But recently added language in the introduction to the code says that while that and other canons provide "important guidance," judges cannot be disciplined for violating them. The canons are followed by rules that are more specific (judges may not, for instance, use the prestige of their offices for financial advantage), and the new introduction says that only those rules may serve as the basis for discipline.

Cynthia Gray, the director of the Center for Judicial Ethics of the American Judicature Society, a nonpartisan group promoting judicial independence and integrity, questioned the commission's strategy.

"To leave it in the language and later say the language doesn't count," Ms. Gray said, "is strange and inexplicable to us."

Mark I. Harrison, the chairman of the A.B.A. commission, said the "appearance of impropriety" standard was vague and added nothing to the rules prohibiting specific conduct that remain mandatory.

"We think it's a step forward," Mr. Harrison said of the commission's decision. "It is important as a matter of due process and fairness to make clear what would be the basis for disciplinary enforcement without ambiguity and without confusion."

Jonathan Lippman, New York's chief administrative judge, disagreed, saying the "appearance of impropriety" standard was sensible and workable. "I don't think this is nuclear science," he said. "Judges overwhelmingly approve of that standard as a basis on which to go about their daily business."

The association has urged judges since 1924 to avoid the appearance of impropriety, and returned to the subject in 1972 and 1990.

“Every time the A.B.A. addressed this standard, it was strengthened,” Mr. Tembeckjian wrote in his resignation letter. “Until now.”

Victoria Henley, the president of the Association of Judicial Disciplinary Counsel, whose members hear and consider complaints against judges, said the recent revisions were unlikely to gain wide acceptance. “If they basically gut the ‘appearance of impropriety’ standard,” Ms. Henley said, “it’s unlikely that the A.B.A. will continue to be responsible for drafting a model code that will be used by any state.”

Giuliani Nearing Full-fledged Candidacy (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, February 6, 2007

Rudy Giuliani, the former New York City mayor who became a national hero for his response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, suggested Monday that a formal presidential announcement was a matter of when, not if.

"Today we just took another step toward running for president," the Republican said, hours after filing a so-called "statement of candidacy" with the Federal Election Commission, which moved him closer to a full-fledged campaign.

"It's a big step, an important one. Quite honestly, we're probably ahead of schedule," Giuliani told reporters in Long Island while campaigning with a state Senate candidate. "We still have to think about a formal announcement and how to do it, but this is a pretty strong step."

Later, in an interview on Fox News' "Hannity & Colmes," Giuliani was more direct. "I'm in this to win," he said. "My campaign is going to be about the future."

Unlike chief GOP rivals Sen. John McCain and Mitt Romney, Giuliani had thus far been ambiguous about whether he would pursue the Republican nomination, even though he had taken the initial steps.

In recent weeks, Giuliani's cautious and noncommittal attitude caused some critics to question whether he would abandon his bid even before formally entering the race, as he did in 2000 when he was considering a Senate campaign against Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Fighting back, Giuliani started to sound and act like a strong contender lately, traveling to the early primary states of New Hampshire and South Carolina, and arguing that his vision for the future and performance in the past would make him a formidable GOP nominee.

Behind the scenes, he has been busy supplementing his cadre of New York loyalists with Washington-savvy political operatives, establishing a fundraising network and setting up a campaign headquarters — signs of a campaign moving forward.

Publicly, however, he had stopped short of committing to a run, insisting he had to decide whether he could make a "unique contribution" to help strengthen the country — his barometer for whether to run.

"There's a real good chance," Giuliani said Saturday in South Carolina, another coy answer to what had been a constant question on the campaign trail.

However slight, the shift in campaign organization — coupled with his public comments Monday — indicates Giuliani likes the response he's received as he gauges support while traveling the country.

In November, Giuliani took the preliminary step of creating a committee to explore a candidacy but added the caveat that he was simply "testing the waters" — a provision that allows truly uncertain candidates to move forward with no commitment to seek a top spot on the ticket nor the need to identify donors. At the time, Giuliani also did not file an official statement declaring he was a presidential candidate and indicating he would seek the presidency as a Republican should he decide to go forward.

Monday's steps, including eliminating the phrase "testing the waters," put Giuliani on the same level legally as McCain and Romney, the other top-tier GOP candidates who have formed regular exploratory committees and filed statements of candidacy.

Despite being immensely popular in national polls, Giuliani faces hurdles to securing the Republican nomination state by state. His moderate stances on issues such as gun control, abortion and gay rights do not sit well with hard-core social conservatives who are a crucial voting group in the nominating contests. His two divorces could be obstacles as well.

But conservatives also aren't entirely sold on McCain, an Arizona senator, and Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, and that could even the playing field for Giuliani. He hopes primary and caucus voters look past his liabilities and consider his record of leadership in difficult times.

Giuliani was in his final months as New York City mayor when two planes crashed into the World Trade Center's towers on Sept. 11. Within hours of the attack, the mayor was visiting the site, caked in dust and walking through the chaos — a moment replayed repeatedly on television.

He was a former U.S. attorney, leading campaigns against organized crime and corruption. He spent two years as the Justice Department's No. 3 official, overseeing all U.S. attorneys, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the U.S. Marshals Service. The Brooklyn native was first elected New York's mayor in 1993.

Giuliani dropped his bid for the U.S. Senate in 2000 while battling prostate cancer and a made-for-tabloids divorce from Donna Hanover.

Giuliani Steps Closer To A Run In 2008 (NYT)

By The New York Times

Rudolph W. Giuliani took another step toward running for president by filing a "statement of candidacy" with the Federal Election Commission yesterday, declaring that he would seek the Republican nomination if he runs, according to his campaign.

Appearing last night on the Fox News Channel program "Hannity & Colmes," Mr. Giuliani just skirted the line on declaring his candidacy. "We still have to formally announce it and do a few more things," he said, but added that yesterday's paperwork "is about as close as you're going to get."

When asked if he would beat Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton if he won the Republican nomination, he said, "I'm in this to win." Then he added, "You do this because you believe that you can win the nomination of your party, and then you believe that you're the strongest candidate to win the election for your party."

Mr. Giuliani, the former New York City mayor, is also amending a document he already filed with the commission, dropping the phrase "testing the waters" from his application, officials on his campaigns said.

Compared with his top rivals in 2008 at this point, Senator John McCain of Arizona and former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, Mr. Giuliani has moved more slowly to hire staff members and build a state-by-state political organization.

An aide to Mr. Giuliani said the new filing with the election commission was mostly housekeeping work, bringing Mr. Giuliani's paperwork into line with that of Mr. McCain's and Mr. Romney's.

Former NYC mayor files 'statement of candidacy'

WASHINGTON -- Rudolph Giuliani all but announced he is running for president Monday night, saying "I'm in this to win" and suggesting the only thing left to make it official is a formal declaration.

"We still have to formally announce it and do a few more things, but this is about as close as you're going to get," Giuliani said on Fox News Channel.

Giuliani's appearance was part of a carefully choreographed effort by his campaign to put to rest questions among Republicans about whether he is serious about running.

Newsday articles last week also raised questions, saying that Giuliani had failed to file a formal statement of candidacy that nearly every other presidential hopeful has submitted. He also omitted his party registration on another form.

Giuliani Monday filed the statement of candidacy listing himself as a Republican candidate for president and amended a second form, dropping the words "testing the waters."

"Today, we just took another step toward running for president," Giuliani told reporters in Floral Park while campaigning with State Senate candidate Maureen O'Connell. "This is a pretty strong step."

Three people close to the campaign agreed, with one source saying Giuliani wouldn't have filed the papers if he didn't have every intention of running.

"There will be a time at some point when he makes a formal announcement, but ... he's moving in that direction," said another campaign source, who noted that Giuliani's communications and political staffs started work Monday.

But Giuliani's statements went further even than those of his aides, not merely signaling his seriousness but stopping just short of declaring.

"I'm in this to win," Giuliani said later when asked if he could beat New York Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton. "You do this because you believe that you can win the nomination of your party, and then you believe that you're the strongest candidate to win the election for your party."

Asked who was the bigger Yankee fan, he or Clinton, Giuliani joked, "Well, we could do a debate on Yankee trivia and find out."

If he entered the race today, Giuliani would come into the contest atop several national polls. But he would face trouble converting his national recognition after 9/11 into votes among conservatives who oppose his stances on social issues.

"Hannity & Colmes" host Sean Hannity pressed Giuliani on those positions, leading Giuliani to reiterate his support for abortion rights but edge away from his earlier support of a procedure known by opponents as partial-birth abortion. He also said he supported gun control in certain situations and a path to legalized immigration.

Doubts about Giuliani's intentions and stance on issues have put a crimp in early efforts to attract donors.

Giuliani Announces He's In '08 Presidential Race (WP)

Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani jumped into the 2008 presidential race yesterday, filing a statement of candidacy with the Federal Election Commission and declaring on national television last night, "I'm in this to win."

Giuliani's actions were aimed at erasing any lingering doubts about whether he would enter the 2008 campaign and came after an intensive month of activity in which he has stepped up his political travels, broadened his political team and expanded his fundraising operation. A formal announcement will come later, Giuliani said.

Giuliani, 62, served two terms as mayor of New York and earned widespread praise for his leadership after terrorists struck the city on Sept. 11, 2001. He leads the field of declared and prospective Republican presidential candidates in national polls and, with Sen. John McCain of Arizona, ranks either first or second in most of the important early states.

But his support for abortion rights and gay rights puts him sharply at odds with the majority of his party, a situation that many GOP strategists think will present a substantial obstacle to his hopes of winning the nomination. Giuliani also remains well behind McCain and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney in building a state-by-state political organization that will be crucial to navigating through early contests in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

In an interview last night with commentator Sean Hannity on Fox News Channel, Giuliani sought to play down his differences with conservatives by pointing to his record of shrinking government, reducing taxes and fighting crime in New York and to his commitment to staying on "offense" against terrorists.

Giuliani restated his support for abortion rights and gay rights but said he believes marriage should remain a union between a man and a woman. He also defended his support for tough gun-control laws in New York, saying they helped reduce crime in the city while he was mayor.

Giuliani's challenge, aides believe, will be to convince Republican primary voters that, despite his disagreements with conservatives, he will not overturn what has been party orthodoxy on many social issues. One way of indicating that has been through his comments about judicial appointments, a topic he returned to last night.

"I think the appointment of judges that I would make would be very similar to, if not exactly the same as, the last two judges that were appointed" to the Supreme Court, he told Hannity.

Giuliani also believes that, in a time of global terrorism, personal attributes such as leadership, decisiveness and strength of character can win over conservative voters who may differ with him on social issues.

"The reality is you've got to be yourself," he said last night. "You've got to be who you are. You've got to be honest with people. If your views change on something, you've got to be willing to express it."

Giuliani has also moved aggressively to broaden what has been a largely New York-centered political team. Last week he announced that he was signing up the Tarrance Group, a respected Republican polling firm based in Alexandria. Earlier, he recruited Mike DuHaime, a former political director at the Republican National Committee, as campaign manager for his presidential exploratory committee and named former congressman Jim Nussle of Iowa to his national team.

On the fundraising front, he named Donna Henderson, who previously raised money for the National Rifle Association and other groups, as his national finance director. A detailed private strategy memo prepared last fall, which the New York Daily News obtained recently, outlined plans for Giuliani to raise $100 million this year for his bid.

Campaign officials called the release of the 140-page document a political dirty trick and said its contents were out of date. But the ambitiousness of the fundraising goal signaled an apparent serious intention to compete for the Republican nomination.

Skepticism about Giuliani's prospects of winning the party's nod remains high, particularly among Washington-based GOP strategists. "Inside Washington, I don't think anyone thinks he can get elected president," said a senior-level strategist not affiliated with a candidate.

Given his positions on abortion and gay rights, Giuliani would be likely to face heavy going in Iowa, whose caucuses are dominated by social and religious conservatives. He also could run into trouble with conservatives in South Carolina. He might be better positioned to compete in what could be a flurry of big-state contests on Feb. 5, 2008, particularly if he can raise the kind of money his leaked memo talks about.

Brent Seaborn, the campaign's strategy director, argued in a widely distributed memo that the polls accurately reflect voters' attitudes.

"Entering the 2008 primary season, Rudy Giuliani is uniquely positioned among Republican candidates because of his extremely high favorability ratings," he wrote, pointing to several national polls that show the former mayor winning the approval of more than six in 10 voters. Seaborn also argued that Giuliani is a recognized leader on key issues such as terrorism, the economy and fighting crime.

Giuliani Run Poses Conundrum (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani filed paperwork yesterday that virtually assures he will seek the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, begging a question: Can the moderate who leads in many early polls convince his own party that he deserves the job?

Abandoning months of coyness in which he refused to declare a definitive candidacy even as he acted like a candidate, Mr. Giuliani's filing with the Federal Election Commission essentially puts him on equal footing with Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney as the three major declared candidates for the Republican nomination. All three men have national organizations and early name recognition; all three men for different reasons are considered vulnerable to challenge, particularly from the more conservative wing of the Republican Party.

But perhaps no candidate faces more trouble in gaining the nomination than Mr. Giuliani, which is ironic, given his early lead in many polls. His long-shot status in the nomination sweepstakes is based on his well-known moderate stances on litmus-test social issues. Such positions, along with his two divorces, won't enamor him to social conservatives, who have maintained firm control of the party's nominating levers for decades.

Messrs. McCain and Romney have had their own run-ins with the conservative wing of the party as well, but none quite as significant as that awaiting Mr. Giuliani. These are problems that Mr. Giuliani's own campaign has publicly acknowledged, much to its own embarrassment, when a copy of its strategic political plan recently was leaked to the press. The plan noted that a moderate Republican who is viewed as liberal on abortion rights, gay rights and gun control is likely to have trouble with voters in the Republican primary.

Indeed, a Giuliani nomination would suggest a sea change has taken place within the Republican Party, where successful nominees traditionally have had to maintain allegiance to certain core social beliefs.

Demanding that allegiance isn't something that powerful conservatives such as Tony Perkins at the Family Research Council will likely concede without a fight. "I don't see anyone getting the Republican nomination who is not pro-life and a staunch defender of traditional marriage," Mr. Perkins said in a recent interview. "We may not be a large enough group to elect a president, but social conservatives can keep someone from getting the nomination."

Star Power

Does a two-time mayor have a shot at redefining the rules? Scott Reed, a Washington Republican who managed Bob Dole's 1996 presidential campaign, said he believes it possible. Mr. Giuliani starts with a measure of star power, which serves any politician well. He also comes to the scene in the wake of a bruising election for Republicans, who saw Democrats sweep not only the House but also take the Senate and governors' offices as well. The question, Mr. Reed said, will be what Mr. Giuliani does with his popularity: Can he step up from mayor to national political figure, retaining the image of steadiness that he cultivated in the wake of the September 2001 attacks, while successfully fending off any questions that might arise about his stewardship of the nation's largest city.

"A Giuliani candidacy is a chance to turn the whole nominating process on its head for the first time in 40 years," said Mr. Reed, who added that he made an early contribution to the mayor's campaign but hasn't decided to back any candidate exclusively.

Like other candidates, Mr. Giuliani has yet to see whether his record will hold up to the scrutiny of a national political campaign. As a former prosecutor and a mayor whose dirt-caked image practically personified the 9/11 response, Mr. Giuliani is likely to face relentless questioning from reporters and political rivals seeking to deconstruct his heroic legend. Potential embarrassments include his scandal-plagued police chief and former business partner, Bernard Kerik, who pleaded guilty last year to improperly accepting gifts from a construction firm with mob ties.

Potential to Change Race

Mr. Giuliani also may face questions about his lobbying and consulting firm, Giuliani Partners LLP, and his law firm, Bracewell & Giuliani, which have represented a number of business interests -- including gambling and energy companies -- that may not prove popular with voters.

But Mr. Reed says Mr. Giuliani has the potential to change the race even if he doesn't win the nomination, simply by taking a top share of the media spotlight. Mr. Giuliani "sucks the air out of the room," Mr. Reed said, making second-tier candidates compete for notice.

Mr. Giuliani's early test is likely to come in late March, when the first campaign-finance reports are due from presidential candidates. Getting out of the blocks later than either Mr. McCain or Mr. Romney and currently operating with a thinner national staff than either man, Mr. Giuliani will have to work to maintain a campaign war chest that is on par with the front-runners.

Romney To Add Names (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, February 6, 2007

House Republicans supporting former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) will hold a Capitol Hill press event today to unveil new additions to their team — additions that move him ahead of Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) in public Congressional endorsements as the battle for Member support continues at a torrid pace between two of the leading GOP presidential hopefuls.

McCain, viewed as the frontrunner for the GOP nod next year, named his six-person House whip team last week and also announced the support of three Cuban-American Members.

Members of Romney's team will appear at an afternoon news conference at the Republican National Committee. About half of Romney's Capitol Hill supporters previously have been announced.

DOJ_NMG_0128307

Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.), who is Romney's liaison in the House chamber, said the Republicans now on board constitute the former governor's initial whip team.

"We'll be utilizing these 22 Members to bolster support for Romney here on Capitol Hill," he said.

Among the endorsements to be announced today are those of Reps. Rodney Alexander (La.), John Linder (Ga.), Ralph Regula (Ohio), Bill Shuster (Pa.) and Mike Simpson (Idaho).

Last week, McCain unveiled his House whip team and also announced the support of Florida GOP Reps. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Lincoln Diaz-Balart and Mario Diaz-Balart. His campaign is expected to announce the addition of Rep. Ric Keller (Fla.) today. Keller's Orlando-based district is sandwiched between those of Romney supporters — Reps. Ginny Brown-Waite and Tom Feeney.

Yesterday, McCain announced the support of two Michigan state lawmakers and named members of his Florida finance team.

The dueling for Member endorsements between Romney and McCain comes as former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani formally stepped into the Republican White House fray Monday by filing a statement of candidacy with the Federal Election Commission.

Giuliani has a quartet of Members supporting his candidacy but has yet to show he's been as aggressive as his two principal rivals in reaching out to Capitol Hill.

Romney's list thus far is a mix of the party's rising stars in the House — such as Reps. Marsha Blackburn (Tenn.), Mike Rogers (Ala.) and Feeney — and established veterans such as Regula, Rep. Hal Rogers (Ky.) and former Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.).

McCain, understandably, has more support within the Senate than Romney does and his House team also includes many veteran lawmakers — albeit most who are not particularly known as conservative firebrands.

While about half of Romney's team thus far is made up of social conservatives from Southern states, McCrery said that was more a function of the Members who were involved in initial meetings with Romney rather than an indication of any endorsement strategy based on geography.

Romney visited Capitol Hill in January for meetings with Members, attending separate events set up by Rogers and Rep. Jack Kingston (Ga.).

"Almost half of the Members are not from the South," McCrery said. "We can say that we have a pretty good representation of all of the regions of the country for Gov. Romney."

Romney has been most apparent in his efforts to reach out to Capitol Hill, due in part to his need to counter McCain's natural advantages there and the Arizonan's status as the frontrunner.

Romney also is working to quell concerns among social conservatives about the evolution of his views on social issues such as abortion and gay marriage.

Romney was well-received at the Republican Study Committee's retreat Friday in Baltimore, where he addressed House conservatives.

"He has adequately addressed those issues in the private meetings," McCrery said, adding that the whip team will be spreading that message to their colleagues who have not had personal meetings with Romney.

He said that the endorsements should send the same message to Members' constituents.

"We're happy with his explanation of where he is now on those issues," McCrery said.

Obama, Clinton May Skip Early Debates (Pol)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, February 6, 2007

What if they gave a debate and nobody came?

What if the media-political complex announced a presidential debate, hired a hall, sent out invitations, lined up 200 folding chairs for the press, and then the major candidates said: "Stick it in your ear. We're not coming."

DOJ_NMG_0128308

That could happen this year for one good reason: Major candidates are complaining that too many states are planning too many debates too early.

Nevada has two forums and three debates scheduled already. The first one is supposed to be in two weeks, and guess where it is going to be held?

If you were Nevada and trying to lure the national media to your state, what city would you choose that guaranteed glitz, glitter and good times?

That's right. It's going to be in Carson City.

(Me, I would have held it in Vegas at the Bellagio with the Cirque du Soleil swinging overhead and Wayne Newton as the moderator, but what do I know?)

Other states have already announced their own Democratic and Republican debates, but there are two developments that might alter things considerably.

First, the Democratic National Committee is soon going to call the campaigns together to try to limit the debates. But that may not work. "It will not stop other organizations from holding debates," a DNC source admitted.

More importantly, however, Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton may just say no. They might do the unthinkable and just refuse to show up.

Early debates are helpful to second- and third-tier candidates because those candidates need publicity.

But what do front-runners get from debates? Nothing but risk. They already have publicity. To the top tier, early debates are a negative, an ordeal, a chance for the rest of the pack to nip them in their rear ends.

Aren't debates the "music of democracy," however, a chance for the public to learn about important issues of our day?

Maybe they were once upon a time when the League of Women Voters ran them, but debates today must be good television and that means a snappy, quick-moving show with short answers -- not soliloquies on serious issues.

I went to a slew of primary debates during the 2004 presidential cycle - - the DNC tried and failed to control them - - and if any of the debates were memorable, I can't remember it.

The major candidates hated them. The debates not only screwed up their schedules, but took a ton of prep time that could have been better spent going out and actually meeting voters.

The stakes at debates are extremely high because reporters attend them for the same reason people attend the Indy 500: to see who crashes and burns.

There is, therefore, an enormous priority on not screwing up. And the major candidates soon learn it is safer to stick to their stump speeches than to risk making news. The minor candidates, with nothing to lose, are free to go ballistic, play to the crowd and attack the top tier.

So why do the major candidates show up?

Debate organizers try to make the debates refusal-proof by co-sponsoring them with major media, labor unions, or organizations like the Congressional Black Caucus.

But guess what? Neither Hillary Clinton nor Barack Obama has accepted any debate or forum invitations as of yet.

"The two people who can blow up the debates are those two," an adviser to the Obama campaign told me. "All they have to do is say: 'Debate without me. Go ahead.'

"There will be some accusations that they are being arrogant, but where it is written that you have to debate this early?"

And Obama and Hillary have the perfect excuse for not showing up: They have day jobs.

"They should be voting in the Senate, not running around to the debates," the adviser said. "Hillary and Obama should band together and say, 'It is not in our interest to debate this early. We've got jobs to do. October is plenty early for debates.' "

Me, I like debates. I rack up frequent flier miles. I go to expense-account dinners. I whisper rude and juvenile things to other reporters while the debates are going on.

The debate sponsors - - and they include some very powerful people and organizations - - will howl like crazy if the top candidates refuse to show up. And those who refuse may be threatened with retaliation.

But just saying no always did take guts.

OnlyChance -- This is how politics works, in BOTH parties. Yes, it's only out of political expedience that the front-runner Dems may sit the early debates out. However, President George Bush Sr. blatantly refused several of then-Governor Bill Clinton's offers to debate in 1992. In fact, Bush almost refused to debate altogether, until Ross Perot got back in the race that year and Bush had to defend himself on two fronts. So, don't try and pull this high and mighty Republican crap. Both parties want to make themselves look good and sometimes NOT debating is the best to stay looking good. (So there haha)

by Show Me on 02.05.2007 at 11:05 PM

Calm down everybody. We will see debates. The Dems are smart . They know that the tide is with them and they don't want their canidates,who are all good canidates standing in a circular firing squad. They want them to stay strong and keep putting out their individual messages.

by kevinizon on 02.05.2007 at 10:33 PM

They're all so fearful, yet they want to run the country! Whats that all about?

by OnlyChance on 02.05.2007 at 09:18 PM

Didn't the democrats ask the Sen. Dole to give up his position in the Senate to campaign for president?

If all candidates running for the most powerful position in the world, shouldn't they dedicate their full attention on such.

I am calling for all candidate to resign their position and start debating.

It interesting the DNC wants to control the debates. So much for constitutional free speech. I think is shows what the DNC all about. Sensorship! OR is it the DNC doesn't believe the policies being set forth can withstand debate?

by Lacy in Texas on 02.05.2007 at 09:02 PM

If I have to choose between Barack and Hillary, I'll choose Barack. Not because he's black (and so am I), but because he inspires me. On that note, I would not vote for Condy!

Frankly, many people I speak with (both black and white) did not want Hillary to run because we (Democrats) know we're in for a long hard slog with the right-wing rehashing all the crap from the Clinton years. In contrast it's so divisive! However, if that becomes necessary I will defend her as vigorously as I defended Bill as an FOB!!!

It really pains me that the two of them running is already causing this divide!!!

The best of both worlds would be for them to run together! That's my hope for an absolute wining ticket; onne that could potentially bring us ALL together.

by kevinizon on 02.05.2007 at 08:55 PM

Yeah it would be real dumb at this point to play a game of 'I'm powerful and busy and I'm not showing up' as a candidate. You announced your candidacy, so act like a candidate, even if you're not up to the job.

People want to know what these candidates are all about, and if they crash and burn now, that would be their destiny further up the line anyway. Not participating is so incredibly lame, so fake and phoney in so many ways, just the thought of it steams me.

You're running for president? Then talk about the issues with other candidates, and with America, and don't be wreaked with fear and uncertainty. You think you can win? Then go at it like you're going to win.

I can't believe that a candidate would stand away from a debate without people thinking that, in some way, said person thinks themselves above that particular meet-up; ie, too good for it.

You want my vote? Participate in debates, or else come up with a reallllll good reason that you stood one out. I mean a REAL good reason.

We've put up with too much with our current oligarch. Now its time for candidates to lay their cards down, not just with rhetoric, but with discussions of their plans.

My prediction? Hillary's probably not going to get the nomination, and Obama/Edwards will likely end up a team in some way. But this is 1.5 years ahead of all kinds of change and tussle... so hmm.

by GGPSmith on 02.05.2007 at 08:13 PM

Why should Senators Clinton and Obama debate each other now? They need to stand together to score a win for the Democrats in '08.

The real solution to all the real and pseudo-conflicts in the black community regarding Senator Obama's candidacy is the solution the Democrats as a whole need to come to terms with: Clinton-Obama in '08!

It's the only way to optimize Senator Clinton's experience in politics and ability to raise money with Senator Obama's incredible popularity and persuasive arguments to be hopeful about America's future.

Without each other, they run the real risk of third-party splinter groups forming that would make Ralph Nadar's past capture of Democratic voters look paltry by comparison. The GOP isn't going to have any of those problems. They'll be unified behind whomever they run against Senators Clinton & Obama with President Bush and Vice President Cheney permanently sidelined and blamed for all the country's and GOP's woes.

The real excitement will come in the Presidential and Vice Presidential debates!

by AH2 on 02.05.2007 at 08:12 PM

IF these various groups are SMART they will ALL place their debates LIVE on the Internet and publicize the fact ... THEN LET'S SEE WHO DOESN'T SHOW UP !! It's a NEW world here in the Age of the Internet. Candidates beware.

Obama Trying To Quit Smoking—again (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons And Manya Brachear

Chicago Tribune, February 6, 2007

After struggling to quit smoking in the past, Sen. Barack Obama is trying a cessation aid not available over the counter: public attention.

Obama (D-Ill.) resolved to quit his cigarette habit over the winter holidays, just weeks before his expected presidential campaign would make photographers and reporters an even more regular part of his life.

He said in a Monday interview that, although he has never been a heavy smoker, he has quit for periods over the last several years but then slipped back into the habit. On the cusp of a potential presidential bid seemed the right time to quit for good, he said.

"I've never been a heavy smoker," Obama said. "I've quit periodically over the last several years. I've got an ironclad demand from my wife that in the stresses of the campaign I don't succumb. I've been chewing Nicorette strenuously."

The incentive to quit is great for any office seeker, as increasingly negative attitudes about smoking translate into political pressure not to do it—or at least not to be caught doing it publicly. At a time when most willing public figures also are expected to serve as role models, those with unhealthy habits face intense pressure to leave them behind.

Americans haven't elected an open and unabashed cigarette smoking president since Franklin D. Roosevelt, though others such as Lyndon Johnson smoked on occasion. The rules seem also to extend to political spouses such as First Lady Laura Bush, who found it necessary to quash her habit, or at least take it underground.

In Obama's case, the pressure isn't just political. His wife has always been concerned about his smoking and, over the holidays, according to family friend Valerie Jarrett, the two of them agreed that he "should stop now."

"He began the process of quitting over Christmas," Jarrett said. "I have not heard of him smoking over the last several weeks."

There's a little hedge room in the time frame, allowing for the possibility that Obama's resolve might have slipped a time or two. Obama didn't clarify the point.

Kicking the habit is good for just about any politician's image, said Irving Rein, a Northwestern University communications studies professor and author of "High Visibility," which examines the marketing of celebrities. Attitudes toward smokers have changed dramatically since FDR's triumphal display of his ivory cigarette holder in an era when smoking made a person seem elegant and powerful.

DOJ_NMG_0128311

Back then, Hollywood glamorized cigarettes almost as fashion accessories. Attitudes had radically changed by the late 1990s, when First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton criticized actress Julia Roberts for portraying a movie character with a compulsive smoking habit.

For Obama, it's an especially smart play to grind out his last cigarette, Rein said.

"Brand has become so big with personalities. It includes the kind of suit he wears and the shoes he chooses," said Rein. "Smoking is part of that package. It doesn't go with the social, environmental message of reform he would like to project. His image would be impacted by it."

Regardless of whether his image has suffered, his lungs most likely have. Longtime friends say Obama was a smoker when he was in his first two years of college at Occidental College in California, from 1979 to 1981.

He said Monday that he has never smoked more than 10 cigarettes a day, and usually only four or five. He said the number usually went up when he was either writing or campaigning.

He said he isn't using the patch because he worries that they're too strong for him.

"I'm not somebody who's all that hooked," he said. "I didn't want more nicotine coming to me than I had been ingesting."

While quitting during such a stressful period as a presidential campaign may be difficult, public health advocates count it as a victory for them.

"I hope he makes it a public fight," said Mark Peysakhovich of the American Heart Association, who used to lobby Obama on anti-smoking policies and other public health issues when Obama was a member of the Illinois Senate. "If he's got a nic fit and he's in a bad mood, I hope some of that comes out. Maybe it will encourage other people to be brave enough to try."

It might even score some political points for Obama, he said.

"It could make him more human to people," said Peysakhovich, "if he's got the same kind of struggles the rest of us have."

Edwards Risks Tax Hike For Health Plan (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, February 6, 2007

Presidential candidate John Edwards is embracing a position that has been political suicide in the past — admitting he would raise taxes.

The 2004 vice presidential nominee is betting that voters will back the idea in exchange for the promise of quality health coverage for all, part of the first major domestic policy initiative from a Democratic White House hopeful.

The tax increase would pay for the plan's cost of up to $120 billion a year. Edwards' proposal would require that every business provide health care coverage for employees or help them pay for it and every American has insurance.

Edwards argues that it will be cheaper for families and businesses to have insurance coverage while providing health care to the nation's 47 million uninsured.

"I think that most Americans now believe that instead of small, incremental change, that we need transformational change that will strengthen this country," Edwards said in an interview with The Associated Press.

Edwards was setting an early marker in what is shaping up to be perhaps the top domestic policy issue in the Democratic race nearly a year before the first votes are cast. Several others are expected to offer competing ideas in the coming months.

"The whole idea for me on these big issues like Iraq and health care, I want to lead, not follow," said Edwards, who also has been pressuring his rivals to pull funding for President Bush's troop increase. "So I'm not waiting for other people to say where they stand. I'm saying what I believe."

The plan would free up money for health care coverage by abolishing President Bush's tax cuts for people who make more than $200,000 a year and by having the government collect more back taxes, Edwards said.

His idea immediately opened him to criticism that he's a tax-and-spender in the mold of Walter Mondale, the 1984 Democratic presidential nominee who said he would raise taxes. In the election, Mondale suffered a 49-state defeat, losing everything except his home state of Minnesota and the District of Columbia to President Reagan.

"Edwards' America Will Pay More Taxes," said a news release from the conservative Club for Growth.

The idea is not new. Republican California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has proposed a universal plan in the nation's most populous state. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, also running for president, signed a law last year requiring universal coverage.

What Edwards is proposing is very different from what he offered four years ago when he was a North Carolina senator and first-time presidential candidate. In the 2004 race, Edwards proposed to cover all children but didn't have a broader plan for adult uninsured.

Since then, Edwards has had a very personal experience with the health care system as his wife successfully battled breast cancer. Edwards said they had excellent coverage, although the two of them — both former lawyers — struggled to wade through the insurance bureaucracy. He said his position was not changed by that experience but by the people he's met across the country who are struggling with rising health care costs.

Edwards plan aims to have universal coverage by 2012. A Democratic rival, Sen. Barack Obama, also has said that is his goal, but the Illinois senator has yet to provide more specifics about how he would get there. New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton also has said she will have a universal plan.

Edwards plan would first require employers to cover every worker or contribute 6 percent of each worker's income toward coverage they buy on their own.

It also would provide government-funded insurance to all adults under the poverty line and all children and parents under 250 percent of the poverty line, which is about $50,000 for a family of four. The Edwards campaign is still working on other cost estimates, but says the goal would be to keep the cost to 5 percent to 7 percent for middle-income Americans.

He would try to clamp down on rising costs with tax credits, expanded government programs like Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program, and changes to insurance laws to require coverage for all regardless of pre-existing conditions or other factors. And he would create nonprofit purchasing pools — across a small area or maybe even several states — so that consumers would have a way to buy an affordable and high quality plan.

Finally, he would require every citizen to get coverage, unless they have financial or religious exemptions. Those who don't would forfeit their personal exemption on their income tax return.

Opening Bid On Health Care (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- John Edwards's call for universal health care marks the opening volley in two debates facing Democrats running for president in 2008: How to provide health coverage to some 47 million uninsured people and what to do about President Bush's tax cuts.

Many of the party's White House hopefuls, including Sens. Hillary Clinton (D., N.Y.) and Barack Obama (D., Ill.), say extending coverage to all the uninsured is a priority. Their focus on relatively sweeping health-care proposals matches escalating concern among voters and employers about medical costs and coverage. (See related articles on Medicare1 and the ways that plans to expand health coverage could impact the insured2.)

So far, Mr. Edwards has provided the most detail about how he would accomplish this, with the release yesterday of a plan requiring the government, employers and individuals to contribute to the cost of extending coverage to the uninsured.

The former North Carolina senator and 2004 vice presidential nominee also has stated that tax increases for upper-income people would be needed to fund his plan, which aims to provide universal coverage by 2012. Specifically, he has proposed raising taxes for households with incomes of more than $200,000. That would essentially repeal some of the tax cuts shepherded by Mr. Bush. Mr. Edwards also would fund some of his health-care proposals by reducing the "tax gap," the amount of revenue the government is owed, but doesn't collect.

"Yes, we'll have to raise taxes," Mr. Edwards said Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press." He said it is "the only way you can pay for a health-care plan" estimated to cost the government $90 billion to $120 billion a year.

It remains to be seen whether voters will accept Mr. Edwards's vision of "shared responsibility," in which employers would have to help fund their workers' coverage and individuals would be required to purchase insurance, often with the help of new tax credits aimed at low-income and middle-class people. Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program, or SCHIP, would be expanded to cover more children and low-income parents. New regional "health markets" would offer comprehensive health-insurance plans to anyone who doesn't get insurance through their jobs or a government program.

Some Democrats expressed surprise at the bluntness of Mr. Edwards's remarks in favor of tax increases, but many health-policy experts believe higher taxes would be needed to fund any serious attempt at universal coverage.

Mr. Edwards "realizes how unpopular anyone who says that can be," said Henry Simmons, president of the National Coalition on Health Care, a group of employers, labor unions and health-care providers advocating for universal coverage. "I suspect he's going to take a lot of time explaining that health care is one area where you have to invest."

Patrick Toomey, president of the Republican antitax group Club for Growth, said Mr. Edwards's plan wouldn't sit well with most voters, who, he said, "already think taxes are too high." The idea is "very good news for the Republican candidate, whoever that may be."

Many questions remain about Mr. Edwards's plan, in particular how much the various stakeholders would have to contribute and what the timing of the changes would be. Mr. Edwards's proposal assumes that the Bush tax cuts, most of which are set to expire in 2010, would be extended by Congress, even for the wealthiest recipients. Repealing the breaks for people earning more than $200,000 would supply about $100 billion a year, while reducing the "tax gap" would provide another $20 billion or so a year.

However, extending the tax cuts for the people at the top of the income scale is less likely with Democrats in control of Congress. If the tax breaks aren't there to repeal, Mr. Edwards would ostensibly have to look for another funding source.

The other 2008 presidential candidates have commented broadly on how they would tackle the problem of the uninsured, but haven't laid out their specific plans or how they would fund them. Mr. Obama, for example, has said he would provide universal coverage by 2012, and plans to put forward more details in coming weeks. In a health-focused speech last month, he questioned the profits made by drug makers and insurance companies and suggested that reducing paperwork and making sure all eligible children enroll in existing government programs would improve the current system.

"Washington no longer has an excuse for caution," Mr. Obama said. "Leaders no longer have a reason to be timid."

Mrs. Clinton knows better than most the political pitfalls of major health-care proposals, after she and her husband tried to move broad overhauls in the 1990s but failed. She recently has backed improvements in health-information technology and covering all uninsured children through SCHIP, but hasn't said how she would reach the bulk of the uninsured.

During an appearance in Davenport, Iowa, last week, a man told her that he had voted for her husband 14 years ago largely on his promise for universal health care. "With all due respect," he said, "I would like to know specifically" how Mrs. Clinton intends to provide the coverage "and how you intend to fund that."

Mrs. Clinton said it was a "fair question" but, rather than giving a specific answer, she said she wants to work toward a consensus.

She asked for a show of hands from the audience in reaction to a few methods of expanding health insurance. A single-payer, government-run system got the most hands, and it was the one Mrs. Clinton seemed to favor. But, she cautioned, imagine the ads that would spring up in opposition to such a plan. In her last attempt at health reform, ads starring an older couple, Harry and Louise, suggested that the government would dictate which doctors and treatments people could get in a single-payer plan. "All of a sudden people get real nervous," Mrs. Clinton said.

A solution has to "be politically feasible because at the end of the day we've got to get it through the Congress," she said.

"I'm not ready to be specific," she went on, "because I want to hear from people...This time we're going to build the consensus first so that when the Harry and Louise ad comes on, you'll say 'Turn that off!'"

Battle Over President's Budget Begins Today; Interview With John Edwards (CNN)

CNN THE SITUATION ROOM, February 6, 2007

WOLF BLITZER, HOST: To our viewers, you're in THE SITUATION ROOM, and it's happening right now.

DOJ_NMG_0128314

As violence rages in Iraq, the battle over the president's budget begins here in Washington today. It could and probably will pour billions more into the war.

Would it also hurt health care at home?

I'll speak about that with the Democratic presidential candidate, John Edwards.

And Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama may battle for the African- American voters. But some African-Americans are warning don't take our votes for granted. I'll speak about that with the Reverend Al Sharpton this hour.

And Arnold Schwarzenegger caught on tape with more stunning revelations.

What did he say this time?

I'm Wolf Blitzer.

You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

What can you buy for about $3 trillion?

The president's new budget is now out and it takes four hefty volumes to show you where your money is going. The president's budget would add billions to fight the war in Iraq.

Does that come at the expense of social programs here at home?

Democrats say it's filled with debt and deception. And even some Republicans are betting against this budget's chances in a Democratic controlled Congress.

Let's go live to our White House correspondent, Suzanne Malveaux.

She's checking all the fine print -- Suzanne.

SUZANNE MALVEAUX, CNN WHITE HOUSE CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, it's a budget that the president and his top economic advisers say is more detailed and transparent when it comes to the costs of the war on terror.

But, again, it is a big question whether or not it is going to be able to pass Congressional leadership, a Democratically-controlled Congress. And, Wolf, the numbers are really staggering.

(BEGIN VIDEO TAPE)

MALVEAUX (voice-over): It's our money and President Bush wants to spend almost $3 trillion of it. It's a staggering figure that's hard for any of us to imagine. But consider this. After you crunch all of the numbers, it's estimated that the total cost for the war on terror will approach $800 billion within the next two years.

President Bush says the increases he's seeking in the new budget are justified.

GEORGE BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: And our priority is to make sure our troops have what it takes to do their jobs.

MALVEAUX: The breakdown -- more than $93 billion additional for this year's war operations in Afghanistan and Iraq, on top of $70 billion already approved. More than $140 billion for 2008. And an 11 percent increase in the Pentagon budget.

Mr. Bush insists the country can afford to boost military spending, while balancing the budget in five years without raising taxes, a claim members of Congress, now controlled by the Democrats, quickly dismissed.

SEN. HARRY REID (D-NV), MAJORITY LEADER: That's why I say this budget is a combination of deception and debt in a way that's disconnected from reality.

REP. NANCY PELOSI (D-CA), SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE: The day of the blank check for the president and the war is over.

MALVEAUX: The president's budget aims at paying for the military increases by cutting out more than $95 billion in other areas over the next five years, including sharply reducing or eliminating more than 140 government programs, for a savings of $12 billion; and squeezing $78 billion out of Medicare and Medicaid, health programs for the elderly and poor.

ROB PORTMAN, WHITE HOUSE BUDGET DIRECTOR: Medicare, Social Security and Medicaid, they are now more than half of the budget. And what the president proposes is actually less than a 1 percentage point reduction in Medicare over five or 10 years.

(END VIDEO TAPE)

DOJ_NMG_0128315

MALVEAUX: And the president's budget, of course, asks for less war costs, considerably, in 2009, just $50 billion, and asks for no money the following year. But the president says this is no indication of a timetable for the end of the war or for bringing American troops home -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Numbers so huge it's amazing.

Suzanne, thank you.

Meanwhile, a series of bloody bombings ripped through Baghdad today, killing at least 35 people and wounding more than 120 others. One of the blasts went off near a children's hospital, killing nine people.

And this follows a truck bombing which took a terrible toll this weekend.

As Iraqis clean up and try to cope, some are saying it's America's fault.

And joining us now, our correspondent in Baghdad, Michael Ware -- Michael, they seem to be blaming, at least some elements in the Iraqi government, the United States for this massacre over the weekend that killed more than 100 Iraqis, wounded more than 300 others, horrendous pictures. It looks like the worst suicide bombing over the past three and-a-half years.

What's going on?

MICHAEL WARE, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Yes, Wolf, I mean this was a massive truck bomb in a crowded marketplace on Saturday evening that killed at least 128, and, as you say, wounded more than 300.

Now, the great irony is that there's elements, Shia elements within the government, that are blaming the U.S. for creating this security situation or poor security situation that they say has created an environment that is allowing al Qaeda and others to launch these attacks.

This feeds a common conspiracy, particularly among Shia, that says America is so all powerful and all pervasive, al Qaeda could not conduct these bombings if America was not complicit.

We're not hearing that echoed in the wake of this bombing by elements of this government.

BLITZER: Because what they're saying is by the United States pressuring the Iraqi government to clamp down on Muqtada al-Sadr's Shiite militia, the Mahdi Army, in effect, that's making the Shiites in these marketplace areas and elsewhere in Baghdad, even more vulnerable.

WARE: Yes, they're arguing that this has increased the Shia public's exposure. I mean the government has never been able to underwrite people's security, nor has the U.S. military. So more and more in these days of civil war, they've turned to their own neighborhood or to the local militias.

Now, what these people are saying is that on the eve of what's perceived as a massive American led operation, which, indeed, it is not, many of these militias have evaporated, or their leadership has taken its troops or its fighters off the streets, thereby creating a vacuum which is being filled by these bombers.

Hence, they ultimately blame America for these deaths.

BLITZER: Michael Ware reporting for us from Baghdad.

Michael, thanks.

WARE: Thank you, Wolf.

BLITZER: And as opposition to the war intensifies among the American public, there's a stunning new development within the U.S. military. A court-martial began today for a U.S. Army officer who refused to ship out with his unit to Iraq.

Let's get some details from our Brian Todd -- Brian.

BRIAN TODD, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, First Lieutenant Ehren Watada took a stand about seven months ago. He's now facing a jury likely to comprise young officers like himself in a case that even his family doesn't expect to go well for him.

(BEGIN VIDEO TAPE)

TODD (voice-over): As his former unit takes casualties in Iraq, Ehren Watada puts his freedom on the line at Fort Lewis, Washington. Watada, considered an exemplary soldier until last June, when he became the first commissioned officer to refuse to go to Iraq.

The reason?

1ST LT. EHREN WATADA, U.S. ARMY: It is my conclusion that war is not only morally wrong, but is, in fact, illegal.

DOJ_NMG_0128316

TODD: Watada is not a so-called conscientious objector. While he believes the Iraq War is illegal, he did say he was willing to fight in Afghanistan.

The Army declined and Watada is now being court-martialed for failing to deploy with his unit, conduct unbecoming an officer and contempt toward officials. That last charge, for all the public statements he's made against the Bush administration since last June.

WATADA: I felt betrayed by my leadership.

TODD: But the judge has already ruled that Watada's central defense, that the war is illegal, is a political question and can't be ruled on by this military court. Then there's the challenge of jury selection. By rule, it has to be a panel of peers, likely Army lieutenants.

EUGENE FIDELL, NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF MILITARY JUSTICE: It's highly improbable that this jury will include no one who's been there. So I think the jury selection is going to be an interesting exercise because obviously it's a concern if you have people who have had the actual experience to go to Iraq. TODD: The case has made Watada a poster boy for the anti-war movement, some of whom are protesting near Fort Lewis as his trial gets underway.

(END VIDEO TAPE)

TODD: But Watada is said to be resented by some inside Fort Lewis, where he held a desk job until recently. His family tells CNN they expect this court-martial to be over by Thursday. If convicted, he could face four years in a military prison -- Wolf.

BLITZER: We'll watch it together with you, Brian.

Thanks very much.

Let's go to New York and Jack Cafferty -- this is going to be a big case at Fort Lewis up in Washington.

CAFFERTY: I don't think it's going to be that big a deal. When you're wearing the uniform, you're not allowed to decide whether the war you're ordered to fight in is moral or not. You follow your orders and you go where your unit goes and that's just the way the military -- I mean how would it be if every soldier was allowed to say well, I'll fight in Afghanistan, but I won't fight in Iraq, or I'll go here but I don't think I should go there, because I don't like the way those people -- I mean that's nonsense.

He's dead.

Senate rebuke on Iraq is loud and unclear. That's how one newspaper headline put the story today. The Senate spending all of this time talking about these resolutions criticizing President Bush's plans to escalate the war in Iraq.

Republicans are threatening to block the vote. One Democrat calls that threat obstructionism and they just blather on and on and on.

But when it comes right down to it, all this debate and fussing are about non-binding resolutions. They really don't mean anything in terms of the conduct of the war. They're just sort of a way to register a complaint.

President Bush is the commander-in-chief. The country is at war. He's probably within his rights to do pretty much whatever he wants in terms of adding troops, withdrawing troops, moving troops, whatever. He is the commander-in-chief.

In the meantime, the hopes of a new Congress coming in, getting right to work on this nation's problems, are being held captive by these resolutions, just like the entire country has been held captive by this war for almost four years now.

Nothing that's important to our citizens here is being addressed. Instead, we get posturing and speechifying and bloviating or, as Shakespeare so eloquently put it, a tale told by an idiot full of sound and fury signifying nothing.

The question is this -- how important is it for the Senate to pass a resolution opposing President Bush's troop increase plan in Iraq?

E-mail your thoughts to caffertyfile@cnn.com or go to cnn.com/caffertyfile -- Wolf, whatever they're going to do, I wish they would just get on with it.

BLITZER: Usually they don't do it that quickly here in Washington. It takes a lot of time.

CAFFERTY: All right. We'll wait.

BLITZER: Jack, thank you.

CAFFERTY: All right.

BLITZER: Still to come, my interview with Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards. I'll ask him about his call for pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq, his ambitious health care plan and raising your taxes. That's coming up.

DOJ_NMG_0128317

Also, with a growing roster of Democratic candidates, are African-Americans facing a growing divide, especially when it comes to frontrunners like Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama?

Former presidential candidate Al Sharpton, he's stopping by live right here in THE SITUATION ROOM to talk about it.

And a massive slaughter underway right now as Britain tries to contain Europe's huge outbreak of bird flu.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: While many White House wannabes are dipping their toes in the water, one former contender has already plunged back in and he's making a splash on issues like Iraq, raising taxes for the wealthy to pay for health care.

And joining us now, Democratic presidential candidate in his home state of North Carolina.

Senator, thanks very much for coming in.

Let's get to Iraq first.

If you had your way, how long would it take to pull out U.S. forces from Iraq?

FORMER SENATOR JOHN EDWARDS, PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE: About a year. It could take a little more -- a little longer than that. But roughly a year, Wolf -- combat troops.

BLITZER: And what about the support personnel, because there's a lot of support personnel in Iraq, as well?

EDWARDS: Well, the support personnel that are there for the purpose of supporting the combat effort, most of them can leave. But the people who are there for logistical support, to help train the Iraqis, we will need to keep some presence there for a period of time.

BLITZER: Here's what the National Intelligence Estimate said the other day, this compilation, a summary of the 16 U.S. intelligence agencies: "A rapid withdrawal from Iraq would result in these -- in this nightmare scenario. The Iraqi security forces would be unlikely to survive. Iraq's neighbors might intervene openly. There probably would be massive civilian casualties. There would be a Kurdish play for autonomy in the north and that could prompt Turkey to launch a military incursion."

In other words, what they are saying is that as bad as the situation is right now -- and it is horrendous -- it could be even worse if there were a rapid withdrawal.

EDWARDS: It could be even worse no matter what happens, and I think they acknowledge that, too, Wolf, in the same report.

What the NIE tells us is the situation on the ground is very bad, the security situation. The political situation is bad. But the one thing everyone agrees on is the only potential solution in Iraq is a political reconciliation and the threshold question is how do you create the incentives for Maliki and the Shia led government by relatively disorganized Sunni leadership to reach that political reconciliation?

And I think -- others, too -- including the -- those -- some of the people in the Iraq Study Group -- believe that the best way to do it, do that, is to not continue to enable them by keeping our combat troops there for a period -- for a long period of time, or by doing what the president wants to do in escalating the war.

BLITZER: You've said -- you've apologized for your vote back in 2002 when you were in the Senate in favor of the resolution authorizing the president to go to war against Saddam Hussein. Senator Clinton, on the other hand, has not formally apologized.

Does she have credibility on this issue, as far as you're concerned?

EDWARDS: This is an issue between her -- not just for her, but for anyone who voted for this -- for this war -- this is an issue between them and their own conscience. If they believe their vote was right, they should defend it. If they believe their vote was wrong, then they ought to tell the truth about it. It's a pretty simple choice and I think it'll be for voters to evaluate.

BLITZER: Let me rephrase the question.

As far as Hillary Clinton is concerned, does she have credibility when she says that if she were elected president, she would end the war? EDWARDS: You mean do I believe she's telling the truth about it?

BLITZER: Do you believe that she has the credibility, the ability to do what she says she would do, given her track record in the Senate?

EDWARDS: Well, there's no way for me to get inside her mind and heart, Wolf. I mean, she's like everyone else who voted for the war, she has a responsibility, a moral responsibility, to make a decision about whether her vote was wrong or right. This was a question of a war or not. And I think for anyone who wants to be the president of the United States, they need to be honest with the American people.

Senator Clinton is the only one who knows the answer to that question and I think the public will evaluate her, as they will me, Senator Obama and all of the others, on the basis of what they -- what we say and what they see.

BLITZER: Yesterday, you were on "Meet The Press" and you acknowledged -- you said very candidly that if elected president, in order to pay for your health care initiative that you've announced today, to put forward, that you've put forward today, you would have to raising taxes on families making $200,000 a year or more.

Is that right?

EDWARDS: That is correct.

BLITZER: You're -- it brought to my mind this famous comment from Walter Mondale in the presidential debates back in 1984.

Listen. You'll remember this sound bite from the then Democratic presidential nominee.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

WALTER MONDALE, FORMER PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE: Mr. Reagan will raising taxes. And so will I. He won't tell you. I just did.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: All right, so you've just told everyone you'll raising taxes if you're elected president.

Is that a smart political move, given the opportunity now that your opponents will have to hammer you on this sensitive issue?

EDWARDS: My view is that the single most important characteristic of the next president of the United States is somebody who's decent and honest with the country. No one can propose universal health care and say they can pay for it without doing anything to the tax structure. That is not the truth.

And I think the American people deserve and are entitled to the truth, that I suspect the will be other Democratic candidates as we go forward who will follow the lead that I've put out there today and will come forward with their own universal health care plan. And if they contend that they can pay for it leaving the tax cuts and the tax structure exactly as it is, I don't believe that's true. And we'll have to hear what they have to say.

BLITZER: But you're convinced that your health care plan, in effect, will be able to be paid for by this increase in taxes?

EDWARDS: For people who earn over $200,000 a year -- families that earn over $200,000 a year -- they -- they will lose the tax cuts they had under George Bush and go back to what the tax system that existed under Bill Clinton.

But in exchange, we're going to have a more efficient health care system, a less costly health care system. We're going to get rid of a lot of the administrative costs. Every single American will have health care coverage and every -- we'll bring down the costs of the entire system as a whole.

So this is -- this kind of political -- I mean health care reform, which I think is desperately needed and I think the country knows is desperately needed, is the kind of transformation, not small steps, but big steps, that I think we need to take to strengthen this country.

BLITZER: Senator Edwards, thanks very much for coming in.

EDWARDS: Thanks, Wolf.

Thanks for having me.

BLITZER: And you just heard Senator Edwards say he'd raise taxes on the wealthiest Americans to pay for universal health care.

Across the United States, by the way, just 3 percent of all U.S. households make $200,000 a year or more. Here are the top five locations where wealthy Americans could take a hit.

In the District of Columbia, 6.8 percent of households reached that $200,000 threshold. It's 6 percent or more in Connecticut and New Jersey. And in both Maryland and California, almost 5 percent of households might have to pay more under Senator Edwards' plan.

DOJ_NMG_0128319

Coming up, Arnold Schwarzenegger unplugged -- find out what he had to say about a key political rival and his own wife in newly released recordings.

And a massive bird flu outbreak in Britain. We're going to show you why it's raising fears the virus could land, potentially, right here in the United States.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Let's check back with Carol Costello.

She's monitoring all the developments coming in from around the world.

What's the latest -- Carol?

CAROL COSTELLO, CNN CORRESPONDENT: I have it right here, Wolf.

There is a multi-million dollar settlement in last week's bomb scares in Boston. Turner Broadcasting System, which is CNN's parent company, and the advertising agency Interference, Inc. will pay $2 million. The money will go to city and state agencies to reimburse them for their response. This comes after electronic light boards used in a cartoon promotion set off a terrorism scare last Wednesday and brought in the bomb squads. The agreement resolves any potential civil or criminal claims.

Talks aimed at ending the deadly fighting between rival Palestinian factions get underway in Saudi Arabia tomorrow. A fragile cease-fire appears to be holding, for the most part, in Gaza. But Hamas militants reportedly stormed a Presidential Guard post in northern Gaza today and kidnapped five Fatah security officials. Hamas says the men will be released soon.

The fighting has killed more than 130 people in Gaza since May.

The British government is urging the public not to panic about an outbreak of the deadly bird flu virus. The country's largest poultry producer is destroying tens of thousands of infected turkeys at its farm, but the largest bird flu outbreak to hit Europe. But a British health official says it's very unlikely people could get the disease.

Ireland, Russia, Macedonia and Japan have banned British poultry imports for now.

That's a look at the headlines right now -- Wolf.

BLITZER: All right, Carol.

Bird flu -- let's get a little bit more now. It was first detected in Southeast Asia and you can see on this map how it spread across the continent, through the Middle East into Africa and Europe. It's now confirmed in almost 40 countries. And the virus has now been detected in humans in 11 countries, including Turkey.

The fear is that migratory birds will bring the virus to North America. You can see the routes those birds take on the map behind me. Right now, the virus doesn't pass easily between people, but there is the fear it could mutate and spread from person to person like other forms of the failure.

Coming up, do African-Americans owe loyalty to Senator Hillary Clinton?

A key supporter of potential rival Senator Barack Obama says no. I'll talk about the growing divide, what's coming up on that front with the Reverend Al Sharpton. He's standing by live.

Plus, frigid weather gripping much of the northern part of the United States right now. We'll have the latest on the Arctic blast that has millions of people shivering today.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: To our viewers, you're in THE SITUATION ROOM, where new pictures and information are arriving all the time. Happening now, President Bush submitting a $2.9 trillion budget to Congress. It includes more than $240 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, 90 percent of that sum going to Iraq. And it comes as we're awaiting a key Senate vote on a resolution opposing the president's troop increase for Iraq.

Also, the former New York mayor, Rudy Giuliani, now another step closer to becoming an official Republican candidate for president.

On the Democratic side, African-Americans facing a growing divide -- will they support Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton, someone else?

DOJ_NMG_0128320

I'll talk about that. That's coming up. The Reverend Al Sharpton, himself a former presidential candidate, he's standing by live.

And Arnold Schwarzenegger unplugged. Newly released recordings capturing some candid conversation about his wife Maria Shriver, his political opponents, and a lot more. Some of them very unflattering.

I'm Wolf Blitzer. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

African-American Democrats are increasingly being torn between their party's two front-runners in the race for the White House. That would be senators Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama. And now underscoring the divide, controversial remarks by one of Senator Obama's key supporters.

Let's turn to CNN's Mary Snow. She's in New York with the story -- Mary?

MARY SNOW, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, those comments came during a meeting last Friday. One person who was present at that meeting said what was being talked about in public is something many black political operatives have been talking about privately.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SNOW (voice over): It's a tug-of-war among black voters being asked to choose between supporting Senator Barack Obama and Senator Hillary Clinton. And comments late last week from Illinois state senator Emil Jones tug even further when he called on support for Senator Obama and made a veiled reference against the Clintons.

EMIL JONES (D), ILLINOIS STATE SENATE: I don't feel that we have to pay a debt to someone. How long are we going to pay this debt when our son is running? And our son deserves their support. That was my message to them. SNOW: Jones made his comments during a meeting at the Democratic National Committee's Black Caucus, making it clear his loyalty to Obama.

JONES: We should be united. And African-Americans understand what I say when I say united. He is our son, and I'm behind him because he's our son.

JAMAL SIMMONS (D), POLITICAL STRATEGIST: No one was prepared for this conversation to take place in that room, and once it did, it sparked some questions among people in the room about where their loyalties should lie.

SNOW: Some political strategists say black voters feel caught between loyalty to President Clinton, who was dubbed by many the first African-American president. At the same time, Senator Obama has the potential to make history. So far, Senator Clinton has been leading in polls, but some say the black vote will be critical.

RONALD WALTERS, UNIVERSITY OF MARYLAND: The nagging question about where Barack Obama stands on issues relative to the black vote, if that's cleared up, then I would expect that his favorability numbers would skyrocket.

SNOW: New York congressman Charles Rangel in January said Obama's lack of experience would hold him back, adding that black voters weren't divided.

REP. CHARLES RANGEL (D), NEW YORK: You compare what you know about Hillary Clinton today and what you know about Obama today and it's not a contest.

SNOW (on camera): What do you mean?

RANGEL: One has to prove himself that he is mature enough, understanding enough, has the intellect to guide the entire country. And, of course, Hillary has proven that.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

SNOW: Now, another political strategist who attended last week's caucus meeting said the black vote is wide open, like the entire Democratic vote.

BLITZER: All right, Mary. Thanks very much.

Let's get some analysis from the Reverend Al Sharpton. He's joining us now from New York. He's president of the National Action Network, also himself a former presidential candidate.

Reverend Sharpton, thanks very much for coming in.

REV. AL SHARPTON, NATIONAL ACTION NETWORK: Thank you, Wolf.

BLITZER: Before we get specifically to what Mary was just reporting, are you planning on running again this time? SHARPTON: I've said I'm not interested in trying to run, unless we get in to the season and I don't see someone really championing the cause of social justice and some of the things I did in the last cycle. I'm very happy doing what I'm doing from National Action Network in trying to add to the debate, but we'll see.

I haven't finally ruled it out. I've met with four of the candidates, I'll be meeting with the rest. And I'm really trying to see who will have a message for those who have been marginalized. So far I've not heard that clear message.

BLITZER: So you're not ready to endorse anyone right now, whether it would be Hillary Clinton or Barack Obama or someone else?

SHARPTON: No, I'm not ready to do that as of yet, no.

BLITZER: Well, do you agree with Charlie Rangel, the congressman from Harlem, when he says that Hillary Clinton has already proven herself and Barack Obama still has not?

SHARPTON: Well, I agree that we know her record better. And we have had agreements and disagreements with that record. But we know it better.

That does not mean we should not come to know Senator Obama's record or, for that matter, any of the other contestants. And I've met with him, I've met with her, and I'm meeting with others. But I agree with him that she has the advantage of being known and having taken some positions. Some we have disagreed with.

I think the big problem that Senator Obama has is that he is not as known, and his track record is not as established as hers. But, again, he has time to try and correct that, if, in fact, he can.

I agree more with Professor Ron Walters when he says it is the issues and positions that are taken that I think is going to determine where the majority of the African-American vote ultimately goes.

BLITZER: And you heard Emil Jones, that politician from Illinois, make that statement that Mary -- that Mary included in her piece, saying that, you know, the African-American community really doesn't owe the Clintons anything else, and right now it's a time to unify around Barack Obama.

SHARPTON: Well, I think the problem with that is that you can offend people by saying that you've got to unite just because someone is your race and, therefore, not address the issues. I think that the better way is for Senator Obama or anyone else to stand up on the issues and say, let's unite around the issues. Not unite around who is someone kindred to us, because you really don't want to set that kind of scenario up.

For example, right in Chicago, where there's a mayor race, Senator Obama's endorsed the incumbent white mayor against two black candidates. So you really don't want to nationally say that blacks should do something for Obama that he himself is not doing at home. That is not a debate you want to raise, because then you can name any number of races where people didn't support blacks against whites. I think what is intelligent and respectful to our community, as in any community, is to talk our interests and our issues. Don't raise an issue that you may not want to come home and have to answer.

BLITZER: Let me pick your brain on two other issues.

First of all, Senator Joe Biden, I know he was on your radio show after he made those controversial comments about Senator Barack Obama. Are you over that issue now? Is it time to move on? Or is there still a problem you sense Senator Biden has?

SHARPTON: I mean, well, Senator Biden said what he said, and as I told him on the show, it offended a lot of people. I certainly did not think that it was a thing that was not offensive.

I know Senator Biden, and he said his intention was not to in any way desecrate those of us that ran for president before, being Shirley Chisholm or Reverend Jackson, me, or whoever. But the suggestion that people that, because they may not have a certain style, is not articulate or even clean, I thought was a bit much.

I said it, but, again, I think that the debate must be around the issues. The disparity in income in income in this country based on race, the disparity in how the criminal justice system is used -- it just came out over the weekend in New York that blacks, who are a third of the city, are stopped 55 percent of the time in stopping and frisked by police.

These are the things that people want to know, as president, what will you do to even the playing field? And that's going to be a little deeper than someone's gender or race or comments. And if we don't get to that level, then it won't be in the interests of not only African-Americans, but any Americans united around the candidates.

BLITZER: One final question on Rudy Giuliani. He took another step toward a run for the White House today. You were quoted in "The Times," "The New York Times" on Sunday, as saying, "So right now, he can lead all the media and the national pundits on the yellow brick road. He'd better never let us get near that veil. I know what's back there. I've pieced it before."

What are you alluding to?

SHARPTON: Well, I think that Rudy Giuliani had one of the most polarizing and divisive terms of mayor in the history of the city of New York. Anyone knows that.

His confrontations with the communities of African-Americans and Latinos, his problems in terms of dividing the city, and many other issues will come to light. I think that as soon as the honeymoon is over with the media and he jumps in the ring, he becomes fair game, and I think that a lot of the title of "America's mayor," people are going to have to examine what that mayor (ph) was, and it will not be as flattering as it has been up until now. BLITZER: I don't think the Reverend Sharpton is going to vote for Rudy Giuliani.

Hey, Reverend Sharpton...

SHARPTON: You've got a good guess.

BLITZER: Yes. Thanks very much.

SHARPTON: You also think the Colts are going to win the Super Bowl. Don't you?

BLITZER: Maybe. Maybe.

Thanks very much, Reverend Sharpton, for coming in.

And up ahead, California governor Arnold Schwarzenegger making some unflattering remarks about a political rival. We're going to have details of some newly released recordings, what he did say, he didn't say. He didn't want these recording, though, made public.

Plus, the Senate heading to a showdown over the president's handling of the war in Iraq. We're awaiting a crucial vote. It could come up soon. We'll tell you what's going on in the Senate.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Dangerously cold weather has much of the northern United States in a deep freeze this afternoon. And lake effect snow is piling up in upstate New York. As much as two feet falling in some areas, closing roads, including parts of Interstate 81, earlier.

Law enforcement, by the way, warning people to stay off the roads.

In Chicago, no snow right now, but bitter cold temperatures. The high today was only a few degrees above zero.

The CNN forecast does call for snow in the Windy City tomorrow and a high -- get this -- of only 10 degrees. And the cold snap is even catching the breath of Minnesotans. It hit 8 degrees below zero in Minneapolis this morning, making conditions miserable for a lot of people, including these firefighters.

Images of the arctic blast are coming in from around the country through CNN's I-Report. Let's go to our Internet reporter, Jacki Schechner. She has the latest look on the frigid weather -- Jacki.

JACKI SCHECHNER, CNN INTERNET REPORTER: Wolf, we've got bold I- Reporters trying to stay warm and sending us photos.

This is Francisco Roque in Ann Arbor, Michigan. He says he rode his bike six miles to work this morning and this is what he looked like when he got there. This is a self portrait. He says he wears a helmet, he was bundled up. But still, the moisture from his breath froze, and you can see that right there on his beard.

We have another I-Reporter named Dorte Jones who took this for us in Cavalier, North Dakota. This is the thermometer outside her garage.

You can see right here it is 30 degrees below zero. She says this is the first time she's seen it this cold in the 12 years she's lived in the area. She thinks that this is why the crime rate in the area is so low, because it's too cold for anyone to go outside.

And this photograph comes to us from Suzanne Velonis, who is in Chicago, Illinois. Took this photograph last night after watching the Bears unfortunately lose the Super Bowl.

She says it was negative 4 degrees. That was cold, but it was even colder this morning. She got up and it was negative 10.

DOJ_NMG_0128323

Again, this one in Chicago.

If you want to calculate the wind-chill in your area for yourself, you can do that online from the National Weather Service. They have a wind-chill calculator. For example, if it's 20 outside, the wind's 21, that gives you a wind-chill of 4 degrees -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Jacki, thanks very much.

Jacki reporting.

They just started voting on the floor of the U.S. Senate on an important resolution that could set the stage for a showdown over the war in Iraq.

Dana Bash, you're watching all of this. Explain to our viewers what's happening right now.

DANA BASH, CNN CONGRESSIONAL CORRESPONDENT: Well, what's happening now is you're about to see the latest proof that Senate Democrats may have a majority here in Congress, but it does not mean they have the votes to guarantee they're going to get their way, because what you're seeing is what Democrats hoped would be the beginning of a full-scale debate on Iraq, on a resolution opposing the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq, but that is not going to happen at the end of this vote, because anything in the Senate really needs 60 votes to pass. And Republicans are using the Senate rules to their advantage, and they're making it clear that they are going to block this vote to proceed to a major debate on Iraq.

Why? Because Republicans say that they want to have some of their resolutions passed. Democrats say that is purely obstructionism. So you're going to see this vote, it's going to fail, and then Democrats and Republicans are going to go behind closed doors and try to figure how to get some kind of agreement.

BLITZER: And where they go next.

All right. Thanks very much, Dana, for that.

Let's check in with Lou Dobbs to see what's coming up right at the top of the hour.

Lou, what are you working on?

LOU DOBBS, HOST, "LOU DOBBS TONIGHT": Wolf, thank you.

Coming up at 6:00 p.m. Eastern here on CNN, we're reporting on the Bush administration's determination to push forward with what is being called a North American union without the consent of Congress or the American people. The Bush administration defended its plan in, you guessed it, Mexico City. Imagine that.

We'll have that special report.

Also tonight, some local law enforcement agencies are helping to remove criminal illegal aliens from the streets of this country, despite protests by the illegal alien open border lobby.

We'll have that story and tell you what we can expect in the months ahead.

And a new warning that our public education system is failing an entire generation of our students.

We'll have that special report. And I'll be talking with the head of the educational testing service that issued the warning. Kurt Landgraf is among our guests here tonight.

Senator Byron Dorgan also joins us tonight to tell us why he opposes the president's efforts to negotiate trade deals without congressional approval to have Fast-Track Authority returned to him.

We hope you'll join us for all of that and a great deal more, all the day's news.

Wolf, back to you.

BLITZER: We'll be watching in a few minutes. Thanks very much, Lou, for that.

And coming up in our 7:00 p.m. Eastern hour right here in THE SITUATION ROOM, it's the hottest title in Washington, at least today, President Bush's almost $3 trillion budget. CNN's Jeanne Moos is going to be taking a special Jeanne Moos kind of look at the new budget.

Plus, what California governor Arnold Schwarzenegger says about his wife, as well as a political rival. We're going to have details of some newly released recordings.

We'll be right back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: There are some new recordings out from meetings between Arnold Schwarzenegger and his aides, and they reveal some very candid and unflattering comments by the California governor about some of his opponents.

DOJ_NMG_0128324

Let's go back to CNN's Carol Costello. She's following the story for us -- Carol.

CAROL COSTELLO, CNN ANCHOR: Wolf, the recordings were made in 2006 for a Schwarzenegger speechwriter with full knowledge of the governor. The hope was that listening to the governor's casual conversation would help write a better speech. The problem is, they were mistakenly put on the governor's Web site and lifted by political rivals.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

COSTELLO (voice over): The recordings are very much Arnold unplugged, backroom conversations, a window into what he really thinks.

GOV. ARNOLD SCHWARZENEGGER (R), CALIFORNIA: Please, Senator.

COSTELLO: Schwarzenegger, who is heard talking with his aides about his political opponents, dishes about Democratic state senator Don Perata.

SCHWARZENEGGER: Perata is a very sick man.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Really?

SCHWARZENEGGER: Yes, absolutely.

COSTELLO: Quite a revelation from a politician who prides himself on his bipartisanship.

The question is, will that bipartisan cooperation continue?

PETER NICHOLAS, "LOS ANGELES TIMES": The governor's staff told me last night that Schwarzenegger had apologized, but I spoke to Senator Perata's office this morning, and they said the senator had gotten no apology from the governor and described the senator as being not in a particular happy mood this morning.

COSTELLO: The governor also discusses another hot-button issue -- immigration. He calls the idea of a fence between Mexico and the United States ridiculous. And when it comes to the subject of assimilation, he says Mexican immigrants do need to work harder to assimilate in the United States.

SCHWARZENEGGER: We love Mexico and we go there on vacation. We love to hear the mariachi music and all that stuff. But up here, for us to feel sympathetic towards you, you have to carry the American flag, and you have to say, "We want to be part of you. We love you."

(END VIDEOTAPE)

COSTELLO: The governor's office released the tapes in their entirety today, saying it did that to prove Mr. Schwarzenegger's comments are part of a long and thoughtful dialogue.

BLITZER: Carol, what are the governor's political rivals saying about this?

COSTELLO: Well, I called state senator Don Perata's office myself today, and his press person told us he's a little upset, but he can't start a war over this. As a politician, he says there have been worse things said about him.

BLITZER: And finally, Carol, what did we learn about Maria Shriver from these recordings?

COSTELLO: She likes detail. She's very involved in speechwriting. In fact, she reviews the governor's speeches.

He says on this tape -- and I quote -- "She is relentless. She will not stop. You know with a speech, like, for a convention or something like that? She goes until the last day. I said, 'Maria it's over, it's locked in. It's in the teleprompter.'"

I'll have more at 7:00.

BLITZER: All right. Thank you. We're going to be watching that.

Carol doing good reporting for us.

Up next, Jack Cafferty wants to know, how important is it for the Senate to pass a resolution opposing President Bush's troop increase plan in Iraq? Jack with your e-mail when we come back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Let's go to New York and Jack Cafferty for "The Cafferty File" -- Jack.

JACK CAFFERTY, CNN ANCHOR: Wolf, the question this hour is: How important is it for the Senate to pass a resolution opposing President Bush's troop increase plan in Iraq?

Ron in San Francisco writes, "We need resolutions that are as binding as the deaths of our kids over there. Not some chicken little, no-confidence resolution like this. The American people spoke loud and clear last November to end the war, not fight over condemning a Bush escalation of it. Wake up guys, or we'll muck out the barn again in two years."

DOJ_NMG_0128325

Aaron in Pennsylvania, "Very important. If no one goes on record opposing the war, the President Bush will say, 'Nobody said they were against my plan when this all started.' I hope the politicians learned an important lesson from the vote that they took that got us in to this mess four years ago." Bernie in Binghamton, New York, "It's of no importance, Jack. It's merely grandstanding. If the Congress wanted to oppose this stupid, unwinnable war, it should do two things -- deny Bush the funds to continue the war, impeach both Bush and Cheney. The time has come for serious action, not for political posturing."

Armin in Litchfield, Connecticut, writes, "If they do nothing else for the rest of the year except vote against a troop increase, they have saved us poor taxpayers trillions in future expenses, and most likely a few thousand American lives. Maybe that's a sking too much of our senators."

Barbara writes from Niles, Michigan, "The sad truth is the Republicans cannot seem to accept they are no longer the majority in the Senate. They're now trying to filibuster the Iraq debate and the Iraq resolution. I think they'd better get on the side the people, or I predict there'll be fewer Republicans in Congress after the next election."

Luzma, Lewiston, Maine, "I have two nephews in Iraq right now. I don't want to see them come home in coffins. Therefore, this vote against the surge is crucial on how I will vote for Senator Susan Collins in 2008."

"Any Republican who votes with the president is ignoring a powerful voice in our democracy -- our vote. We voted in November for change, and we demand it."

John writes from Delaware Water Gap in Pennsylvania, "A non- binding resolution? Spineless comes to mind. If those yo-yos are serious about their disagreement with the president, they ought to cut off funding and force a withdrawal in six months. Damn, it sucks being helpless and represented by these idiots. Maybe we need to be liberated."

And Joseph, finally, in Norman, Oklahoma, "Jack, the Senate's fighting for the best way to do nothing. As usual."

If you didn't see your e-mail here, you can go to cnn.com/caffertyfile, where you can read more of these online -- Wolf.

BLITZER: You k now, a lot hovering over this whole debate. There are 20 Republicans senators who are up for re-election next year, and they're all very worried about how this vote might play. We'll talk a little bit more about that in an hour, Jack.

Thanks very much.

Edwards Details His Health Care Proposal (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5 — John Edwards proposed a detailed plan on Monday to provide health care coverage to the 47 million Americans who now go without, becoming the first major presidential candidate to do so.

Mr. Edwards's plan is ambitious and expensive, adding as much as $120 billion a year to the nation's health care bill. Money for the proposal would come from increased taxes on well-to-do families, from new fees to be paid by companies that refuse to provide health insurance for their workers and through steps to streamline the delivery of health services.

Mr. Edwards, a former senator from North Carolina, was the Democrats' vice-presidential nominee in 2004.

The Edwards plan is a pastiche of ideas that have been introduced at the state and federal levels, including some that have been derailed by opposition from business groups, doctors and health insurers.

Mr. Edwards, in an interview on Monday, described the American health care delivery system as dysfunctional and said that incremental steps would not cure it. "This proposal embraces the concept of shared responsibility to provide universal health care," he said.

The plan would be partly financed by eliminating tax cuts for households earning more than $200,000 a year, cuts that Congress approved in the Bush administration. Mr. Edwards said he would also offset the program's cost by using the estimated $15 billion in capital gains taxes that go uncollected each year by requiring brokerage houses to report capital gains from taxpayers' stock sales to the Internal Revenue Service, just as interest and dividend income is reported now.

Mr. Edwards also said that billions of dollars could be saved by making the health system more efficient and investing more in preventive care. The Edwards plan would provide tax credits or subsidies to low-income families who cannot afford health insurance, expand Medicare and the federal program of health care for children, and create a federal health insurance agency that could become the basis for a single-payer system that would eventually do away with private health insurance.

DOJ_NMG_0128326

Drew Altman, president of the Kaiser Family Foundation, which studies the American health care system, praised Mr. Edwards, saying he was the first candidate in the 2008 presidential race to offer a credible and comprehensive plan to cover the uninsured. But Mr. Altman also said the plan faced high practical and political hurdles.

"This is a plan that borrows from different approaches in an attempt to cut through the paralysis in Washington between left and right for many years," he said. "None of these plans are easy or without issues that others can attack you on."

Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, Mr. Edwards's two most prominent rivals for the Democratic presidential nomination, have not yet released detailed health care plans and declined to comment on the Edwards proposal.

One provision of the Edwards proposal certain to draw fire is a requirement that companies provide health insurance for all workers or pay 6 percent of their payrolls into a government fund to buy insurance for them. This type of "play or pay" program was an element of former President Bill Clinton's failed 1994 health care plan that was shaped in large part by Mrs. Clinton.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger included a similar mandate for employers in his universal health care proposal for California residents. The plan by Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, calls for employers who do not provide health coverage to pay 4 percent of their payrolls into a government health insurance fund.

The National Federation of Independent Business, a powerful lobby that represents small-business owners, said such mandates amounted to a job-killing tax on small companies. "Health care mandates are a nonstarter for our members," said Stephanie Cathcart, a spokeswoman for the federation.

Mr. Edwards also proposed creation of regional health insurance markets, to use the purchasing power of millions of consumers to drive down health insurance premiums. The concept is similar to that in Mrs. Clinton's 1994 plan to create health insurance purchasing alliances.

Mr. Edwards's proposal would also strengthen the Food and Drug Administration's ability to monitor new drugs after they reach the market, a provision generally welcomed by experts. But it also includes restrictions on drug companies' advertising directly to consumers, which is vigorously opposed by the pharmaceutical industry.

Edwards Introduces Plan For Health-Care Coverage (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards yesterday issued a blueprint aimed at providing health-care coverage for all Americans and said he would raise taxes to help pay the roughly $100 billion annual bill.

The plan would require employers to provide health insurance for employees or pay a portion of their payroll into a fund that would help individuals buy their own insurance. Edwards said the plan would demand that people take responsibility for obtaining insurance, either from employers or on their own.

The federal government would provide tax credits to help underwrite the cost of insurance and, through the states, would establish state or regional health-care markets, or purchasing pools, that would offer competing health plans to individuals.

"This is the shared-responsibility approach to reforming our health-care system," Edwards said in an interview. "I think it's a dramatic change in the health-care system, the kind of transformation it needs. It's a truly universal system."

Edwards said the cost of the plan would be $90 billion to $120 billion once it is fully implemented. He said the major share of the cost could be paid for by eliminating President Bush's tax cuts for families with incomes of more than $200,000. More revenue could come through more aggressive efforts by the Internal Revenue Service to collect some taxes now going unpaid.

Edwards said the plan bears some resemblance to the new health-care program enacted in Massachusetts, but he said it would require employers that do not provide health insurance to pay a greater share of their revenue into a government fund to help individuals buy insurance.

He called the plan less complicated than that proposed by Bill Clinton and Hillary Rodham Clinton when they were in the White House.

Edwards' Stiff Healthcare Medicine: Taxes (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan

DOJ_NMG_0128327

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

Betting that voter concern over healthcare outweighs disdain for higher taxes, Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards on Monday proposed repealing President Bush's tax cuts on high-income Americans to finance a universal healthcare plan.

The plan would cover all 47 million of the nation's uninsured by 2012, the former North Carolina senator said. The annual cost to taxpayers would be $90 billion to $120 billion, most of it covered by a tax increase on families making more than $200,000 a year.

The plan would require employers to provide health coverage to workers or help them buy insurance. To hold down the cost of premiums for millions of Americans, it would allow employers and consumers to join regional insurance pools that purchased coverage in bulk. The plan would also expand Medicaid and other public health programs.

Edwards' explicit call for a tax increase to broaden access to healthcare could carry wide appeal among Democratic primary voters. But if he wins the nomination, it risks exposing him to Republican attacks in a general election race, just as Walter Mondale, President Reagan's Democratic challenger in 1984, was pilloried for proposing higher taxes.

The Edwards plan comes as he is trying to sharpen distinctions between himself and rivals for the Democratic nomination, particularly Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Like Edwards, both support universal healthcare, but neither has released a specific plan. Last week, Clinton said she hoped to build consensus on politically feasible elements of a plan before releasing one; Obama said he was working with experts to develop his own proposal.

Other Democratic White House contenders who have vowed to broaden access to health coverage include New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and Sens. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware.

But Edwards is the first to provide details. In a telephone interview, he said he did not expect his plan to draw any storm of opposition, as the Clinton White House did with its failed effort, led by Hillary Clinton, to overhaul health coverage in the 1990s. "I think it's appealing across the ideological and political spectrum," he said.

The Edwards proposal would set up regional coverage-purchasing pools that would offer competing insurance plans. The nonprofit pools would be available to consumers who did not get coverage through their jobs, and to employers that decided to join rather than offer their own insurance plans. The idea would be for the pools to negotiate lower premiums through economies of scale. One of the insurance plans offered by each pool would be a public program modeled after Medicare.

The proposal would also make more people eligible for taxpayer-subsidized healthcare under Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program, and it would create a new tax credit to offset insurance costs for some middle-class families. Once those steps were taken, Americans would be required to have insurance.

Edwards Latest To Decline Public Funds For Presidential Campaign (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence And Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democrat John Edwards on Monday joined New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton in saying he will not use public money for the presidential primary campaign or, if he wins his party's nomination, for the general election.

The move by the former North Carolina senator is the latest sign of trouble for the public campaign funding system, created after the Watergate scandal to set limits and disclosure rules on contributions to presidential campaigns.

Edwards said in an interview that he expects major candidates in both parties to raise unlimited private dollars rather than participate in the public system. He said he needs to do the same "to have the funds to be competitive."

Edwards plans to start soliciting contributions for the general election soon, spokeswoman Jennifer Palmieri said. Clinton has been raising money for both the primary and general elections since she got into the race last month.

Another strong Democratic contender, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, is not disclosing his financial plans until after a formal announcement Saturday in Springfield, Ill.

DOJ_NMG_0128328

On the Republican side, an aide to former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney said Monday that Romney will not take public money in the primaries. "Our focus right now is on securing the nomination. Decisions on the general election haven't been made yet," Kevin Madden said in an e-mail.

Two other top GOP prospects, Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani, have not said yet whether they will use public money at any stage of the race.

Withdrawing from the public financing system allows candidates to raise money for the primary and general elections at the same time, lowering the cost of fundraising.

"You rent the same ballroom, serve the same stale hamburgers, but you double the potential take," said Michael Toner, a member of the Federal Election Commission. Candidates would refund money if they don't win the nomination.

Toner predicts "record-breaking presidential fundraising," with each nominee amassing as much as $500 million. The Edwards and Clinton decisions also set the stage for a two-tiered nomination process: well-known candidates raising unlimited dollars and less familiar candidates relying on public money.

The public-financing system has been used by every president elected since 1976. The money also helps pay for the Democratic and Republican national conventions.

Taxpayers can direct $3 of their tax each year to underwrite the system. Last year, 9% of taxpayers — nearly 11.7 million people — checked the contribute box on their income tax form. "I don't think it encourages people to check the box when the only people who take the money have no realistic chance of winning," Toner said.

President Bush and Democrat John Kerry declined public money during the 2004 primaries because that would have required them to limit their spending in each primary state. However, they accepted nearly $75 million apiece in public financing after their parties' nominating conventions for their general-election campaigns.

Federal law now caps campaign donations from individuals at $4,600 — $2,300 each for a primary and a general election. The political action committees of unions and companies are limited to $5,000 per election, or $10,000 total.

The Other Democrats Weigh In (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

The good news for the nation's Democrats is that neither of the supposed front-runners for the party's 2008 presidential nomination, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama, stole the show when all 10 of the likely contenders spoke last weekend to the Democratic National Committee.

Clinton and Obama got good receptions from the crowd at the Washington Hilton, having filled many of the spectator seats with their young supporters. But they didn't blow away the field, which will help keep things loose for a while, allowing more grass-roots activists time to weigh the strengths and weaknesses of all the entrants.

This campaign is starting ridiculously early, for both Democrats and Republicans. The only thing worse would be to have it end early because all but one or two people have been eliminated on each side.

That is now less likely to happen to the Democrats. The stars of the weekend, judging from reactions in the ballroom and the lobby, were not Obama and Clinton but former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina and Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico.

Both of them played to the antiwar sentiments of this liberal-leaning audience by demanding that those now in Congress do more than pass resolutions decrying President Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq. Edwards wants to pull out 40,000 soldiers now; Richardson said that Iraq "is not worthy of one more lost American life."

Their view, which was echoed by former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, left Obama, Clinton and Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware -- who have to deal with the realities of a 51-49 Senate where nothing can pass without significant Republican support -- in the uncomfortable position of seeming to be less fervent about the war. Only Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut and Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio, among those with votes to cast, joined the call for early withdrawal.

Edwards combined his Iraq message with a version of his stump speech from the last presidential campaign, evoking the plight of anonymous forgotten Americans like the "8-year-old little girl [who] will go to bed hungry . . . because her father lost his job." Edwards almost never mentions his own political history -- especially not his 2004 race as John Kerry's running mate. This time around, he is even more a populist, and he closed his speech with a vow of solidarity with organized labor that drew thunderous applause.

Unlike Edwards, Richardson dwells on his varied experience as a member of Congress, ambassador to the United Nations, energy secretary, diplomatic troubleshooter and now a reelected governor. Others may talk about extending health care, improving schools, creating jobs; he says he's already done it. Vilsack made a similar claim about his eight years as governor of Iowa, but Richardson could give him lessons in speech-making.

One of the losers in the weekend oratorical marathon was retired Gen. Wesley Clark, who repeatedly invoked the West Point motto of "Duty, Honor, Country," forgetting that few in this particular audience have much experience with, or sympathy for, the military. The larger disaster was the long harangue of former Alaska senator Mike Gravel, a strident critic of almost everything and promoter of a folly -- a national initiative process -- that not even a deranged blogger could love. Someone has to give him the hook before the real debates begin.

Obama delivered a lofty address, decrying negative campaigning -- a speech that put him squarely on the record against cynicism and in favor of hope. People listened intently, but at some point, the man from Illinois is going to have to put some policy meat on the bones of that compelling personality, lest he feed the suspicion that he doesn't have much to say.

By comparison, Hillary Clinton looked like what she is -- an old pro, maybe a bit hesitant at the start of her first national campaign for herself but someone who draws confidence from giving voice to her own ideas. She stole the headlines for the weekend by pledging that if the current Congress does not find a way to end the war in Iraq, "as president, I will." Of course, she also said that if she had been president in 2002, she wouldn't have started the war in the first place -- a statement that invites Obama and others to ask, "Well, then, why did you vote for it as senator?"

Oh, it's going to be fun, and, with luck, it will keep going for a long time.

Slip Sliding Away (NYT)

By Stacy Schiff

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

Football season is over, but there is no cause for despair. We are smack in the middle of an all-star backpedaling tournament.

Last week Joe Biden announced his candidacy with that loaded line about Barack Obama, “the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy.” Forget what Mr. Biden really meant to say. Think instead about where he went next, which was where Michael Richards and Mel Gibson had gone before him. Not only did Mr. Obama understand what he meant, insisted Mr. Biden, but “I have no doubt that Jesse Jackson and every other black leader — Al Sharpton and the rest — will know exactly what I meant.”

Indeed they did. The day ended with Mr. Sharpton assuring Mr. Biden that he bathed regularly. Rehabilitation came that evening on Jon Stewart; this is why television was invented.

Rule No. 1: Blame the context.

Rule No. 2: Blame the English language. (Punctuation is also fair game. Mr. Biden later enlisted an exculpatory comma.)

Rule No. 3: Go scattershot. Blame your humor-impaired audience (as Senator Kerry did); your ignorance (former Senator Allen, when asked to define “macaca”); your childhood (former Congressman Foley); in a pinch, but only in a pinch, your mother (Mr. Biden, again).

Rule No. 4, particularly useful if you can’t blame the English language and your own is unforgivingly precise: blame the microphone.

That was the route Jacques Chirac took after his nuclear remark about a nuclear Iran. “Having one or perhaps a second bomb a little later, well, that’s not very dangerous,” Mr. Chirac said with a shrug. The press was summoned back, for a retake. “I should rather have paid attention to what I was saying and understood that perhaps I was on the record,” Mr. Chirac offered, as if the record rather than the remark were the issue. Then there was that little fillip about obliterating Tehran. “I retract it, of course,” Mr. Chirac added.

Which brings us to O. J. Is reconstructing a supposedly hypothetical version of a supposedly half-remembered crime backpedaling? I think I'll opt for plain old delusional. Locking that farce away in a vault is corporate (and commendable) backpedaling, however.

Backpedaling is not apologizing. Apologizing is what you do when you have an affair with your campaign manager's wife and are found out. Or after you have had a homosexual tryst in your living room while your wife is having a baby in the hospital. It is what you once did when you accidentally shot your hunting buddy in the face.

As anyone with a marriage license knows, there are apologies and apologies. To apologize for your philandering to the public but not your spouse is — just to pick a random example — the height of disingenuousness. Apologies can be easy, also cheap and common. Saddam Hussein apologized for invading Kuwait, after all.

Backpedaling, on the other hand, is subtle and strategic. The trick is to deflect adroitly without landing in an undignified puddle of overwrought remorse. There are no woodsheds or waterworks in this league. It is instead all artful insouciance. The backpedaler distances himself from his actions; the two are but dimly acquainted. He has essentially suffered an out-of-body experience, a brief abduction by bad judgment. It can happen to the best of us. Just ask Larry Summers. Backpedaling is apology in the passive voice, like suddenly acknowledging those secret C.I.A. prisons that we were unable to locate for a while there. It is to half-assume responsibility, to smoke but not inhale. Perhaps it's imperfect, but we are grading on a curve these days.

As with most sports, technology has transformed this one. Jon Stewart and Oprah are its umpires, YouTube its steroids. Never have we and our words had to live in such tight quarters. Blurting just isn't what it used to be in the days of Daniel Webster or William Jennings Bryan.

Nor is backpedaling for everyone. Some people, like some bikes, are just not capable of it. Let's say that you have sunk your country into an unpopular war. Against expert judgment and a groundswell of opinion, you opt for escalation. Queried as to how you would answer a pollster who asked if you approved of that war, you reply, "You can put me down as a no." That is unsporting, and a travesty.

Super Sunday may be behind us, but Super Tuesday is a year away. May the best backpedaler win.

House Bill Eases Union Sign-ups (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

Labor groups are hoping that the new Democratic majority in Congress will push through a measure that would make it easier for workers to join unions.

The bill, scheduled to be introduced today by Rep. George Miller, California Democrat, is prompting labor activists and union foes to square off in an intense and high-profile lobbying campaign.

The Employee Free Choice Act would allow workers to unionize by simply signing a card or petition stating their interest in joining the union, as opposed to the decades-old practice of secret-ballot elections.

If a majority of employees sign, the employer would be required by law to recognize and bargain with the workers' union.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, will introduce the Senate version of the act later this year, his office said yesterday.

Labor activists say the bill is crucial for helping defend them from anti-union companies and lawmakers, which they blame in part for decades of decline.

Overall union membership was 12 percent nationally last year -- down from 12.5 percent in 2005.

"America's middle class is shrinking fast, and unions are a key to bridging our nation's growing economic divide," AFL-CIO President John J. Sweeney said.

Labor analysts say unions will survive if the bill is defeated, because unions have strong support in the public sector -- about 40 percent in 2006.

Mr. Miller sponsored an almost-identical version of the free-choice act last year, which didn't come to a vote in the Republican-dominated House. Many labor analysts say the bill will pass the House, but have a difficult time in the Senate, where Democrats have only a slight numerical edge.

DOJ_NMG_0128331

"The Senate has always been the graveyard of labor law," said Bill Gould, a Stanford University law professor.

Many expect President Bush to veto the bill, if it survives the Senate.

Unions say the card-signing -- or "card check" -- method is more fair than the secret ballot because it's a simpler, more-direct approach for workers to decide if they want to unionize.

And because card-check organizing is considerably quicker than conducting secret-ballot elections, which typically take weeks, proponents say it reduces the potential for employers to harass and intimidate workers against joining a union.

"People should be able to choose whether to form a union free from employer intimidation and coercion," Mr. Sweeney said. "Our current labor law is broken."

The bill also would allow for arbitration to settle contract disputes for newly organized union chapters and impose stronger penalties on employers who violate labor laws.

But opponents say the bill is a desperate attempt by organized labor to stay relevant.

"Basically, what [labor leaders] are trying to do is accomplish through legislation what they have not been able to accomplish in the marketplace, and that is to make themselves attractive institutions to ordinary workers," said Peter Morici, a University of Maryland business professor and a former chief economist at the U.S. International Trade Commission.

The bill would curtail -- not enhance -- workers' rights by denying them the opportunity of an election to determine whether or not to unionize.

"This bill is a ruse," Mr. Morici said.

The Center for Union Facts, an anti-union group vigorously fighting the bill, says card-check organizing in an unreliable method of gauging an employee's true interest in joining a union. Union organizers often mislead employees -- either intentionally or unintentionally -- and pressure them to sign.

The group, which has been running full-page anti-card-check advertisements in The Washington Times, The Washington Post and other major U.S. newspapers, says card-check organizing is "undemocratic" and highly susceptible to fraud by union organizers.

"Voting by secret ballot protects coercion from all sides," said Sarah Longwell, a spokeswoman for the group. "When you vote in secret, no one knows how you voted. There's no way to intimidate you."

Although secret-ballot elections are desirable for deciding political campaigns, they're ineffective in the workplace, Mr. Gould said.

"The secret-ballot-box initiative has been perverted, and it has been manipulated by employers," said Mr. Gould, who served as chairman of the National Labor Relations Board in the Clinton administration from 1994 to 1998.

Still, the bill isn't perfect, Mr. Gould added. He said he would like to see a provision requiring employees to pay or pledge to pay union dues or initiation fees before signing a card or petition to unionize.

A Vaccine To Save Women's Lives (NYT)

Congratulations to Texas for becoming the first state to require vaccinating young schoolgirls — ages 11 and 12 — against a sexually transmitted virus that causes cervical cancer and genital warts. Other states would be wise to follow the same path.

There is no doubt that Merck's vaccine against the human papillomavirus, given in three shots over eight months, is highly effective. It provides nearly perfect protection against two strains that cause 70 percent of all cases of cervical cancer, and against two other strains that cause 90 percent of genital warts cases. (That still leaves 30 percent of the cervical cancer cases to worry about, so women are urged to keep getting regular Pap tests to screen for signs of the cancer.) The side effects are generally mild: pain or tenderness at the site of the injection.

Many parents are appalled at the notion of vaccinating such young girls against a sexually transmitted disease. But the medical reality is that the vaccine will generally not work after a woman has been infected, so it is best for girls to be vaccinated well before they become sexually active. The nation's top advisory committee of immunization experts has recommended that the vaccine be routinely given to girls 11 and 12 years old.

The most contentious issue is whether the shots should be required or simply recommended to parents through a strong educational campaign. Those opposed to compulsory vaccination complain that there are already a slew of required vaccinations, so why heap on another, especially for a disease that is spread only through sexual contact? Critics also fear that HPV vaccination may lead some students to wrongly assume that they are protected against all sexually transmitted diseases, perhaps encouraging them to engage in risky behavior.

None of these objections seem strong enough to forgo the protection against a devastating disease. The United States records some 10,000 new cases of cervical cancer each year, and 3,700 cervical cancer deaths. Gov. Rick Perry of Texas, a conservative Republican, has taken an "opt out" approach, in which vaccination is required but parents can seek an exemption for reasons of conscience or religious beliefs.

That makes sense to us. All students deserve protection against HPV infection, and the presumption should be that they will get it.

Can The CBO Spell IRA? (WSJ)

By Alan Reynolds And David R. Henderson

Is the share of income of the top 1% in the United States high and rising? Those who say it is usually base their belief on statistics from one of two sources. One, a paper by Thomas Piketty and Emmanuel Saez, was discussed by Alan Reynolds in the Journal on Dec. 14, 20061. The other source is the Congressional Budget Office (CBO). It, too, is wrong.

The CBO's measure, "comprehensive income," is vastly larger than our benchmark of personal income and nearly double the Piketty and Saez total of $6.4 trillion for 2004. The CBO adds transfer payments -- but it also assigns corporate profits to households, and includes the taxable portion of capital gains. Although that fixes a few statistical headaches, it adds fatal complications.

The CBO's allocation of most corporate profits to the top 1% implies an average income of $1,259,700, compared to an average income of $940,441 in the most similar Piketty and Saez series (which includes capital gains). As the lower line in the nearby graph shows, the CBO estimate of income among the top 1% was just 21% larger than the figure from Piketty and Saez in 1980, then 26% larger in 1990, 30% larger in 2000 and 38% larger in 2004. The gap widened because of the CBO's flawed methodology.

The top line in the graph shows that the CBO assigned a high and rising share of capital ownership to the top 1%. Thus Lawrence Mishel and Jared Bernstein of the Economic Policy Institute write that this "shows that those in the top 1% of the income scale received 59.4% of all the capital income in 2004, up from 49.1% in 2000, 39.1% in 1989 and just 37.8% in 1979." Actually, it shows that if you make goofy assumptions, you get goofy results. Those who measure wealth directly find no such growth in the share of the top 1%.

At the IRS Statistics of Income (SOI) division, Barry Johnson and Brian Raub examined 28,000 estate tax returns to calculate wealth shares. "In 2001," they noted, "1.0% of the U.S. adult population [2.1 million people] . . . owned approximately 22.3% of total U.S. individual wealth, a 1.0% decrease since 1998 but virtually identical to the shares of wealth held in 1995 and 1992."

Federal Reserve Board economist Arthur Kennickell added the Forbes 400 list of wealthiest Americans to the Fed's Survey of Consumer Finances. He concluded that the top 1%'s share of wealth declined slightly from 34.6% in 1995 to 33.4% in 2004. Yet the CBO says that share rose from 43.2% to 59.4% in those same years. The difference is huge and it has a huge effect. For 2004, the CBO assigned 59.4% of $1.1 trillion in corporate profits to the top 1.2 million households, which added more than a half-million dollars to each of their incomes. That improbable figure has been rising rapidly, pushing the top 1%'s share of "comprehensive" income much higher than otherwise.

How does the CBO get its results? By assumption. Gary Burtless of the Brookings Institution notes that the CBO, unlike SOI and Fed economists, does not actually look at who owns capital. If your tax return shows no income from capital, then, according to the CBO, you own no capital. Can the CBO spell IRA? A huge and growing portion of capital owners in the U.S. earns dividends, interest and capital gains that never show up on tax returns because it is tax-sheltered. And the middle class owns a much higher fraction of its wealth in tax-sheltered assets than does the top 1%.

Andrew Bershadker of the Treasury Department and Paul A. Smith of the Fed compared the interest, dividends and capital gains reported by taxpayers aged 50 or more in 1990 and 2002. They found that "for all ages, the share of [taxable] income arising from assets is strikingly [as much as 36%] lower in the 2002 cross section than in the 1990 cross section."

In short, taxpayers are moving savings out of the grip of tax collectors. But high-income taxpayers are not allowed to contribute to an IRA or tax-free Roth account, and their contributions to other accounts are tightly limited. As a result, about 95% of the top 1%'s assets are still potentially taxable. And that causes the CBO's method to show an increase in wealth of the top 1%. As noted, direct studies of wealth show no such increase.

Economist James Poterba of MIT estimated that among those with assets in a tax-deferred account in 1998, the middle 36% (those in a 28% tax bracket) held nearly a third of their assets in tax-deferred accounts. By contrast, the top 1% of wealth holders held just 5.5% of their assets in tax-deferred accounts in 2001, according to Federal Reserve economist Arthur Kennickell.

Jonathan Chait of the New Republic speculates that 401(k) accounts "mostly replaced defined benefit pensions" and that money from 401(k)s does appear on tax returns when the accounts are withdrawn. Nice try, but no cigar. Capital income accruing inside Roth IRA, Roth 401(k) and 529 college-savings plans will never appear on tax returns, nor will up to $500,000 of capital gains on the sale of family homes since 1997.

Moreover, few of those now retired had much opportunity to build such accounts during their prime earning years. James Poterba, Dartmouth economist Steven Venti and Harvard's David Wise found that in 1984 fewer than 12% of those aged 45 were participating in a 401(k) plan, compared with 57% by 2003. Even the 12% who turned 65 in 2004 cannot be compared with those in defined benefit plans, since such plans would pay only 30% of your salary after 20 years. A 401(k) invested in a mediocre mutual fund from 1984 to 2004 did much better than that.

Those with a defined (fixed) pension must pay taxes at age 65, but the rest of us delay the tax collector. Messrs. Bershadker and Smith found that "roughly half the sample waits until required [at age 70 years, six months] to take the first withdrawal" from an IRA. The required distribution rises slowly to 10% at age 80, and so the untaxed account often keeps growing. Many will die before most funds are depleted, leaving the balance to heirs. Withdrawals from tax-deferred plans (unlike Roth and 529 plans) will eventually appear in tax return data. To say such invisible income is "implicitly" included in recent tax data, as Messrs. Piketty and Saez do, is to admit it is explicitly excluded from such data.

Like most other data, the CBO estimates show a clear increase in income inequality between the stagflation of 1980-81 (which depressed stocks, bonds and business) and the Tax Reform Act of 1986-88 (which encouraged reporting more income on individual tax forms). However, the CBO data show that the top 1%'s share of disposable income, after taxes, was unchanged between 1988 (12%) and 2003 (12.2%). That number picked up in 2004, with more dividends and capital gains being reported at the 15% rate. But defining a trend by one year is nearly as foolhardy as defining a nation's income distribution by 1%.

The CBO has incorrectly added a huge and rising share of corporate profits to the estimated incomes of the top 1%. Without that, CBO estimates of the top 1%'s share of income would have fallen substantially since 1988. If there is evidence of increased inequality since then, the CBO has not presented it.

Experts: Mideast Meeting Key For Peace (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

AP, February 6, 2007

For the rival Palestinian factions, Hamas and Fatah, a reconciliation meeting this week in Saudi Arabia may be a last chance to avoid civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0128334

If Saudi prestige, money and discussions in Islam's holy city of Mecca don't produce a power-sharing agreement, it's unlikely anything will, analysts said.

In recent months, Egypt, Syria and Qatar have tried in vain to end the bloody power struggle between the Islamic militant Hamas and the Fatah movement of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. "If this meeting fails, then no one will try to mediate again," warned Palestinian analyst Ali Jerbawi.

The talks, set to begin Tuesday, will be held in a guest palace overlooking the Kaaba, the huge cube-like shrine toward which all Muslims pray. Abbas and his bitter rival, Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal, each will be accompanied by large delegations.

The negotiations follow the bloodiest round yet in months of Hamas-Fatah fighting in Gaza, with 29 killed over four days before a new truce took hold Sunday.

The clashes have deepened resentment and suspicion between the sides, making agreement on a coalition government seem more elusive than ever. But the fighting also served as a reminder that neither side can win by force without causing massive destruction, and that failure in Mecca could be followed by an even deadlier round of violence.

"Both parties, Fatah and Hamas, know that not having an agreement in this round of talks means catastrophe," said Kadoura Fares, a former Fatah Cabinet minister who met with Mashaal last week on behalf of jailed Palestinian leader Marwan Barghouti.

The sides have been deadlocked since Hamas won elections in January 2006 and took control of the Cabinet and legislature. Abbas, a moderate who was elected separately a year earlier, still wields considerable power.

Hamas and Fatah held talks last fall on forming a coalition that Abbas hoped would end the economic boycott the West imposed on the government after the victory by Hamas, which Israel, the U.S. and the European Union list as a terror group.

Talks have broken down repeatedly, and increasingly bloody battles broke out in Gaza. The disputes focus on the proposed coalition platform and who would have control over security forces.

Ostensibly, the gaps are small — in the case of the program only a single word. Abbas has insisted Hamas promise to "commit" to previous PLO agreements, including interim peace deals with Israel. Hamas is only willing to say it "respects" such agreements.

The underlying problem appears to be deep mistrust and an unwillingness to share power.

Yet both sides might have a hard time saying no to the Saudis, particularly in a venue heavy with religious symbolism .

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas said Monday that the atmosphere might be tense at first because of the recent fighting, but he is heading to Mecca with a "sincere will" to reach a deal.

A key militant in Gaza, Kamal al-Neirab, warned that a failure of the talks "will be considered a decision to go to civil war." Al-Neirab leads the Popular Resistance Committees, a small violent group that holds an Israeli soldier hostage and has shifted its allegiance between Hamas and Fatah.

"The Palestinian issue is at a critical juncture," he told reporters Monday. "The meeting tomorrow either brings us to safe shore or it will be the beginning of a crushing war."

Yasser Abed Rabbo, an Abbas aide, said the Saudi umbrella might make it easier for Hamas to moderate its views. "Otherwise, this last chance will be wasted," he said.

In that case, Abbas would go ahead with early elections — a recipe for more fighting, since Hamas has said it would block a new vote as an attempted coup.

In Public View, Saudis Counter Iran In Region (NYT)

By Michael Slackman And Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

JIDDA, Saudi Arabia, Feb. 5 — With the prospect of three civil wars looming over the Middle East — and Iran poised to gain from them all — Saudi Arabia has abandoned its behind-the-scenes checkbook diplomacy and taken on a central, aggressive role in reshaping the region's conflicts.

DOJ_NMG_0128335

On Tuesday, the kingdom is playing host in Mecca to the leaders of Hamas and Fatah, the two feuding Palestinian factions, in what both sides say could lead to a national unity government and reduced bloodshed. Last fall, senior Saudi officials met secretly with Israeli leaders about how to establish a Palestinian state.

In recent months, Saudi Arabia has also increased its public involvement in Iraq and its support of the Sunni-led government in Lebanon. The process is shaping up as a counteroffensive to efforts by Iran to establish itself as the regional superpower, according to diplomats, analysts and officials here and throughout the region. Some even say that the recent Saudi commitment to temper the price of oil is aimed at undermining Iran's economy, although officials here deny that.

"We realized that we have to wake up," said a high-ranking Saudi diplomat who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the news media. "Someone rang the bell, 'Be careful, something is moving.' "

The shift is occurring with encouragement from the Bush administration. Its goal is to see an American-backed alliance of Sunni Arab states including Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Lebanon and Egypt, along with a Fatah-led Palestine and Israel, opposing Iran, Syria and the radical groups they support.

Yet Riyadh's goals may not always be in alignment with those of the White House, and could complicate American interests.

The Saudi effort has been taken in collaboration with its traditional Persian Gulf allies and Egypt and Jordan, but it also represents another significant shift in a region undergoing a profound reshuffling. The changes are linked to the toppling of Saddam Hussein and the transfer of power from Sunni Muslims to Shiites in Iraq, analysts said. They also reach back many years to the gradual decline in influence of Cairo and the collapse of a pan-Arab agenda, analysts and diplomats said.

"The Saudis felt that the Iranian role in the region has become influential, especially in Iraq, Palestine and Lebanon, and that the Iranian role was undermining their role in the region," said Muhammad al-Sakr, head of the foreign affairs committee in the Kuwaiti Parliament. "Usually the Saudis prefer to maneuver behind the scenes. Lately they've been noticeably active."

Saudi Arabia has taken public initiatives in the past, including one in 2002, when at an Arab League meeting it proposed a regional peace agreement with Israel in exchange for Israel's withdrawing to its 1967 boundaries. But it prefers to work quietly, and has not recently taken such a sustained public posture.

"This is not leadership by choice; it is leadership by necessity," said Gamal Abdel Gawad, an expert at the Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo. "There is a leadership vacuum in the region, and they have to step forward, or Iran will."

The United States, which is pushing the Saudis to take on this role, is alarmed at rising Iranian influence in Iraq and Lebanon, and with the Palestinian government of Hamas.

But the two countries, though sharing broad goals, have different views of the players in each conflict. For example, while the Bush administration sees the conflict in Iraq as one between allies and terrorists, the Saudis tend to see it as Sunnis versus Shiites — and they favor the Sunnis, while the Americans back the Shiite-led government. And while Saudi Arabia wants to lure Hamas away from Iran's influence and back into the Arab fold, the United States views Hamas as a terrorist organization.

Nonetheless, both Washington and Riyadh believe that one important way to block Iran and calm the many fires in the region is to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict — or at least appear to be trying to.

On the surface, the effort by Saudi Arabia to establish itself as a counterpoint to Tehran is a contest between the main sects of Islam: Shiites, led by Iran, and Sunnis, led by Riyadh. Iran, which is Persian and not Arab, is the only state that is led by Shiite religious figures. Saudi Arabia is the birthplace of Islam, and its king draws legitimacy as the Custodian of the Two Holy Mosques, in Mecca and Medina.

The kingdom has been accused of stoking sectarian tensions as a way to drain popular support from Iran and its proxies, like Hezbollah — a charge officials here deny but for which there is some evidence.

In an interview on Jan. 27 that appeared in the daily Saudi newspaper Al Seyassa, King Abdullah was asked about widespread rumors that Shiites were trying to convert Sunnis. Iranian officials have dismissed such reports as a disinformation campaign aimed at inciting sectarian tensions.

"We are following up this matter and are aware of the Shiite proselytism and what point it has reached," the king was quoted as saying. "This majority will not abandon its beliefs. At the end of the day it is the decision of the majority of Muslims that counts. Other creeds do not appear able to infiltrate the Sunni majority or undermine its historical authority."

Sectarian overtones aside, the battle is also about political power, national interests and preserving the status quo. Riyadh and its allies see a threat to their own power and security in the rise of Iran and the Shiite revival. They have expressed fear at Iran's insistence on pursuing a nuclear program, and anxiety over the rise in popularity of Hezbollah, the Shiite militia in Lebanon.

The Saudi shift, many here say, dates from last summer, when Israel failed to crush Hezbollah during 34 days of bombing, shocking officials here and throughout the region at the strength of Hezbollah, seen as Iran's regional proxy army.

In the interview with Al Seyassa, the king advised Iranian leaders "to know their limits."

Saudi analysts said another key moment came after the midterm elections in the United States when the Republicans lost control of Congress. That was read here as a sign that the United States might soon withdraw its troops from Iraq, leaving an open field to the Iranians.

"The outcome confirmed our worst fears," said Awadh al-Badi, director of the department of research and studies at the King Faisal Center for Research and Islamic Studies in Riyadh. "It said that we could no longer be sure of the Americans."

In January, the kingdom initiated talks with the Iranians to mediate the growing stalemate in Lebanon, where Hezbollah has faced off with the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora in sometimes violent confrontations. King Abdullah then held a surprise meeting with leaders of Hezbollah.

The kingdom has played host to numerous meetings of Sunni and Shiite leaders as well as of so-called moderate Muslim leaders in recent months, possibly to emphasize its custodianship of Islam's holiest sites. And it has decided that it will be the host of the next meeting of the Arab League, in Riyadh.

Officials said they hoped at that meeting to smooth relations with Syria after its president, Bashar al-Assad, insulted the Saudi king and President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt in a speech last summer. Officials believe that Syria had moved closer to Iran because of its isolation, and that that shift has given Iran a bridge to the Arab world.

"Politically speaking, Syria is not in the fold," said an Egyptian diplomat who spoke on the condition he not be identified. "Maybe the goal is to bring Syria back to the Arab world."

If so, that, too, could antagonize Washington, which wants to isolate Syria further.

Saudi Arabia's more pronounced public posture to counter Iran's rise also reflects realities that, while not new, have been underscored by the crises in the region. In particular, Arab officials and analysts say, the Arab world is not unified by a common social, political and economic agenda, and the traditional center of influence in Cairo has shifted to the oil-rich gulf.

In his recent newspaper interview, King Abdullah made that point, lamenting the failure of Arab countries to unite, while alluding to Iran's efforts to exploit the inability of Arabs to solve their own problems.

"We do not want any other party to manipulate our causes, profiteer from them, and draw strength from them," he said. "We do not want any other country to exploit our causes to bolster its position in its global conflicts."

Rivals Iran And Saudi Arabia Now Talking (AP)

By Scheherezade Faramarzi And Donna Abu-nasr

AP, February 6, 2007

Relations between Iran and Saudi Arabia are bumpy at the best of times, but violence between Shiites and Sunnis in Lebanon and Iraq is prompting the two Mideast heavyweights to engage in new talks seeking to head off a regional crisis.

The clearest sign of the new diplomacy has been in Lebanon, where a joint Saudi-Iranian effort defused a general strike called by the pro-Iranian Shiite militant group Hezbollah after the country erupted into violence two weeks ago, according to state-guided Saudi media.

Saudi Foreign Minister Saud Al-Faisal has said the two nations began working together after Iran approached his country to "cooperate in averting strife between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq and Lebanon" — an apparent reference to the joint intervention that calmed the strike unrest.

Saudi Arabia sent a high-profile envoy, Prince Bandar, to Tehran to study efforts being made there to defuse the unrest in Iraq and Lebanon and "explore what Iran can contribute," Al-Faisal said.

DOJ_NMG_0128337

Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani made a visit to Saudi Arabia in mid-January that Arab media reports said sought Saudi help in easing tensions between his country and the United States and other Western nations over Tehran's nuclear program.

After Larijani's visit, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said the envoy proposed that Iran and Saudi Arabia cooperate on Iraq, Lebanon and other issues and that Riyadh's response had been "positive."

One Saudi official told The Associated Press last week that Iran asked the kingdom to get Washington to tone down its verbal attacks on Iran.

Saudi Arabia, in turn, asked Iran to pressure its allies in Lebanon to work with Western-backed Prime Minister Fuad Saniora and to rein in Shiite militias in Iraq, according to the official, who agreed to discuss the talks only on condition of anonymity because of the matter's sensitivity.

It is unclear what the U.S. thinks of the diplomacy. Washington has tried to isolate Iran diplomatically and says it won't talk to Tehran unless the Iranians suspend uranium enrichment. The Bush administration also is beefing up U.S. military forces in the Persian Gulf in what it says is a signal to Iran.

But it is unlikely Saudi Arabia would risk its key relationship with the United States by entering talks with Iran without first consulting America.

"I'm sure the Saudis are getting the green light from the Americans to talk to the Iranians," said Saudi professor Khaled al-Dakhil.

Western diplomats in Saudi Arabia said there are no indications that the U.S. or other countries that decline to talk to Iran are unhappy about the Iranian-Saudi talks.

"Even governments that are very cautious about directly engaging Iran are happy that Saudi Arabia and Iran are talking," said one Western diplomat, who agreed to discuss the efforts only if not quoted by name because of their sensitive nature.

Saudi Arabia has a strong stake in calming the region. It is worried that Shiite-Sunni fighting in Iraq and Lebanon could explode out of control and damage its own interests or even lead the U.S. to attack Iran, which would have repercussions across the Middle East.

The Saudis have taken a large new role in mediating in the Palestinian power struggle between President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah movement and the Islamic militant group Hamas, which runs the Palestinian government. Observers say one of Saudi Arabia's main concerns — and that of the U.S. — is that Hamas has turned to Iran for money.

Saudi Arabia, whose predominant population is conservative Sunni Muslim, sees Shiite Iran as a danger to the region and to the monarchy's power, especially as money and weapons are channeled from Tehran to Hezbollah in Lebanon and to Shiite militias in Iraq.

More broadly, most Arabs are Sunnis and they are exhibiting strong anti-Shiite and anti-Iran sentiments amid suspicions about Iranian intentions in the region — including rumors of a campaign to convert Sunnis to Shiism.

More and more Arabs have been highlighting Iran's non-Arab roots, with some, like the editor of the Saudi newspaper Al-Riyadh, even insinuating recently that what is good for Iran is also good for Israel — the Arab world's traditional foe.

Tensions heightened even more last month after Saudi King Abdullah referred to the rumors that Iran is backing a drive to convert the Middle East to Shiism.

"We are following up on this matter and we are aware of the dimensions of spreading Shiism and where it has reached," Abdullah told the Kuwaiti newspaper Al-Siyassah. "The majority of Sunni Muslims will never change their faith."

Iranians, for their part, accuse Saudi Arabia and other U.S.-allied Arab states of misconstruing Iran's aims and they allege Saudis support Iraq's Sunni-dominated insurgency that targets Shiites in daily car bombings and other attacks.

Oil-rich Iran and Saudi Arabia have been at loggerheads — off and on — for decades, especially since the 1979 Shiite revolution toppled Iran's shah and swept Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini to power. But their leaders apparently felt the need to try to calm the situation, diplomats and analysts said.

"Sitting and talking is a good start for defusing tensions," said Mohammad Mohtadi, director of the Center for Middle East Strategic Studies in Tehran.

Tiny Qatar Vies For Big Regional Role (CSM)

By Danna Harman

The Christian Science Monitor, February 6, 2007

DOHA, QATAR

Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres touched down in Qatar last week – the highest-level visit by an Israeli to the Gulf in more than a decade. He debated local students, met the emir, toured the Iranian market, and then got his Israeli passport stamped at the airport and flew home.

While Mr. Peres's visit passed somewhat quietly, and peace didn't break out in its wake, the 40-hour voyage did, however, highlight a key aspect of Qatar's foreign policy – it is original.

Whether it's visionary – or merely iconoclastic – is another question altogether.

Until 1995, Qatar did not have a distinguishable foreign policy to speak of, and instead took cues from Saudi Arabia and stayed on the sidelines of world affairs. But ever since reformist Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani deposed his father in 1995, Qatar has been charting an increasingly distinctive path.

"Qatar is a player now," says Chase Untermeyer, the US ambassador to Qatar. "You don't have to be a very big to be a player if you have talented team members – with the desire to play and ability to do so."

A desert of 4,500 flat square miles jutting into the Persian Gulf and controlling the third-largest gas reserve in the world, Qatar seems to be involved in everything lately. It has presided over OPEC (three times), is bidding for the Olympics, and bankrolls Al Jazeera, the controversial satellite TV channel.

Controversy seems to be the order of the day here. Qatar is the only Gulf country to maintain any sort of official relations with the Jewish state, allowing a "trade representation office" to remain open in Doha since 1996 and dismissing complaints by neighboring countries.

But this relative openness to Israel does not stop Qatar from funding the militant group Hamas, which controls the Palestinian government and calls for the destruction of Israel.

The emir recently transferred $22 million to Hamas as the first installment of a promised monthly assistance. And, in his meeting with Peres on Jan. 29, the emir asked Israel to be "pragmatic" and start talking with Hamas, according to Peres's office. Peres responded that negotiations would be impossible as long as Hamas continued to deny Israeli's right to exist.

Qatar's support of Hamas, meanwhile, does not mean that he isn't closely allied with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas's Fatah Party, which is engaged in a bitter power struggle with Hamas. Mr. Abbas owns a home in Doha and is said to be personally close to the emir. Hamas political leader Khalad Mashaal also owns a home here and is a palace friend.

The Israeli-Palestinian story is not the only one in which Qatar is playing a multiple hand. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Syrian leader Bashar al-Assad are welcome guests here. Saddam Hussein's wife was offered political asylum. Still, this does not interfere with the extensive economic ties between Qatar and the US, or the close coordination between the two countries on regional diplomatic and security initiatives. Qatar has, since the spring of 2003, allowed the US to make use of bases here for its central command and control of the Iraq war.

But some foreign diplomats here make light of Qatar's arguably undiscerning diplomacy – saying that having money to throw around does not translate into influence and being daring and different is a far cry from being mature. No officials, however, will say this on the record.

"Qatar is like a pendulum when it comes to foreign policy. It swings drastically and you never know what you are going to get. They seem to enjoy poking in the eyes of everyone," says one Western diplomat, asking not to be identified.

"Provoking everyone is a method of survival," adds another, speaking with the same condition of anonymity. "Basically, they are holding the stick on both sides. They would hold it on more sides if there were any."

Egypt's ambassador to Qatar is skeptical that Doha can mediate the Palestinian-Israeli crisis. "These are problems that have been going on for 60 years and are not going to be resolved in a moment," says Abdel Aziz Dawoud.

DOJ_NMG_0128339

Egypt, he says, has a "long involvement" in the Israeli-Palestinian story. "Qatar's leadership is smart and active and believes it has a legitimate role to play. Well, that is legitimate. We know our role. Maybe they can be a complimentary force."

Sadiq al-Rikai, Iraq's ambassador to Qatar, suggests looking at the matter in a more positive way. "When nothing seems to be working, why not try something new?" he asks.

In the case of Iraq, Qatar has been supportive of both Sunnis and Shiites and is close to many other players in the Iraq field. All of which has potential, argues Mr. Rikai, to help broker positive change. "The Qataris can be a bridge for all of us. We all respect them. So, why not? "

In January, Qatar, in cooperation with Georgetown's School of Diplomacy, hosted a regional model UN. There was discussion of Iran's nuclear ambitions and an emergency session on the Lebanon crisis. And here, unlike many other model UN programs in the region, Israeli students were invited and Israel was represented amongst the nations in the debates.

Furthermore, moving from make-believe to real life, Roi Rosenblit, head of the Israeli trade mission in Doha, was welcome to observe the student exercises along with the rest of the diplomatic corps. He took the opportunity to talk with Arab youngsters who had never before seen, let alone spoken to, an Israeli.

"You did a great job portraying Venezuela," Mr. Rosenblit complimented a young Kuwaiti named Faris during a model UN buffet dinner.

"Wow! Are you really an Israeli?" responded the teenager. "You don't look like an Israeli."

"It sounds cheesy to say that you can change the world one conversation at a time, but it's sort of true," observed Kendell Brothers, a teacher at Faris's Kuwaiti school and a model UN chaperon.

"Qatar has a special place in being the only country to host an Israeli delegation in the region," Rosenblit explained later. "I would like to see Qatar use this leverage and special position to further the peace process and bring sides together."

U.S. Says North Korea Must Abandon Nukes (AP)

By Hiroko Tabuchi

AP, February 6, 2007

North Korea must get out of the nuclear business if it wants energy or economic aid, the chief U.S. negotiator said Monday, adding he believed the North was prepared to negotiate at the coming arms talks in Beijing.

However, he refused to speak on news reports that Pyongyang is prepared to freeze a key reactor and accept inspectors in exchange for 500,000 tons of heavy oil and other conditions.

"The DPRK (North Korea) must get out of the nuclear business entirely," Christopher Hill told reporters in Tokyo.

"Of course, it is envisioned there'll be some economic assistance and energy assistance," he said. "But the purpose of the exercise is to stop the North Koreans from operating this terrible nuclear reactor."

Hill added he believed Pyongyang "would come prepared to negotiate" after more than a year of stalled talks, but refused to elaborate.

Hill was to meet with Japanese officials before leaving for Beijing on Wednesday. The next round of talks is to start in the Chinese capital on Thursday among delegates of the two Koreas, Japan, the U.S., China and Russia.

Later Monday, Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Tokyo would not consider giving North Korea energy aid unless the communist also came clean on its past abduction of Japanese nationals.

Pyongyang claims it has returned all surviving victims who were kidnapped to train its spies in the Japanese language and culture. But Tokyo believes more Japanese are held.

"Japan will not be offering anything unless North Korea acts sincerely on the abduction problem," Abe told reporters late Monday.

Abe and Hill were responding to press reports that Pyongyang has said it could freeze the reactor at its nuclear complex in Yongbyon and accept international Atomic Energy Agency inspections in exchange for light-water reactors and oil until the reactors are completed.

Japanese media reported Sunday that in exchange for closing the Yongbyon nuclear reactor and allowing limited inspections, North Korea plans to demand more oil than the 500,000 tons it was promised under a 1994 deal.

DOJ_NMG_0128340

The daily Asahi Shimbun and public broadcaster NHK cited Joel Wit, a former U.S. State Department official who met chief North Korean arms negotiator Kim Kye Gwan and other senior officials in Pyongyang.

"They want energy assistance, and the topic that came up the most was heavy oil," Wit said in an interview aired by NHK on Monday. "They really desperately need that."

North Korea was promised two light-water reactors under the 1994 deal to freeze its nuclear program, along with an annual supply of 500,000 tons of heavy fuel oil until the reactors were built

The deal was scrapped in 2002 when the nuclear crisis re-emerged and North Korea expelled IAEA inspectors.

U.S. Calls For End To 'Nuclear Business' (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

The top U.S. negotiator on North Korea said yesterday that Pyongyang must abandon its nuclear-weapons programs if it hopes to see the economic and energy aid promised in a September 2005 deal to resolve the Korean nuclear crisis.

With another round of multilateral talks set to begin in Beijing on Thursday, State Department envoy Christopher Hill dismissed a possible diplomatic feeler from the North offering to re-create the 1994 deal with the Clinton administration in which Pyongyang merely "suspended" its nuclear programs in exchange for massive energy subsidies.

North Korea "must get out of the nuclear business entirely," Mr. Hill told reporters in Tokyo yesterday en route to the Chinese capital.

"Of course, it is envisioned there'll be some economic assistance and energy assistance," said Mr. Hill, noting that both are promised to the North in the 2005 statement. "But the purpose of the exercise is to stop the North Koreans from operating this terrible nuclear reactor."

The six-party talks on the Korean crisis involve the two Koreas, the United States, Japan, Russia and host China.

A Japanese newspaper close to the Pyongyang regime reported over the weekend that the North had offered to suspend operations at its Yongbyon nuclear reactor and permit U.N. inspectors back to the site in exchange for more than 500,000 tons in fuel oil and help in constructing a nuclear reactor that could be used only for civilian power needs.

The "freeze-for-fuel" formula closely mirrors the Clinton administration's 1994 Agreed Framework deal designed to halt the North's nuclear-weapons program in exchange for U.S. and allied promises of energy aid.

The 1994 deal broke down after the Bush administration said in 2002 that it found evidence the North had cheated on the accord almost from the start.

For its part, North Korea said the United States failed to deliver on its promises to help build two civilian nuclear-power plants promised in the agreement or to supply large quantities of fuel oil while the plants were being constructed.

The September 2005 statement of principles went far beyond a suspension of nuclear-weapons activity, calling for a "verifiable denuclearization" of both North Korea and South Korea, with the North's negotiating partners promising "economic cooperation" and "energy assistance" in return.

Mr. Hill said yesterday that he had not received any formal proposal from the North relating to the new fuel-aid request, but he said the U.S. bottom line has not changed.

Japan, which is demanding that North Korea release Japanese citizens kidnapped in the 1970s and '80s, would not consider offering Pyongyang any energy aid until the abduction issue is resolved, Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said yesterday.

Although demanding a total end to the North's nuclear weapons programs, Mr. Hill acknowledged that the six-party negotiators will make only partial progress in the latest round of talks. But U.S. officials have expressed cautious hope for progress after a meeting last month in Berlin involving Mr. Hill and North Korean negotiator Kim Kye-gwan.

N. Korea Aims To Improve On Clinton-Era Nuclear Deal (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

North Korea has set tough terms for a freeze of one of its nuclear facilities, demanding that the United States exceed commitments made under a Clinton-era deal that the Bush administration previously derided as inadequate.

DOJ_NMG_0128341

North Korea's top nuclear negotiator, Kim Gye Gwan, and other officials outlined Pyongyang's position in meetings last week with two American nuclear experts, saying they would be presented when six-nation disarmament talks resume in Beijing on Thursday. In exchange for a freeze of the Yongbyon facility and a return of international inspectors, Pyongyang wants a substantial supply of heavy fuel oil, an end to a Treasury Department action that froze North Korean accounts at a Macau bank, an international commitment to build civilian nuclear reactors in North Korea and, most important, normalization of relations with Washington.

David Albright, president of the Institute for Science and International Security in Washington and one of the experts, said yesterday that the North Koreans appeared interested in a solution that would calm international concerns about Pyongyang's nuclear programs, provided it was tied to an improving relationship with the United States. But North Korea appeared initially willing to take only partial or temporary steps to keep the option of restarting its programs if the process fell apart. North Korea would also retain its stockpile of plutonium, which could fuel as many as 10 nuclear weapons.

"They are willing to take the first step," Albright said. "This may be the only step."

U.S. and Asian officials have said that in recent weeks North Korea has indicated a renewed interest in striking at least an initial agreement. But the North Korean demands are likely to complicate the diplomacy this week because the Bush administration does not want any agreement it strikes to compare unfavorably with that of the Clinton era.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, saying he did not want to discuss details of the U.S. position, said: "We believe we need to get on with the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula. Ultimately, that means the dismantlement of the North Korean nuclear weapons programs."

The North Koreans are demanding more than they received under the Clinton deal, known as the Agreed Framework, because they want compensation for the fact that, in their view, the Bush administration terminated it without cause in 2002, Albright said.

Under the 1994 Agreed Framework -- in which North Korea pledged to freeze and "eventually dismantle" its plutonium-producing nuclear facilities -- the United States was to provide 500,000 tons of heavy fuel oil every year while a consortium, largely funded by Japan and South Korea, built light-water reactors. At the time, North Korea was believed to have only a small supply of plutonium, for perhaps one or two weapons.

In 2002, the Bush administration accused North Korea of secretly building a highly enriched uranium facility in violation of the accord and terminated the deliveries of fuel oil. Pyongyang responded by evicting international inspectors and restarting the Yongbyon facility, allowing it to rapidly build up a stockpile of plutonium. It detonated its first nuclear device in October, adding to the international urgency in reaching a settlement.

U.S. intelligence analysts have closely tracked suspect purchases by North Korea that they believed were intended for use in a uranium facility, but the United States has never pinpointed its location. North Korea has adamantly denied it has a uranium program. In June 2004, U.S. negotiators presented the North Koreans with a lengthy list of items that U.S. intelligence believed North Korea had acquired overseas for the suspected uranium program. North Korea responded that U.S. intelligence was wrong -- a stance that officials maintained in conversations last week with Albright and Joel Wit, a former State Department official. "The intelligence has not held up from their point of view," Albright said.

North Korea is now demanding that the United States supply fuel oil in excess of 500,000 tons as part of any freeze deal, because that was the level set in the 1994 agreement. "That's the benchmark," Albright said. "They want more than that."

The freeze would only cover the increasingly decrepit Yongbyon facility, not other North Korean nuclear sites.

The North Korean officials also maintained that no freeze will take place until the U.S. side resolves the Treasury action against Banco Delta Asia, a Macau bank that allegedly served as a conduit for counterfeit U.S. currency. The case has resulted in the freezing of about $24 million in North Korean accounts and led other banks around the world to curtail dealings with North Korea. In recent talks with Treasury, North Korea identified a portion of the accounts that could be deemed legitimate in an effort to resolve the case.

"BDA is the tip of the iceberg," said Michael J. Green, a former White House official in charge of Asia policy and now at Georgetown University and the Center for Strategic and International Studies. He said ending the case would unleash tens of millions of dollars in commercial transactions that had been curtailed since Treasury moved against the bank.

Green said the North Koreans were asking for "basically the Agreed Framework," which he said would be a "hard sell back in Washington." Bush for four years has called for a "complete, verifiable, irreversible dismantlement," so U.S. negotiators have sought to disable the Yongbyon facility in such a way that it could not be quickly restarted.

But Kim indicated to the visiting Americans that, in the initial phase, North Korea at most would accept a "temporary disablement that would be probably reversible pretty quickly," Albright said.

U.S. Embassy Warns Of Sudan Threats (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou

AP, February 6, 2007

The U.S. Embassy warned Americans on Monday of a heightened terrorist threat against Westerners in Sudan.

"The U.S. Embassy advises all U.S. citizens in Sudan that the United Nations mission in Sudan has received new information that an extremist group based in the country is likely to target Western interests," it said.

The U.S. message followed a similar warning that the United Nations sent its staff in Sudan last week, said a U.N. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the issue with journalists.

The U.S. message warned of the danger of bombings, kidnappings and assassinations. It said the primary target of the threat might be the United Nations, but added that "terrorists do not distinguish between official and civilian targets."

U.S. Embassy spokesman Joel Maybury said the warning was standard procedure when a threat was perceived. "In places like Sudan, where you have instability and conflict, we may have half a dozen such messages a year," he said.

Maybury noted there is anger among some Sudanese against the U.N. mission in Sudan, which is promoting the peace process in the south of the country as well as running humanitarian operations in the conflict-ridden region of Darfur in western Sudan.

The United Nations says it has 10,000 peacekeepers in southern Sudan and about 2,500 civilian staff in the whole country. About 1,000 civilian personnel are based in Khartoum.

A U.N. official, who also insisted on not being quoted by name, said the warning stemmed from the tense situation in Darfur, where ethnic fighting has escalated in recent months and U.N. leaders have pressured Sudan's government to allow in a big U.N. peacekeeping force.

The government rejected that demand, but appears to be edging toward permitting small numbers of U.N. forces to deploy in Darfur as part of an 8,000-man African Union peacekeeping mission in the region.

U.S., Malaysia Resume Trade Talks (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

KUALA LUMPUR, Malaysia -- The U.S. and Malaysia yesterday began a fresh round of free-trade talks, bogged down by differences over opening two tightly protected sectors, and a controversy over a major gas deal with Iran.

The fifth round of meeting in Malaysia's Sabah state is crucial to determine if negotiators can bridge differences and conclude the pact before a July 1 deadline, officials said.

Details of the talks weren't disclosed. However, a telephone news conference was planned for Friday when the talks are scheduled to end.

Deputy U.S. Trade Representative Karan Bhatia warned last week that the proposed pact may falter if negotiators fail to make firm progress this week over opening up Malaysia's services and government contracts -- two top hurdles to a deal. Labor and environmental issues also are holding up talks, he said.

Negotiators are under time pressure because U.S. President George W. Bush wants to get a congressional vote on the pact before his so-called fast-track trade authority expires July 1. That allows him to submit a deal to Congress for a straight up or down vote without amendments. But the proposed free-trade agreement, or FTA, must wrap up by the end of March so U.S. lawmakers have time to review it before a vote.

This week's talks also come amid new tensions over Malaysia's $16 billion deal to develop gas fields in southern Iran. U.S. House of Representatives' Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos last week urged the suspension of free-trade negotiations until Malaysia halts the deal, citing Iran's nuclear ambitions.

DOJ_NMG_0128343

Malaysian Trade Minister Rafidah Aziz warned Washington that she would drop the free-trade talks if asked to scrap the deal with Iran. The free-trade negotiations began with the "full understanding that there would be no political agenda and no interference into domestic policies," Ms. Rafidah said.

Indonesia Withholds Vital Bird Flu Data (FT)

By John Aglionby, Andrew Jack

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

Indonesia, the country worst hit by the deadly H5N1 bird flu virus, has stopped sharing human genetic samples of the highly pathogenic illness with foreign laboratories, raising fears it could slow international efforts to prepare for a pandemic.

Officials say Indonesia stopped providing samples internationally last month, hindering efforts to confirm whether the virus killing its citizens is H5N1 and limiting production of vaccines to help prevent its spread.

Dr Triono Soendoro, director-general of Indonesia's National Institute of Health Research and Development, said the step to withhold samples was taken because the government wanted to keep control of the intellectual property rights of the deadly strain of the virus.

He declined to give further details but said "all will be revealed" on Wednesday, when Indonesian officials are due to announce they are collaborating with Baxter International, the world's biggest maker of blood-disease products, on a vaccine.

The move comes as Britain battles its worst outbreak of H5N1 bird flu, which yesterday led to several countries banning UK poultry imports, including Japan and South Korea. Defra, the UK's food, agriculture and rural affairs ministry, said it expected the restrictions to last until the UK had achieved "disease-free status".

The UK exports 270,000 tonnes of poultry meat annually, worth about £300m, according to the British Poultry Council.

Analysts say Indonesia hopes to offer exclusive rights to the strain to one company and cut a deal on cheaper products once they are developed.

One official warned that withholding samples could be counterproductive, since there was no guarantee the final human pandemic strain would derive from the current virus killing people in Indonesia. One bird flu expert in Jakarta said the move would not matter if Indonesia was able to do a full sequencing of its strain to detect mutations. "But given the country doesn't yet have the capability, this is now a very internationally worrying decision," the expert said. "If you reduce your chances of detecting whether a pandemic is about to occur, then a pandemic becomes more likely."

Bird flu has killed 63 out of the 81 people infected in Indonesia since testing started in 2005, according to the World Health Organisation.

Baxter confirmed last night that it expected to conclude a "framework for future collaboration" with Indonesia this week, which could involve intellectual property issues, but stressed that it would continue to comply with World Health Organisation rules on the sharing of virus samples.

India Steps Onto Tightrope As Talks Resume With Iran (LAT)

By Henry Chu

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

NEW DELHI — Amid mounting tension between Washington and Tehran, Indian and Iranian officials plan to meet today for their second round of high-level talks in less than three months, signaling the eagerness of the two countries to patch up differences that recently have clouded their historically close ties.

Despite American misgivings over the relationship, Indian Foreign Minister Pranab Mukherjee is expected to land in Tehran for discussions on Iran's nuclear program and on boosting cooperation over energy issues. As India's economy continues to boom, the Indian government is increasingly preoccupied with securing reliable sources of energy, including access to Iran's abundant natural gas reserves.

But its relations with Tehran have put New Delhi in a delicate position. The government of Prime Minister Manmohan Singh has staked much of its foreign policy on a growing partnership with Washington, antagonizing both Iran and the Indian left, which has long been distrustful of the U.S. but whose support Singh needs to stay in power.

India is now engaged in a difficult balancing act as it tries to reassure an old friend while cozying up to a new, more powerful and potentially more important one.

In play could be a historic agreement between Washington and New Delhi allowing India access to American nuclear fuel and technology and ending decades of international isolation for New Delhi as it pursued its own nuclear path.

The pact, which has already been ratified by U.S. lawmakers, awaits Indian approval. But one provision of the deal requires the U.S. president to report to Congress each year on whether New Delhi is participating in global efforts to restrain Tehran's nuclear ambitions, which critics here see as an affront to India's sovereignty and its long-standing relationship with Iran.

The White House also has warned New Delhi against going forward on a controversial $7-billion pipeline that would move gas from Iran to India through Pakistan.

With its economy expanding by about 8% a year, India is busy casting about for energy sources to fuel that growth. Officials say they cannot afford to turn their back on the potential lying in Iran's oil and gas fields, especially since China, Asia's other rapidly expanding behemoth, is a major competitor for such resources.

Tata Steel, one of India's corporate giants, announced last week that it had signed a deal to build a $1.4-billion plant in Iran on the Strait of Hormuz. India also wants to take advantage of a highway being built between Iran and Afghanistan to send its exports to the latter; overland access to Afghanistan from the east is blocked by India's longtime nemesis, Pakistan.

Besides economic concerns, deep cultural and political affinities bind India and Iran, whose ties stretch back into the mists of history.

"The relationship goes back 5,000 years," said Gulshan Dietl, an expert on Indo-Iranian relations at Jawaharlal Nehru University here. She noted that 10% of India's sizable Muslim population is Shiite, as is most of Iran, and that linguistic similarities link the two peoples.

More recently, in the latter half of the last century, New Delhi and Tehran joined hands as nonaligned Third World countries in favor of greater regional autonomy.

During the Cold War, India and, in the latter years, Iran regarded Washington with suspicion or hostility. So it is somewhat ironic that the U.S. is increasingly becoming a wedge between them.

As a result of India's economic liberalization, U.S.-Indian trade has shot up. In addition, New Delhi and Washington cast a wary eye at China's burgeoning political and economic clout, making them natural allies in the effort to contain Beijing.

At the time President Bush proposed the civilian nuclear cooperation accord during a visit by Singh to Washington in July 2005, the measure was celebrated as putting a seal on the rapprochement between the world's most powerful democracy and its most populous one.

Almost immediately, however, the Indian government found itself in a diplomatic pickle, under pressure from Washington to join in voting against Iran's nuclear program at the United Nations. New Delhi acceded, declaring that a nuclear-armed Tehran was not in India's interest, which represented "absolutely the nadir" in Indo-Iranian ties, Dietl said.

"Iran felt it had lost a valuable friend and potential interlocutor, while the U.S. — which saw how easily India buckled — began to take New Delhi's support for granted," commentator Siddharth Varadarajan wrote in Monday's edition of the Hindu newspaper.

Last November, after months of coolness, Tehran signaled its willingness to restore ties with a stop in New Delhi by Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki.

Today's reciprocal visit could help India regain some influence over its longtime friend, Varadarajan wrote, which could in turn allow New Delhi to play a mediating role in bringing the U.S. and Iran back from the brink of open confrontation.

Companies Urged To Push For Easing Cuba Restrictions (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, February 6, 2007

Congressional supporters of easing restrictions on travel and agricultural trade to Cuba say business supporters need to offer stronger backing for several measures introduced this year if they are to become law.

DOJ_NMG_0128345

With Democrats in control of the House, Reps. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and Sam Farr (D-Calif.) said Cuba legislation has a great chance of moving this year, but Farr emphasized that the business community must become more engaged. Things get done in Washington "when there's a stick upside your head," Farr said, and business needs to increase pressure on members of Congress on Cuba.

Flake said business and farm groups should talk to more members about how lifting trade and travel restrictions will help the U.S. and Cuba. He spoke following a rally sponsored by USA Engage, an umbrella organization for business and agriculture groups that favors lifting Cuba trade and travel bans.

USA Engage Director Jake Colvin acknowledged that companies have not been especially active on Cuba, partly because they saw it as a lost cause given the Bush administration's active efforts to tighten Cuba trade and travel bans. Yet while individual companies are reluctant to speak publicly, Colvin said more business representatives are willing to engage in private discussions on the issue because of the improving political climate.

"As business groups see the prospects for change, they'll be willing to do more," Colvin said.

Groups that support lifting the travel ban and restrictions on agricultural trade include the National Foreign Trade Council and several agriculture groups, including the American Farm Bureau Federation, USA Rice Federation and groups representing wheat and soybean producers.

Of the several Cuba bills that have been introduced this year, legislation introduced last week by Rep. Bill Delahunt (D-Mass.) easing restrictions on travel to Cuba by Cuban-Americans is considered to have the most momentum. Under rules imposed by the administration in 2004, Cuban-Americans may visit family members in Cuba once every three years. In addition, they only may visit "close relatives," which, under the administration's rules, does not include aunts and uncles.

If Delahunt's bill is approved by Congress, Flake said he would be "very surprised" if President Bush vetoed legislation easing these rules. "From a humanitarian point of view, it's hard to argue about allowing Cuban-Americans to go home and see their grandmother," agreed Rep. Jerry Moran (R-Kan.), who supports the legislation.

Some Democrats also see the Delahunt legislation as a way to make inroads with Cuban-Americans, who tend to vote Republican. New Democrat Network Hispanic Strategy Center Director Joe Garcia, who opposes lifting the ban on Americans traveling to Cuba, is supporting Delahunt's legislation and calls it a political opportunity for Democrats.

Garcia said Democrats need to find common ground with Cuban-Americans, noting that easing travel restrictions is a way to do that. Lifting the entire travel ban would be overreaching, he said. "We've got to do this incrementally," he said.

President Clinton won about 38 percent of the Cuban-American vote in Florida in 1996, but Vice President Al Gore won only about 10 percent in 2000 because of opposition to the Clinton administration's handling of the Elian Gonzalez case, in which a Cuban child forcibly was returned to his father in Cuba, Garcia said. With 38 percent of the Cuban vote, it would be difficult for a Democratic presidential candidate to lose Florida, he said.

Flake has reintroduced legislation co-sponsored by Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) to lift the overall travel ban. In an interview, Rangel said he would push hard for a vote on the bill, adding that while he has yet to speak with Democratic leaders, he does not anticipate a problem.

Rangel acknowledged that President Bush may veto the legislation for political reasons. "The president will probably veto it," Rangel said. "For the president, you know, it's not a trade thing, it's a Miami thing."

Supporters said the legislation could face an uphill climb in the Senate, as Sens. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) and Robert Menendez (D-N.J.), who are both of Cuban descent, are on record as supporting the travel ban.

The executive director of the Cuban American Commission for Family Rights, Sylvia Wilhelm, anticipated that House International Relations Committee ranking member Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.) and other members of the Florida congressional delegation will oppose lifting any travel restrictions. Wilhelm said she was hopeful, however, that key senators such as Martinez and Menendez would at least support lifting the restrictions on travel by Cuban-Americans.

Separately, Moran has introduced legislation easing restrictions on exports of food and agricultural commodities to Cuba. The key provision in Moran's bill allows sales of agricultural goods to Cuba once shipments leave U.S. ports. Current rules do not allow U.S. shipments to leave U.S. ports until a payment is received, which critics say thwarts efforts to increase agricultural exports to Cuba.

Moran's bill would also allow visas to be issued to Cuban officials and U.S. citizens to travel between the U.S. and Cuba to conduct agricultural sales, and would let U.S. banks participate in transactions, although they could not finance sales.

In an interview, Moran said Martinez would be a key in the Senate. He said he was hopeful Martinez would choose not to block the legislation, and noted the senator has expressed support for some level of agricultural trade to Cuba.

In the spring of 2002, I picked up a group of young Cubans along Quinta Avenida headed toward central Havana to hang out and treat themselves to ice cream and cakes. When they asked me where I got the beautiful black Crown Victoria sedan I was driving, I told them that I was the chief of the U.S. Interests Section, our diplomatic mission in Cuba. Delighted, they exclaimed, "Be our mother and take us to Miami!"

Forty-five years ago on Feb. 3, 1962, 10 months after the Bay of Pigs and eight months before the Cuban missile crisis, President Kennedy announced a total embargo on trade with Cuba. President Eisenhower, fearing Communists were gaining the upper hand, had already put in place sanctions in retaliation for the seizure of American properties shortly after Fidel Castro took power on Jan. 1, 1959.

Now, almost a half-century later, the long era of Mr. Castro is over. The brief era of his brother, Raul, who at 75 cannot rule Cuba for long, has begun. But very little change will take place in Cuba as long as the Cuban people are isolated from their loved ones and from the ideas and influences of the outside world. If we want to give those kids a chance to build a prosperous and democratic future in Havana -- not Miami -- we will have to change tactics.

To start the ball rolling, President Bush should reinstitute the "People-to-People" program and the annual Cuban American family visits that were in place during the first two years of his administration. These policies were opening doors in Cuba.

Under the People-to-People program, licensed groups from churches, universities and theaters throughout the United States were carrying out their own brand of grass-roots diplomacy by connecting with Cuban doctors, teachers and religious leaders. They were helping Cubans live better lives and to begin preparing for a better future. Cuban Americans were visiting their families in Cuba, bringing much need medicines and giving their children a chance to hug their grandparents and learn firsthand about what happened in Cuba.

Cubans from Santiago de Cuba in the East to Pinar del Rio in the West were beginning to believe that freedom was not a distant dream. They were learning firsthand about life in our country by listening to AM-FM shortwave radios and reading books handed out by an intrepid band of diplomats assigned to the U.S. Interests Section in Havana.

Mr. Bush can make these changes now. No congressional action is needed and they will make a difference as they did five years ago, when they helped create a "Cuban Spring."

But more needs to be done, it isn't all up to Mr. Bush. Congress will have to act if the president is to have the flexibility he needs in the coming months and years to respond to the challenges and opportunities Fidel Castro's death and Raul Castro's succession will bring. Until the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity legislation, known as Helms-Burton, is revised or abrogated the president cannot lift the embargo unless both both Castros are out of power and a new Cuban government is well on its way toward a multiparty democracy.

Congressional action does not end the embargo. The president by executive action can keep the embargo in place. But if Congress abrogates or revises Helms-Burton, the president will have the opportunity to respond should Raul Castro begin to carry out reforms. For example, should Raul Castro allow Cubans to open their own businesses, in order to meet the pent up expectations of Cuba's youth for jobs and better pay, Mr. Bush could remove restrictions that block the sale of computers, televisions and radios, thereby enhancing the flow of information and ideas that would prompt more and faster political as well as economic reform.

Forty-five years later, isn't it time to clear the way for a new relationship?

U.S. Wants Nicaragua Missiles Destroyed (AP)

By Filadelfo Aleman

AP, February 6, 2007

The United States insisted Monday that Nicaragua destroy hundreds of Soviet-made surface-to-air missiles after President Daniel Ortega said the weapons were needed for the country's defense.

Ortega, a former revolutionary who returned to the presidency on Jan. 10, said Friday it would be "absurd" to destroy Nicaragua's SAM-7 missiles while neighboring Honduras is adding U.S. planes to its military fleet. Nicaragua has been in a dispute with Honduras since 1999 over its territory in the Caribbean Sea.

The U.S. Embassy said in a media statement released Monday that Honduras is buying eight small planes from the U.S. to be used in the fight against drug trafficking and not offensive military aircraft.

"The U.S. government expects that Nicaragua will continue its already established path of disarmament and destruction of all SAM-7 missiles," it said.

Nicaraguan officials have destroyed half of their initial stock of about 2,000 missiles and Ortega's predecessor offered to destroy 651 more.

The Soviet Union supplied the missiles at a time when Ortega's former leftist Sandinista government was an ally in Cold War-era struggles against the United States. The U.S. supported Contra rebels trying to overthrow the Sandinistas.

U.S. officials say they fear the weapons could fall into the hands of terrorists.

Ortega's Sandinista party insists that the United States compensate Nicaragua for the missile destruction.

U.N. Chief Returns To Headquarters, Where Battles Await Him (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Feb. 5 — Ban Ki-moon, the new United Nations secretary general, returned to his headquarters on Monday after a two-week working trip to Africa and Europe and ran into dissension over restructuring changes he has proposed and concern at the slow pace of his appointing top officials since taking office on Jan. 1.

“Today is probably his first reality check,” Dan Gillerman, the ambassador from Israel, said after a two-hour closed-door session in which members of the 192-member General Assembly raised questions about Mr. Ban’s reform proposals.

“To make any change at the U.N. is something which involves a lot of negotiation, a lot of compromise, and whatever proposal you bring will look totally different after everybody has had a go at it, and we saw the first signs of that today,” Mr. Gillerman said.

At issue are Mr. Ban’s proposals to divide peacekeeping, the fastest growing activity at the United Nations, into two departments, and to reshape the disarmament department in a way that many envoys believe downgrades it.

The changes would strike a layman as bureaucratic nuance. But at the United Nations, they fuel a continuing competition between the great powers — which exercise commanding power through the 15-member Security Council — and the General Assembly, where the developing world feels its authority is threatened when its elaborate deliberative procedures are not respected.

Mr. Ban angered many ambassadors by saying that he expected to gain rapid approval of his proposals and would delay filling the ranks of top-level management until agreement was reached on his restructuring plan. The approach raised questions about whether Mr. Ban, a former South Korean foreign minister, understood the easily offended sensitivities of the world he has entered.

“We do not think there should be arbitrary deadlines,” said Munir Akram, the Pakistani ambassador, who is the chairman of the 133-nation group that speaks for the developing world. “We also believe that established procedures should be followed.”

Many at the United Nations are unhappy over the delay in top appointments, especially since Mr. Ban is the first secretary general whose selection by the Security Council came early enough to give him three months of planning time before he took over.

"People had expected that team to be in place by now," said Mr. Gillerman. "The longer he puts it off, the longer the anticipation and the longer the disappointment."

Alejandro D. Wolff, the acting American ambassador, said that Mr. Ban had now decided to "delink" the appointments of new officials and the agreement on structural changes, and that appointments would be announced within days. Mr. Wolff declined, however, to confirm the widespread rumor that B. Lynn Pascoe, the American ambassador to Indonesia, would be the new undersecretary general for political affairs.

Mr. Ban used Monday's meeting to introduce the new deputy secretary general, Asha-Rose Mtengeti-Migiro, the former foreign minister of Tanzania. The secretary general has said that Ms. Migiro will be in charge of the management overhaul that he has pledged.

Asked how she reacted to critics who have noted the absence of extensive management experience on her resume, Ms. Migiro said she had run two government ministries. "So I believe I have enough capability to do the managerial work that the secretary general envisages," she said, "and maybe I should emphasize that, yes, the United Nations is a big organization, but management does not always have to do with the size of the organization."

If Mr. Ban has run into early turbulence at the United Nations, he has succeeded off-premises in combating his reputation for being a wooden public presence. He has leavened his appearances with jokes about the proper pronunciation of his surname, which he says is "bahn" not "ban." "I don't want to ban anything," he said at a breakfast meeting of leaders of the New York City business community.

He charmed guests at a December dinner of the United Nations Correspondents' Association by singing "Ban Ki-moon is coming to town" to the familiar melody about Santa Claus. And he mixed with Bush administration officials and members of Congress gamely wearing a gift cowboy hat at a dinner given in his honor in Washington last month.

The United States, which was frequently at odds with Kofi Annan, the former secretary general, was a strong backer of Mr. Ban's candidacy, and Mr. Wolff, the American envoy, said it backs his proposals.

"You'll have a lot of different views on the details, whether this is the best one or a different approach might be better," he said, "but you have 192 members and consensus is not easy to get, so support for the secretary general is the principle that we stand by."

Ban's U.N. Peacekeeping Reforms Rejected (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon faced one of his first tests Monday when developing nations sent him back to the drawing board with his plan to restructure the U.N.'s peacekeeping department.

The setback could foretell troubles for the new secretary-general, who faces the task of reforming the U.N. at a time when its peacekeeping demands are growing in nations such as Sudan and perhaps Somalia.

But his desire to do it quickly, without the ritual rounds of consultations, has revived long-standing tensions between rich and poor countries on a topic that is vital to developing nations, where most of the world's conflicts are occurring.

The developing countries fear that Ban's changes could endanger peacekeeping troops and make disarmament affairs less of a priority.

Pakistan's U.N. ambassador, Munir Akram, who represents a group of 114 developing nations, said Ban would have to win consent from two committees and submit to more consultations before his group could approve the proposal. His statement served as a warning to Ban, as well as to nations such as the United States and Russia, that reform will not be quick.

"He must understand: The ambassadors are not his staff," Akram said. "When he asks for our opinion, he must show that he is listening."

Akram said that the way Ban handled his first high-profile restructuring would set the tone for the rest of his reform program. "If he pushes hard and he fails, then the rest of his agenda goes off the rails," he said.

Ban's predecessor, Kofi Annan, faced similar resistance from developing countries and from the United States, which had its own vision for changing the world body. Ban, a self-described "harmonizer," had hoped to avoid divisions and jockeying.

Stung by the initial rejection, Ban pleaded for the cooperation of all 192 member nations during a closed-door General Assembly session. "Every one of you has the right to be listened to, whatever the size of your country or budget, whichever hemisphere you call home," he said.

Ban singled out peacekeeping and disarmament as the U.N.'s most fundamental and urgent areas of activity, and said they must be updated swiftly. The U.N. has 18 peacekeeping operations, with about 100,000 personnel in the field.

The U.N. peacekeeping apparatus "is dramatically strained and overstretched," Ban said. Improving peacekeeping, he added, is "a matter of life and death to millions of people who depend on us."

Ban's proposed reforms would lower the rank of disarmament affairs, but make it more directly accountable to the secretary-general through a Department of Political Affairs post expected to go to the U.S. Ambassador to Indonesia, B. Lynn Pascoe. Ban also would separate the policy and planning of peacekeeping from the side that supplies troops and equipment.

Acting U.S. Ambassador Alejandro D. Wolff said that Washington supported Ban's efforts and wanted to avoid debating the issue "indefinitely."

"It is his responsibility to deliver a Secretariat that is responsive, that does its work well, that is efficient, that is transparent," Wolff said. "We hold him accountable for that and therefore we ought to give him the authority to do the necessary changes."

Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said he hoped the process did not stall in endless meetings. "Various views were expressed, but I think there is a general feeling that we want to support the secretary-general," he said.

FLASH POINT Corruption Crackdown Targets Shanghai Inc. (WSJ)

By James T. Areddy

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

SHANGHAI -- With its gleaming towers and explosive growth, this city has helped inspire dreams of a China century. Governed for four years by a British-educated architect named Chen Liangyu, Shanghai exuded a can-do attitude that welcomed foreign investment and showcased China's emergence on the world stage.

But underneath the boom and glitter, Communist Party leaders in Beijing say, lay a secret: massive corruption.

Last fall, the party fired Mr. Chen, alleging mismanagement and theft at a city pension fund, influence peddling and other misdeeds. It detained him at an undisclosed location. There, he has made no public comment.

The fall of Mr. Chen, who not only ran the city but sat in China's ruling Politburo, was China's biggest political shakeup in a generation. But more than the ouster of one official, it amounted to an indictment of the business model known as Shanghai Inc.

Key to that model, according to company and government statements: Giant construction projects got funded from public coffers; choice assets moved out of state hands in elaborate transactions; and plum contracts went to the well-connected.

The crackdown is a reminder that China's system leaves great power in the hands of local Communist leaders, whose decisions can ripple unchecked through the economy. Now that the party has stepped in to take its Shanghai leader out of action, approval for the flashy big development projects for which Shanghai is famed has slowed to a crawl.

ONLINE TODAY

See some of the buildings involved1 in the pension fund mismanagement in Shanghai over the past several years.

The party, which says its biggest threat is corruption within its ranks, has sent investigators sniffing for official graft in other Chinese cities as well. The Chinese have a saying: Kill a chicken to scare the monkeys. Mr. Chen's ouster is a reminder to local leaders, as well as to foreign investors, that roaring Shanghai-style growth is no longer Beijing's priority. If officials elsewhere take Mr. Chen's fate as a warning, one result could be to tap the brakes on China's booming economy. That would bolster a goal of moderation that Beijing has so far pursued to limited success by jawboning and curbing bank lending.

Mr. Chen's post as party secretary for Shanghai gave him vast power: control over 45% of the city's industry, from manufacturers to banks and property developers. The portfolio reflects the Communist Party's core position in Chinese business. A party-appointed secretary sits at the helm of many business groups in the country, including some joint ventures with foreigners.

In Shanghai, party officials all answered to Mr. Chen. After his September ouster, dozens fell along with him, from a pension-system chief to a mutual-fund executive to Mr. Chen's son and brother-in-law. The detentions have placed power in the hands of officials who are extra-careful in granting licenses and making other approvals needed to do business in Shanghai, say investors.

A subway expansion under way has been called into doubt, as has privatization of a water utility. Museum projects, including a Shanghai branch of France's Centre Georges Pompidou, are held up, as is approval for a Saks Inc. store on the classy waterfront district known as the Bund. The city has put on ice a campaign to lure a Walt Disney Co. theme park and a plan for the world's tallest Ferris wheel, officials say. Saks says it has pushed back the planned opening of its store to 2009 from 2008, while Disney says its China strategy is broader than a Shanghai theme park.

The 60-year-old Mr. Chen was fond of tennis, and a few years ago, Shanghai spent $300 million to build an arena to host the Tennis Masters Cup. Future tournaments are uncertain without their No. 1 fan: Mr. Chen.

Shanghai still has plenty of sizzle. For 2006, it reported its 15th straight year of double-digit economic growth, 12%. But expansion in fixed-asset investment such as property development, while still robust at 11%, was far below the rate of two years ago.

And there are some signs the city is losing its legendary magnetism. The government recently gave permission to the northern city of Tianjin to adopt looser foreign-exchange regulations, not to the traditional banking center of Shanghai. Some foreign developers say it makes sense now to seek opportunities in other Chinese cities rather than Shanghai.

The scandal is a reminder of the role corruption long played in Shanghai's history. Though the city was famed early last century as the East's richest banking center, and opulent Art Deco buildings sprang up on the Bund, government-tolerated opium and prostitution rings also earned the city the label Whore of the Orient. Its very name came to stand for trickery, as in getting "shanghaied" into working on a ship. The Communist Party was founded in Shanghai and rose partly on a wave of resentment against the corruption of the ruling Nationalists.

Decades later, the city was identified with Mao's Cultural Revolution and then the policies of "capitalist roader" Deng Xiaoping. Mr. Chen arrived in Shanghai as its transformation to a futuristic city was beginning. After studying architecture at an army institute, he joined the Communist Party in 1980. It put him in charge of Shanghai Electric Group Co., a massive machinery maker sometimes called China's General Electric. Later, his party jobs included overseeing sports programs, old cadres' retirement and transforming the historic Bund district.

Mr. Chen was allied with Shanghai party secretary Jiang Zemin, one of the pioneers in opening Shanghai to foreign investment. When Mr. Jiang vaulted to Chinese president, a string of Shanghai leaders followed him to national office, enabling Mr. Chen to move up the ranks in Shanghai.

In 1992, Mr. Chen cut short a course in public policy at England's University of Birmingham to accept a promotion back in Shanghai. After a tour as mayor, he ascended in 2002 to the top party post in eastern China: Shanghai party secretary.

Tall, brainy and confident, Mr. Chen fit the part of a big-city boss. He conveyed a populist persona by riding the subway to work and having his spokeswoman hold regular news conferences, a first for a Chinese city.

As foreign money poured in, the city's economic engine seemed to be firing on all cylinders. Companies blazed their logos in neon along the riverfront. Magazine covers touted the skyline as a symbol of the new China.

Behind the scenes, the boom appeared less spontaneous. Mr. Chen's government was seeding big projects from its own coffers and steering city pension funds into deals, according to official reports and people close to the matter.

Records show that to complete a 60-story Marriott hotel, featuring a triangular top and a Ferrari dealer at its base, the city used pension money despite China's prohibition on doing so. And in order to clear swaths of riverfront for still more apartment towers, the city government spent $1.7 billion to relocate its container handling docks to a distant island.

Public works got increasingly grandiose. In 2003, shortly after Mr. Chen revealed a passion for classical music, the city hoisted a 1930s opera house off its foundation and moved it 215 feet to a better location.

When Shanghai bid to be a host city for Formula One auto racing, Mr. Chen's brother-in-law took charge of building a billion-dollar track. The circuit was "unquestionably the finest in the world," marveled 27-time Grand Prix winner Jackie Stewart, who added that "no democracy could afford this."

The city government also sold assets in murky deals, according to brief stock-market disclosures and other official sources. In late 2004, Shanghai's State Asset Bureau sold 8% of Shanghai Electric, the $4.25 billion machinery maker Mr. Chen once headed. The local government also sold 20% of Hua An Fund Management Co., a mutual-fund group that manages $4.3 billion of assets.

The city gave no values for the deals or reasons for doing them. But according to the companies, the buyer in each case was a man named Zhang Rongkun, who earlier in 2004 had also built a toll highway to the Formula One track. Forbes estimated the obscure 33-year-old's worth at $605 million.

But tension with the central government was growing. The first signs of it had already arisen in 2002, soon after a new generation of officials with few Shanghai links rose to power in Beijing, led by President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao.

As Shanghai continued to pour money into megaprojects that underpinned property and commodity costs nationwide, the disconnect with Beijing's leadership widened. When the central government imposed a national tax in 2005 to squeeze property speculators, Shanghai diluted it with local exemptions.

In the middle of last year, the government stepped up a crackdown on excesses. For instance, a vice mayor of Beijing was ousted in June for "corruption and dissoluteness" in his job, which included overseeing construction for the 2008 Olympic Games.

Mr. Chen appeared bulletproof. His mentor, former President Jiang, still pulled strings from his retirement, in a Shanghai compound so exclusive that the streets around it aren't on maps. But in August, just as the former president was enjoying a last hurrah with publication of his memoirs, investigators from the Communist-run central government and military began detaining Shanghai officials.

First came the chief of the city pension fund and then Mr. Zhang, the wealthy young purchaser of parts of two state companies, Shanghai Electric and Hua An Fund Management. He couldn't be reached for comment. Detained shortly afterward were Mr. Chen's longtime secretary and people who ran Hua An, plus heads of the Shanghai asset bureaus that sold the stakes in the companies.

Mr. Chen's brother-in-law, boss of the Formula One speedway, was detained. The Communist Party dealt with them in a time-honored method of party discipline, with detention as the first step in what is usually a secretive trial process.

On Sept. 25, the party stunned Shanghai by announcing that Mr. Chen himself was out. Besides pension corruption, said the state-run Xinhua news agency, Mr. Chen had committed "other discipline violations," such as "helping further the economic interests of illegal entrepreneurs," protecting colleagues who "severely violated laws" and aiding family members "by taking advantage of his official posts."

Mention of Mr. Chen quickly vanished from government Web sites. Within hours, Shanghai party members were summoned to a ballroom at a state-owned newspaper company, Wenhui-Xinmin United News Group. There, says a person who was present, party members heard more specific accusations: that Mr. Chen had channeled cash to his family, including $125 million in city pension money to his son, Chen Weili.

The son was a figure in sports, as deputy manager of the city's professional soccer club and publisher of China's Tennis World magazine. He was an official of a company that bought control of a city-owned developer with prominent projects on the Bund, including one with New York-based Rockefeller Group International Inc. The son, detained, couldn't be reached for comment. Rockefeller, a unit of Japan's Mitsubishi Estate Co., says its project has been unaffected by the case.

Several books quickly appeared, anonymously purporting to tell more of the story of the Shanghai leader's downfall, such as tales of alleged carousing and mistresses.

The investigation has especially chilled the property industry. Across the Huangpu River from the Bund, Japan's Mori Building Co. is barred from leasing space in a 100-story skyscraper it's building until the city government signs off on the tower's name, say people familiar with the project. The city's plans for a similar-size skyscraper next door are on hold.

Vincent Lo, a Hong Kong magnate who used to boast about his political connections, has warned investors that his company faces legal risks for accepting pension money to try to build a Shanghai version of Silicon Valley. In contrast to the U.S., China bars the investment of pension money in real estate, to keep retirees' money from being squandered in chancy projects.

Shanghai's mayor and acting party secretary, Han Zheng, says real-estate investors are still welcome. But now, extravagance is out, and "prominent use will be made of caps and ceilings" to control economic growth, he said in a recent address.

When the scandal broke, Mr. Lo of Hong Kong was in the midst of building the "Knowledge & Innovation Community," an ultramodern apartment and office complex adapted to high-tech tenants. Oracle Corp. and Cisco Systems Inc. called it Shanghai's version of Silicon Valley and agreed to help build it.

Among his financing: $190 million from the Shanghai pension fund. It had been funneled through Shanghai Pudong Development Bank Co., a local-government-run bank part-owned by Citigroup Inc., and masked as commercial lending, according to regulatory notices. Pudong Development and Citigroup had no comment.

Mr. Lo said he was returning the pension money and might be unable to finish the project but knew of no investigation targeting him. He replaced the pension money in part with a $113 million loan, but that came on tougher terms and needs to be repaid by March. Through a spokeswoman, Mr. Lo said he is arranging repayment and his projects remain on track. Oracle wouldn't say whether it remains involved. Cisco declined to comment on Mr. Lo's funding.

Market Leninism (WSJ)

By Ross Terrill

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

Mao Zedong, alone among major 20th-century dictators, enjoys a benign life-after-death. Taxi drivers in south China hang a Mao portrait on the steering wheel to ward off accidents. Nightclub singers in Beijing throb to lyrics from Mao's "Quotations." Urban youths relax in "Cultural Revolution-style" cafés at rough-hewn tables with Mao slogans on the wall, eating peasant dishes as they answer cell phones and chat about the stock market. Mao temples exist in some Buddhist villages, the altar adorned with a serene Mao image.

As President Hu Jintao tries to transcend communism forward to "market Leninism," Mao, now dead for 30 years, transcends communism backward to Chinese folk history. He floats into a nether zone as if he'd never been a political figure at all.

Where is Mao the totalitarian? Tens of millions of Chinese died in the forced collectivization of the Great Leap Forward of 1958 and '59, victims of Mao's utopianism and cruelty. Millions more died, and tens of millions had their lives ruined, during the Cultural Revolution of the 1960s.

The cab drivers, farmers, pop singers and rural worshippers are really only echoing the Chinese Communist Party, which does not quite know how to handle Mao's legacy. New history textbooks approved for initial use in Shanghai have largely brushed Mao out of China's story. Can a society that lived by Confucianism for two millennia, and later by Mao's leftist political faith, be content with amnesia about the Mao era and the absence of a believed public philosophy to replace communism?

Redeeming traits may help explain why Mao has been treated more gently than Stalin or Hitler. He wrote impressive essays and memorable poems. He was part monkey and part tiger, as he said of himself. The "tiger" knew how get from point A to point B, but the "monkey" felt doubt about the desirability of arriving at point B. Crucial, however, is the Chinese state's need for Mao. The CCP cannot simply denounce Mao as Nikita Khrushchev indicted Stalin in 1956. Mao, after all, was not only China's Stalin, but also its Lenin and even its Marx. President Hu is heir to the power seized by Mao in 1949. Mao's gun is his legitimacy.

Mao made history; at the same time, history made Mao. Were the hundreds of millions of Chinese who wept at the sight of him out of their minds? In addition to looking at Mao's major failings as a human being, we must look at the structures that turned Mao's whim into CCP tyranny. At the reasons for the evaporation of his youthful idealism and exactitude. At the social engineering ideas he sprayed over China.

"Jesus was dismembered for speaking out," Mao wrote to a friend at age 22, in 1915. "He who speaks out does not necessarily transgress, and even if he does transgress, this is but a small matter to a wise man." Yes, young Mao was an ardent individualist. At teachers' training college his credo became the self-realization of the individual. "Wherever there is repression of the individual," he wrote in the margin of a Chinese translation of Friedrich Paulsen's "System of Ethics," "wherever there are acts contrary to the nature of the individual, there can be no greater crime."

Mao's respect for individual freedom later collapsed. There were four reasons. One was the powerful current of nationalism in early-20th-century China; the cry to rescue the nation eclipsed individual self-realization. A second was the large role of war in China from the 1920s to the 1940s. Pervasive violence made political debate a luxury and favored repression. A third was Mao's embrace of Marxist ideas of class, economic planning and communist party organization. Fourth was the hangover in Mao's mind and Chinese society generally of an emperor mentality.

In the end, Mao, facilitated by Stalin, built a party-state that neatly combined Leninism, the paternalism of early Chinese sage-rulers and fascism Chinese-style. He sought to craft a "new man."

Mao's achievement was to unite China after foreign invasions and civil war, and to make China after 1949 a force with which to be reckoned. But his social engineering efforts were largely canceled by Deng Xiaoping after Mao's death in 1976. In subsequent years, the totalitarian state became an authoritarian state. Today, retention of CCP power, moneymaking for the folks below, national glory for all, and a veil over the past in the name of "good feelings" are the chief priorities. With Mao's "new" Chinese man gone, the "old" Chinese man of family values, entrepreneurial spirit and a belief in China as a religion reappears.

But the soft landing for Mao is not the final word. Some say Deng reversed Mao's revolution, but it is an important distinction that Deng dismantled Mao's thought yet retained Mao's state. Deng-ism (continued by President Hu) was a retreat from as much as possible of Maoism without endangering Leninist political power.

In late 2006 Beijing jailed three intellectuals on trumped-up charges behind which lie the sin of speaking indiscreet words. Ching Cheong, chief China correspondent of a Singapore newspaper, got five years for "spying," but really for getting a fee to speak at a seminar run by a think tank that Beijing dislikes. Zhao Yan, a researcher for the New York Times in Beijing, got three years for "fraud," but really for feeding the Times information on some mild political tensions within the Chinese government. Chen Guangchen, a blind self-taught lawyer, got 51 months for "gathering a crowd to disrupt traffic," but really for annoying officials in Shandong Province by representing victims of sterilizations and forced abortions carried out contrary to Beijing's own regulations. The intended intimidation in these three cases is an all-too-clear residue of the Mao era, when citizens never knew where they stood in relation to authority.

We return to the "solution" of having Mao float into folklore as a modern-day Yellow Emperor for an age of weapons in space and the WTO; a figure of dignity who can serve as a fashion model for green silk pajamas, as I recently noticed in a Shanghai department store. Such "Maoism" is the twitching of a society whose post-Mao leaders have offered economic advancement but political smoke and mirrors. It is easier and safer, of course, to domesticate Mao (the green silk pajamas), criticize him as an evil individual (as some do in private), or simply draw a veil over him (the CCP line), than to broach the problem of the political system he introduced to China.

Today, young pro-market Chinese who devour Hayek's "Road to Serfdom" and books on American business are embracing an antistate Chinese tradition (best known in the West through Taoism). They would like -- but will not get -- a China without politics. A new public philosophy, when it comes, as it must, will come from gestation below, not as a diktat from a father-figure or a paternalistic Communist Party.

"When societies first come to birth, it is the leader who produces the institutions," wrote Montesquieu. In China, that was the Mao era. "Later it is the institutions which produce the leaders," the French philosopher added. That is today's China, with its nine-man leading group (all engineers). Later still, in a democratic era, it will be the voting public that chooses among clusters of policies devised by politicians allowed only the short term authority to lead.

Mr. Terrill, a research associate at Harvard's Fairbank Center, is the author of "The New Chinese Empire" (Basic Books, 2004).

New Charges In Russia Against Oil Executives (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

New York Times, February 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128354

MOSCOW, Feb. 5 — Russian prosecutors brought new charges Monday against the imprisoned founder of the Yukos oil company and one of his business partners, opening a new line of legal attack against a Kremlin opponent.

The former executive, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, and his partner, Platon A. Lebedev, were charged with embezzlement and money laundering, which his lawyers said together could carry prison sentences of 15 years.

The two men have been held since their arrests in 2003, and are serving eight-year sentences for tax evasion and other charges. Their lawyers said they had potentially qualified for parole late this year, when they would have served half of their sentences.

The new charges, which accused the men of embezzling about $20 billion in Yukos revenues, appeared to destroy that possibility and opened a new chapter in the long saga of Yukos's legal troubles.

The men were brought to face the charges with little fanfare, though with substantial security, in the eastern Siberian city of Chita, to which they had been transferred in December from the separate penal colonies where they had been serving their sentences.

Russian prosecutors remained largely quiet about the charges throughout the day and did not publicly release details of the charges or supporting documents. Essential details remained unknown even to the international defense lawyers for the men, including the dates and detailed accounts of the crimes of which they are accused.

Mr. Khodorkovsky and Mr. Lebedev's defense lawyers promptly denounced the new charges as baseless. They said they were a means to keep Mr. Khodorkovsky and Mr. Lebedev in prison beyond Russia's presidential election in early 2008 and throughout the remainder of the liquidation of Yukos, their former oil giant, which is in Russian receivership.

Robert Amsterdam, one of Mr. Khodorkovsky's lawyers, said from London in a conference call with Western reporters that the charges were a continuation of Russia's use of its prosecutors, courts and investigators in "a fraudulent system of assets theft."

"The present proceedings are a miscarriage of justice," he said.

Under the new charges, the two men are accused of embezzling roughly $20 billion in oil revenues using a series of internal transfers in Yukos and its subsidiaries, and then transfers through other accounts.

They are accused of using the Open Russia foundation, a charitable organization that Mr. Khodorkovsky founded, for transferring a fraction of the money, his lawyers said. Open Russia has also been under investigation, and its accounts frozen, since last year.

The lawyers said that the entire premise for the charges was absurd, and that Yukos's financial statements, prepared by auditors from PricewaterhouseCoopers L.L.P., could account for all of Yukos's oil production and sales.

Before Mr. Khodorkovsky's arrest at gunpoint late in 2003, Yukos was Russia's top oil producer and Mr. Khodorkovsky's wealth was vast and his influence extensive.

He had close relations with senior Russian officials, founded Open Russia, underwrote civil-society organizations and spoke of opening Russia to the West and to Western business practices. Fortune magazine declared him Russia's richest man and said he had $15 billion in personal wealth.

His business empire and stature were crushed by President Vladimir V. Putin's Kremlin, which has defended his arrest and presided over a parallel tax investigation that has brought the company to a forced sale under Russian bankruptcy proceedings.

Mr. Khodorkovsky's critics labeled him a cynic and a fraud, saying that he controlled a faction in Parliament by purchasing legislators' votes, and that his fortunes were accumulated and secured by insider deals and crime. The Kremlin has sought to portray Yukos as Russia's Enron, a company that ruined its own image with extensive fraud and accounting schemes.

Since his arrest and the case against him and his company, Mr. Khodorkovsky has become an occasional point of contention between Russia and the West.

But his cause and his public relations efforts have not attracted widespread support in Russia, where resentment lingers against a class of profiteers who amassed almost instant fortunes after the Soviet Union's collapse.

His lawyers have framed his case in ways that remain germane outside of Russia's often murky and bruising business circles: as an example of government persecution that underscores Russia's spotty record on human rights and respect for the rule of law.

DOJ_NMG_0128355

They said it appeared that the next trial, for which no date has been set, would be held at the remote detention center in Chita, the closest city to the place where Mr. Khodorkovsky had been imprisoned, under conditions that would make it difficult for lawyers to meet with their clients or for public scrutiny of the proceedings.

Criminal Case Likely To Put All Of Yukos In State Hands (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

New York Times, February 6, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 5 — New criminal charges filed Monday against former leaders of the Yukos oil company, once Russia's largest private energy concern, are likely to ease what remains of the company into state hands, strengthening the Kremlin's control over the industry, analysts and company officials said.

In this sense, the Yukos affair is ending as it began — in an opaque mixture of criminal prosecution and Russian energy nationalism, where it is far from clear where one ends and the other begins.

"It comes at a time when we're moving into the final chapter of Yukos," Chris Weafer, chief analyst at Alfa Bank and a former adviser to the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, said Monday. "They want a change in how people view the Yukos affair. It is important that they shake off the image of the asset grab."

State-owned companies already control a third of the oil production in Russia, one of the world's largest producing nations.

Now, both of Russia's large state energy companies are expressing interest in buying Yukos oil fields and refineries, assets that critics say were expropriated by the government but that could look more like the spinoff from a corporate tax and accounting scandal if the new charges stick, as expected.

Authorities in Chita, a city near the Chinese border, charged Yukos's former chief, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, and his business partner, Platon A. Lebedev, with embezzlement and money laundering.

Charles Krause, a lawyer for Mr. Khodorkovsky, said in a conference call from Washington that prosecutors were accusing Mr. Khodorkovsky of having embezzled money from oil trades executed between Yukos company subsidiaries, in a practice known as transfer pricing.

Under this maneuver, which the company acknowledges existed, a trading arm of Yukos paid lower than world prices for oil bought from other company subsidiaries, in what was presented as a legal tax-minimization strategy. The transfer-pricing operations that formed the basis of the new charges were also the source of the Russian government tax claims that bankrupted Yukos.

Russian authorities say they may also prosecute Yukos's auditor, PricewaterhouseCoopers. In a statement, PricewaterhouseCoopers denied any wrongdoing.

The remaining Yukos assets, roughly $22 billion, are to be auctioned within months. Though diminished after the loss of its largest pumping asset in 2004, Yukos remains a valuable company. At stake are 2.3 billion barrels of oil reserves and 400,000 barrels a day in production, five refineries, a network of gas stations and Moscow real estate.

Yukos, though bankrupt, owns valuable minority stakes in both major state energy companies — 9.5 percent of Rosneft and 20 percent of Gazprom's oil subsidiary, Gazprom Neft. Gazprom has said it would like to buy back the shares in the oil subsidiary. Rosneft is expected to bid for the pumping assets and at least some of the refineries.

Yukos is administered by a court-appointed receiver, Eduard K. Rebgun, who in a telephone interview Monday sought to minimize any connections between the criminal charges and the bankruptcy process. He said that Yukos's finances were threadbare even before the tax charges were filed in 2003, and that asset and revenue stripping were most likely the cause — a message that dovetailed with the new criminal case. "It's clear they were already stripping assets and revenue," Mr. Rebgun said, adding that in 2003, Yukos reported a loss of $1 million.

The new charges could have a bearing in a separate court process in the Netherlands, where ownership of more than $1.5 billion in Yukos's European assets are being contested by Mr. Rebgun. Yukos International, which is still independent of the Russian bankruptcy process, holds $1.49 billion in a Dutch bank account from the sale of a Lithuanian refinery, 49 percent of a Slovak pipeline network, and a Swiss engineering company valued around $25 million.

New Pipeline to Bypass Belarus

DOJ_NMG_0128356

Transneft, Russia's oil pipeline monopoly, is planning to bypass neighboring Belarus by building a pipeline to a Baltic port, Primorsk.

"Of course this is very, very expensive," Transneft's president, Semyon Vainshtok, said on state television yesterday. "If we didn't have such risks from neighboring states, it wouldn't be necessary to spend so much money."

Transneft cut supplies to Belarus for three days last month after Belarus demanded a transit fee for crude oil moving through its pipeline, causing shortages at refineries in Eastern Europe. The Interfax news agency reported yesterday that Belarus was planning to increase fees by 35 percent, starting Feb. 15.

Transneft's new route will run from the Belarus border to Primorsk, Mr. Vainshtok said. It will have to be able to pump 50 million tons of crude oil annually, about two-thirds of Primorsk's capacity now.

Bienvenidos To Mexican Avocados (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

FREE TRADE has never tasted so good. After 93 years, the last U.S. barrier to avocados imported from Mexico has been lifted. As of Feb. 1, Californians, Hawaiians and Floridians can now join their fellow Americans in enjoying the fruits of a competitive market for party-dip ingredients.

The ban on avocados from south of the border dates to 1914, when U.S. agricultural officials barred them because they found that some avocados from Mexico carried fruit flies that could infest U.S. avocado orchards. Outraged Mexican officials maintained that it was all a yanqui plot to corner the guacamole futures market (which had yet to grow to Super Bowl-sized proportions), but Mexican farmers switched to growing Hass avocados, which are less hospitable to fruit flies. Still, the ban persisted.

Many decades later, however, the competition was back on. The North American Free Trade Agreement took effect in 1994, and in 1997, the U.S. agreed to allow the importation of Mexican avocados in a few states if Mexico agreed to take some U.S. cherries, which Mexico had banned in 1992 because (of course) they carried pests. By 2005, people in 47 states were dicing, mashing or simply peeling and eating (yes, it happens) avocados from Mexico. In California, Florida and Hawaii, which are allowed to protect their own avocado farmers, the ban persisted until 2007.

It expired Thursday — and just in time. The Super Bowl was Sunday, which meant lots of eating, and last month's cold snap did serious damage to the state's avocado crop. The California Avocado Commission, a trade group, estimates farmers will lose about 25% of their crop this year.

And the commission, despite its name, welcomes the aguacates. Apparently, Americans' addiction to avocados is so strong it overpowers the principles of economics. When avocados are involved, supply and demand mean nothing, says the commission: No matter how many avocados there are, we eat them. Avocado consumption nationwide has ballooned 300 million pounds in the last three years, to a billion, but despite the flood of avocados on the market, the price varied only by 1% per avocado.

Mexican President Felipe Calderon noted that Mexico would rather send its avocados to the U.S. than send its avocado farmers. So it's good news for everyone — not just football fans, who, after all, have only one meaningless game left to watch. Pass the chips, please.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Seeks $7.2M More For Guantánamo Cases (MH)

By Carol Rosenberg

The Miami Herald, February 6, 2007

President Bush's budget request published today includes plans to spend $7.2 million on salaries and expenses for civilian lawyers -- to both fend off legal challenges at home and help prosecute terrorist suspects at the war-crimes court at Guantánamo.

Until release of the budget, the military commissions had been described as a military function -- handled by the Defense Department and soon to be supervised by a former Pentagon inspector general.

But an annex of the budget released by the White House today lists a supplemental request of $1,736,000 for the government's National Security Division, part of the Justice Department run by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"This request would provide the National Security Division $2 million to support the Department of Defense's prosecution of high-value detainees at Guantánamo via the process established by the military commission," the 2007 supplemental request released today says.

Bush announced in September that he had ordered the CIA to transfer 14 so-called high-value captives to the U.S. Navy base in southeast Cuba, effectively putting them under Pentagon control.

They include Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the 9/11 attacks, and a captive known as Hambali, who was allegedly an Islamic militant in Indonesia.

The budget request said the Justice Department's National Security Division ``will support the [Pentagon] effort by providing experienced assistant United States attorneys and paralegals."

A Justice Department fact sheet explaining the supplemental budget request said the federal prosecutors, who are civilian lawyers, will get their assignments ``as soon as possible."

The assignments, it said, "will last a year or longer." High-value prosecutions are expected to be more complex. The captives were held at so-called CIA "black sites," out of reach of the International Committee of the Red Cross.

"Maybe they don't have the firepower," said Carl W. Tobias, a constitutional law professor at the University of Richmond.

He predicted the larger war-on-terror trials to touch on a range of issues from military law to international law to human rights questions.

"There is so much at stake, and there's so much uncharted territory," said Tobias, ``I think they really want some kind of specialized expertise that DOD [the Department of Defense] just doesn't have."

The Pentagon had no immediate comment Monday on whatcivilian Justice Department lawyers might do at the trials.

Nor could a spokesman say whether the budget and supplemental included any other Guantánamo related funding.

Defense officials have a proposal to build a legal compound in which to stage the trials at Guantánamo that could cost up to $125 million.

But the Pentagon shelved an earlier plan to fund them without explicit Congressional approval; it was not immediately clear Monday whether the funds were included in either the 2008 budget or the 2007 supplemental.

In the meantime, the chief Pentagon prosecutor for the tribunals, Air Force Col. Morris Davis, on Friday swore out new charges against three long-held captives at Guantánamo -- David Hicks, 31, of Australia; Salim Hamdan, 36, of Yemen, and Omar Khadr, 19, of Canada.

Separately, the Justice Department is seeking an additional $5.5 million for its civil division to fend off lawsuits filed by Guantánamo captives in the federal courts.

Civilian lawyers have filed habeas corpus petitions in U.S. District Court in Washington on behalf of several hundred captives -- and the Justice Department has been challenging them for years.

Then, late last year the Republican-led Congress stripped so-called "enemy combatants" of the traditional right to challenge their detention. So Justice Department attorneys have been working in the courts to get the captives' cases closed.

Now, the 2008 budget seeks $5.5 million for 30 attorneys and six other staff "to defend the government in Guantánamo Bay detainee litigation," according to a Justice Department fact sheet published today.

The justification for the expense said that, since 9/11, the Bush administration has adopted "numerous counterterrorism strategies" to disrupt attacks and weaken ``global terrorist networks."

DOJ_NMG_0128361

But the strategies have "drawn legal challenges in courts," it said, ``including hundreds of lawsuits filed on behalf of alien enemy combatants held at Guantánamo Bay Naval Base in Cuba."

Surveillance Budget For Court Gets A Boost (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, February 6, 2007

With the Bush administration's revelation that it will replace the controversial warrantless surveillance program conducted by the National Security Agency with a plan approved by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court, the fiscal 2007 budget includes a $3.1 million increase to address what is expected to be a spike in FISA applications.

FISA, the secret court that issues wiretap orders from Justice Department requests to conduct electronic surveillance and physical searches of suspected international terrorists or spies, already has had an increased workload since 9/11.

A senior justice official told U.S. News that the department's newly retooled National Security Division has streamlined the FISA application process dramatically, and the increased funds along with the quicker processing will allow the department to handle the new surveillance workload.

But "it will mean more work for our office," the official said.

Bush Seeks Spending Increases In Research, Surveillance (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, February 6, 2007

Proposed $2.9 trillion budget includes millions for science and tech studies, traveler screening programs--and a few cutbacks.

President Bush's proposed $2.9 trillion budget for next year calls for increases in some scientific research funding, along with boosts for counterterrorism surveillance and screening programs.

The proposal, unveiled Monday, seeks a balanced budget by 2012 while increasing spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. That means curbing so-called "mandatory" spending by domestic agencies, including slashing the "growth rate" of the government's Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security programs by $96 billion.

"My formula for a balanced budget reflects the priorities of our country at this moment in its history: protecting the homeland and fighting terrorism, keeping the economy strong with low taxes, and keeping spending under control while making federal programs more effective," Bush said in a message accompanying his proposal.

The budget, however, is only a nonbinding request from the Bush administration to a Democrat-controlled Congress, which has already suggested it will be radically reshaped.

The president's plan includes beefing up spending for his American Competitiveness Initiative, which aims to ensure that the United States keeps up with its global competitors in the science and technology realm.

Under the proposed budget, the National Science Foundation would receive $6.4 billion in funding, a 6.8 percent boost from last year. Of that amount, about $5.1 billion would go to "research and related activities," which in the past "has contributed to the development of the Internet and Internet search engines, fiber optics, color plasma displays, magnetic resonance imaging, and other advances that now help each of us in our daily lives," according to the president's budget breakdown for that agency.

That number includes $390 million--an increase of 4.5 percent from last year--for NSF's nanotechnology research arm, and $994 million--a 10 percent boost--for its Networking and Information Technology Research and Development program.

Some tech-centric agencies could experience cuts. The National Institute of Standards and Technology, for instance, saw an increase in budget levels for its core research activities. But its Advanced Technology Program, which is designed to explore "unproven, early stage technologies," appears to be on the way out. Its proposed funding plummeted from about $79 billion this year to zero dollars for the next fiscal year. NIST representatives did not respond immediately to requests for clarification.

As outlined during his State of the Union address last month, Bush asked Congress to set aside hundreds of millions of dollars for research on alternative energy technologies including solar photovoltaic, biofuels, and advanced battery hybrid and "plug-in" vehicle research. The largest chunk, at $385 billion, would go to coal research initiatives, closely followed by $309 million for hydrogen fuel studies.

The overall budgets for the U.S. Departments of Justice and Homeland Security also saw slight boosts, with an emphasis on government screening and surveillance programs.

Within the Homeland Security department, the president proposed $1 billion for the so-called Secure Border Initiative, which includes plans for a "virtual fence" composed of motion sensors, infrared cameras and unmanned aerial vehicles, or UAVs, that the administration hopes will help keep better tabs on illicit entrants.

Homeland Security also would receive a $21.9 million increase in funding for its Science and Technology Office of Innovation, which hopes to develop technologies that would create a more resilient electric grid and detect tunnels along the border, among other things. Overall funding levels for the Science and Technology directorate under Bush's proposal, however, would drop from $848 million for fiscal year 2007 to $799 million for the upcoming year.

Traveler screening projects, some of which have proven controversial, would also receive increased funding. Secure Flight, an airline passenger profiling system that was plagued by privacy concerns, would receive a $38 million boost in funding for the next fiscal year. The president requested $146.2 million for implementation of a system that would allow U.S. authorities to record and screen all 10 fingerprints of foreign entrants to the country, as opposed to the two prints that are currently required.

Under the banner of "preventing and combating terrorism," the president called for an additional $227 million for various Justice Department programs in that realm. Among those requests: an extra $37.8 million "to address the demand for secure interception of data from public and private networks" and $22.8 million for investigators engaged in computer analysis and digital forensics. Those requests mark significant boosts from last year, when those activities received $17.9 million and $19.7 million respectively.

The Justice Department's budget also includes more than $25 million in program increases--up from $93.7 million last year--for investigations involving child pornography and obscenity, particularly tracking convicted sex offenders and apprehending "online child pornographers and molesters."

For the fourth straight year, the president plans to allow the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office to keep all the fees it collects, which are expected to be around $1.9 billion. The agency said Monday that it hopes to use its funds to hire 1,200 new patent examiners in the next fiscal year.

With opposition to the budget already emanating from the Democrat-controlled Congress, it's unlikely the proposal will be enacted as is.

"Today's budget from the president is just more of the same fiscal irresponsibility and misplaced priorities," U.S. House of Representatives Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said in a statement. "It takes our country in the wrong direction."

What remains to be seen is how the science- and technology-related provisions will hold up.

For instance, while the president requested $17.3 billion--a 3.1 percent increase over his request for the previous year--for NASA's fiscal year 2008 budget, the agency doesn't expect to get that from Congress. For 2007, Congress appropriated $400 million less than the president's requested $16.8 billion. NASA administrator Michael Griffin warned in a press conference Monday that continual NASA budget cuts may cause U.S. astronauts to be grounded for as long as five years and force cutbacks in science programs and lunar robotic explorations.

Rep. Bart Gordon (D-Tenn.), chairman of the House Science and Technology Committee, said the funding increases were helpful, but the plan overall "lacks the priorities and consistency to ensure our competitiveness now and in the long run."

Man Convicted In Terror Training Case (AP)

By Matthew Barakat, The Associated Press

AP, February 6, 2007

ALEXANDRIA, Va. (AP) — A Virginia man was convicted Monday of lying to a federal grand jury about his training with a Pakistani militant group, three years after he was acquitted of giving aid to the Taliban as part of a group that trained with paintball games.

A jury in U.S. District Court convicted Sabri Benkahla, 31, of four felony counts including perjury and obstruction of justice. He faces a maximum of 25 years in prison when he is sentenced April 27.

Benkahla told a grand jury in 2004 that he had never engaged in combat training during a 1999 trip to Pakistan, but the government contended that he trained with a militant group called Lashkar-e-Taiba to use rocket-propelled grenades and automatic weapons.

The defense argued that prosecutors, stung by Benkahla's 2004 acquittal, laid a perjury trap by summoning him before the grand jury and asking questions that had no bearing on the panel's terrorism investigation.

An FBI agent testified that Benkahla's testimony was important needed because the bureau was investigating his links to suspected terrorists including Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, another U.S. citizen from Falls Church who was subsequently convicted of joining al-Qaida and plotting to assassinate President Bush.

Benkahla was one of two defendants acquitted in the government's prosecution of a dozen Muslim men who participated in what the government called a "Virginia jihad network" that used paintball games in the Virginia woods in 2000 and 2001 as a means to train for holy war around the globe.

TERRORISM

Falls Church Man Convicted of Lying About Training

A Falls Church man was convicted yesterday of lying when he told a grand jury that he had never attended a terrorist training camp overseas.

Sabri Benkahla, 31, had been acquitted in 2004 of being a member of a "Virginia jihad network" but appeared before the grand jury later that year. Prosecutors said his denial that he had received terrorist training hindered the grand jury's investigation into who was being trained in weapons and explosives use at camps in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Benkahla was indicted again last year on charges that included perjury and obstruction of justice. A federal jury in Alexandria convicted him yesterday on those and other counts. He faces up to 25 years in prison when he is sentenced April 27.

Board Chairman Will Seek Job as Clerk of Court

Arlington County Board Chairman Paul Ferguson (D) announced yesterday that he will not seek another term in office in November because he wants to run for election as the clerk of the Arlington County Circuit Court. David Bell, the court's longtime clerk, said last week that he would not seek reelection.

Ferguson, 41, has served on the County Board since 1996. He recently drew widespread attention for a major initiative to reduce the county's greenhouse gas emissions.

Woman Escapes Knife-Wielding Abductor

Arlington County police are investigating the abduction of a woman who was walking alone Friday evening in the 1500 block of South George Mason Drive. Police said a man with a knife pulled the 23-year-old woman into some bushes, but she fought him off. The attacker ran from the scene, police said. The woman was treated for cuts on her face.

Police said the 8 p.m. incident might be related to a sexual assault that took place last month. On Jan. 11, police said, a 27-year-old woman who was walking in the 4200 block of South Four Mile Run was grabbed from behind by a man who threatened her with a knife. The man forced the woman to walk to a nearby grassy area, where he sexually assaulted her, police said.

SmarTrip Cards Now Work on DASH Buses

Riders on Alexandria's DASH buses now can use SmarTrip farecards when they transfer from Metrorail or Metrobus, officials said yesterday.

New fareboxes on the 57 DASH buses also allow customers to add up to $20 to their SmarTrip cards on the bus.

To encourage use of the blue-and-green cards beyond Metrobus and Metrorail, Metro officials have been trying to install equipment so the cards can be used on nine regional bus systems. But the process has been delayed repeatedly because of incompatible software, officials said. Other local bus systems are supposed to accept the cards by July.

Congress Listens In On Wiretapping (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

SLOWLY BUT surely, the National Security Agency's eavesdropping on Americans suspected of ties with foreign terrorists is being brought under the rule of law. But the Bush administration still owes not just Congress but the country some straight answers about the program.

Last week, Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales agreed to provide Congress details of the program's new arrangement for being monitored by a special court set up by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Gonzales' latest concession comes a few weeks after the administration abruptly reversed itself and said that it could, after all, conduct surveillance of international calls and e-mails under the court's supervision.

But the administration has still refused to spell out whether the court will approve individual requests for wiretapping authority — as it traditionally has done — or just sign off on more general requests. This is the crucial question.

A Justice Department official said last month that the new court orders are not "cookie-cutter" and were more specific than an "advisory opinion" on the overall program. That sounds encouraging, but the public deserves to know whether the administration is providing the court with probable cause about specific U.S. citizens.

Perhaps the answer to that question is in the documents Gonzales is turning over to Congress. If so, it should be shared with the public.

No one suggests that investigators should publicize the names or locations of people under suspicion or the technology being used to capture their communications. But it shouldn't be a state secret whether the NSA is getting case-by-case approval for surveillance of Americans or engaging in some less discriminate "data mining."

Two realities strengthen the hand of Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and other lawmakers who want to bring oversight to the program: the new Democratic-controlled Congress and a lawsuit that reached a federal appeals court in Cincinnati last week. Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), who succeeded Specter as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, is threatening new legislation if the documents suggest the administration hasn't achieved the "proper balance" between privacy and security. Last week, two of three judges on a panel of the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati reacted skeptically to the suggestion that a legal challenge to the original program was moot.

The attacks of 9/11 changed a lot of things in the United States — but not the meaning of the 4th Amendment or the need for congressional oversight of the executive branch. The administration can show its respect for these principles by being more forthcoming with the American people about its activities.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man Pleads Guilty To Possessing Ricin (FINDLAW/AP)

By Beth Rucker, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 6, 2007

(AP) - NASHVILLE, Tennessee-A man pleaded guilty Monday to federal charges of possessing the potentially deadly poison ricin, firearms silencers and explosives.

William Matthews entered his plea in a deal with prosecutors that calls for a prison term of 7 years and 3 months when he is sentenced April 27.

The ricin charge could have been punished by up to life in prison, and the weapons charges each carried a maximum sentence of 10 years.

"Mr. Matthews, I think, chose this (deal) as the best of the available options," his lawyer, public defender Sumter Camp, said after court.

Neither the defendant nor the authorities explained why Matthews had the ricin, which is illegal to possess except for research, and the silencers and explosives, which are legal but were not properly registered.

A prosecutor declined to comment following the plea hearing.

Matthews was charged after a tip from his estranged wife led police and federal agents to search his property May 31. They found the ricin in a sealed baby jar, two functional pipe bombs, five gun silencers, three blasting caps and bomb-making materials.

As little as 500 micrograms of the protein ricin, roughly the amount that fits on the head of a pin, is enough to kill an adult, according to the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

In his plea, the defendant acknowledged possessing 5.68 grams of the substance, which he had made from castor beans.

Matthews, 56, was already in a Davidson County jail serving a nine-month sentence for violating orders of protection taken out by his wife when he was charged with ricin possession. He has remained in custody since then.

Matthews, who worked as a Davidson County sheriff's officer and at the city's drug court before he left amid a sexual harassment investigation, testified that in the 1960s he was diagnosed with schizophrenia and bipolar disorder and received treatment then.

In February 2004, ricin was found in the office of then Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. Dozens of Capitol employees were quarantined briefly and decontaminated, but none of them got sick. Authorities said at the time that Matthews was not believed to be connected to the incident.

Evacuee Camp Kids Worry Schools Chief (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, February 6, 2007

BATON ROUGE — The leader of Louisiana's largest school system says she believes that up to 200 children in the state's biggest hurricane evacuee camp are not registered in local schools. And she says the U.S. government — citing privacy laws — is doing little to help officials identify the youths.

DOJ_NMG_0128365

East Baton Rouge Parish School Superintendent Charlotte Placide says the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) has refused to give school officials direct access to information about youths in Renaissance Village, a trailer park for families where 1,200-2,000 people live.

"The law requires students to be in school," Placide says. "We have families in the FEMA trailer park who concern me greatly."

She says schools have reached out to parents at Renaissance Village and registered about 200 youths, at least temporarily, until their families can find permanent homes. However, Placide — citing the trailer park's size, its designation as a place for families and her observations of daily life there — says it appears 200 or so more youths aren't in school.

Placide and state social service authorities say some households remain so unsettled that youths likely have jobs to help their families. Other kids might be staying home to watch their families' possessions when their parents are at work, she says.

Placide says officials' efforts to locate children would be much easier if FEMA would give the state more details about the families in Renaissance Village. But FEMA has declined to do so, she says, citing privacy laws that restrict the information the federal agency can release about benefit recipients.

FEMA spokesman James McIntyre says the agency's authority "doesn't include ensuring that kids are registered in schools. There comes a time when parents have to take responsibility."

McIntyre says FEMA has given information about evacuees receiving federal aid to the Louisiana Family Recovery Corps (LFRC), a state agency that helps families displaced by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. FEMA officials hoped LFRC would share the information with social service agencies and schools.

However, Raymond Jetson, LFRC's chief executive officer, says the information from FEMA lacks key details about Renaissance Village, such as youths' ages. "I understand the quagmire FEMA is in, attempting to respect the privacy of people. But it's becoming far too difficult to do the right thing."

LFRC's Kim Landry says the state lacks the personnel to assign truancy officers to the trailer park. She thinks the issue has not gotten much attention locally because many kids from the park would need special attention, and some residents are wary about placing more burdens on an already crowded 48,465-student system.

A 'Road Home' To Lunacy (column) (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

NEW ORLEANS -- It's beyond frustrating to hear well-meaning bureaucrats cite all the reasons that so little has been done to rebuild this ruined city and the rest of the Gulf Coast -- why, for example, out of more than 100,000 Louisiana households that have applied to the state government for their share of $7 billion in federal reconstruction funds, fewer than 400 have received their money.

That's no misprint, and I'm being generous. As of last week, when I attended a Senate Homeland Security Committee hearing at the Louisiana Supreme Court building in the historic French Quarter, the actual number of homeowners who had gotten reconstruction money from this program, called Road Home, was 331. My hopeful assumption is that a few more checks have trickled out since then.

The three senators who flew down to conduct the hearing -- committee Chairman Joseph Lieberman (I-Conn.), home-state champion Mary Landrieu (D-La.) and presidential hopeful Barack Obama (D-Ill.) -- were remarkably focused and patient, given the circumstances. I got so exasperated that I had to let my mind wander, and it settled on Brownian motion.

That's not a reference to Michael Brown, the ridiculous former director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Brownian motion is a natural phenomenon that bewildered 19th-century physicists. Looking through their microscopes, they could see that a tiny particle suspended in a fluid -- a mote of dust, say -- didn't just float in place. It did a jittery little dance, abruptly jerking left and right and forward and back, always in motion.

It took Albert Einstein to figure out what was going on. Einstein explained that the infinitesimal molecules of the fluid, randomly zooming to and fro, are colliding with the relatively gargantuan piece of dust. If, at a given instant, more molecules hit it from the right than from the left, it moves left. The next instant, if more molecules hit it from the south than from the north, it moves north. The buffeted particle just zigzags aimlessly, never really getting anywhere.

That's where the recovery of New Orleans stands, or floats. Factors such as subparagraph-level provisions of federal programs, fine-print details of a contract signed by the state government and shifting alliances in municipal politics -- minuscule things, compared with the size of the job that must be done -- push from all sides, and the result is a frenzied stasis.

One example: Almost a year ago, Congress appropriated $10.4 billion in special housing funds for reconstruction in Louisiana. Federal bureaucrats at the hearing last week were at pains to tell the senators why the requirement that the state ante up 10 percent of that total in matching funds was being enforced, since this statutory provision was waived in other recent disasters such as the Sept. 11 attacks and several Florida hurricanes.

And no one even tried to explain why Washington won't just let Louisiana write a check for its 10 percent share, and instead wants the state to write, justify and track a separate 10 percent check for each individual rebuilding project -- thousands upon thousands of checks.

Everyone knows this is insanity. Nobody does anything about it.

Another example: Remember those lucky homeowners who have gotten their Road Home checks? The first thing they're being required to do is pay back, in full, any loans they previously received under a special Small Business Administration rebuilding program. Anything else we can do for you?

Washington complains that the state and local governments were painfully slow to develop their reconstruction plans -- and that's true. State and local officials respond that it took months to understand and comply with all the federal rules their projects must follow to qualify for funding -- and that's true, too.

Donald E. Powell, the Texas banker whom President Bush appointed to coordinate the federal post-Katrina recovery effort, was the committee hearing's opening witness. When Obama asked in plain language what the prospects were for an ordinary homeowner who wanted to rebuild and come home, Powell said thoughtfully, "That's a tough question . . . a complex question." Then he spoke about new tax incentives, which he is certain will persuade developers to build affordable housing.

Tax incentives? With most of the city still in ruins? Hello?

To escape the death dance of Brownian motion, New Orleans needs force applied in one coherent direction. I have an idea: If Gen. David H. Petraeus is as smart and tough as the president says he is, if he's good enough to save Baghdad, the president should immediately send him to New Orleans instead -- or explain why policing a civil war in Iraq takes priority over resurrecting a great American city.

WAR NEWS:

Republicans In Senate Block Debate On Iraq Resolution (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Republican Senate leaders succeeded today in blocking debate on a proposed resolution criticizing President Bush's plan to boost troop levels in Iraq. Democrats vowed to return to the issue soon.

"They may stop us temporarily," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. Vowing to return to the Iraq war in future debates over the 9/11 Commission's recommendations and on a supplemental appropriations bill, Reid said, "This does not end the debate on Iraq."

On a procedural vote, Senate Democrats mustered 49 votes -- far short of the 60 votes needed.

Republicans complained that Reid was giving preferential treatment to a resolution by Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) to require benchmarks for Iraqi progress. The GOP asked for similar consideration for a measure by Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), saying Congress would not cut funding for troops in the field.

"We are, in effect, being denied a fair process for this extremely important debate," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), who before the vote accused the Democratic majority of blocking consideration of alternatives to the critical amendment.

Democratic leaders, who have offered votes on several Republicans amendments, fired back that the GOP was using procedurals tactics to stifle debate on the most important issue confronting the country.

"The Republican leadership can't take 'yes' for an answer," said Reid earlier. "They have been given all they've asked for. It is clear their actions are not driven by getting votes on Republican proposals. They are driven by a desire to provide political cover for President Bush."

Over the past several weeks, senior Democrats in the Senate have been working with a handful of Republicans to craft a resolution opposing the president's plans to boost troop levels in Iraq by 21,500.

The Bush administration and its congressional allies have been fighting ferociously to stop the nonbinding resolution, which would mark an embarrassing rebuke for the White House.

As senators took to the floor this afternoon to assail each other's positions on the war, McConnell and Reid continued to confer. In the end the clock — and the slim margin of the Democrats' control over the Senate — doomed the effort.

Republicans Block Senate Debate On Iraq (AP)

By David Espo
AP, February 6, 2007

Republicans blocked a full-fledged Senate debate over Iraq on Monday, but Democrats vowed they would eventually find a way to force President Bush to change course in a war that has claimed the lives of more than 3,000 U.S. troops.

"We must heed the results of the November elections and the wishes of the American people," said Majority Leader Harry Reid.

Reid, D-Nev., spoke moments before a vote that sidetracked a nonbinding measure expressing disagreement with Bush's plan to deploy an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq. The 49-47 vote was 11 short of the 60 needed to go ahead with debate, and left the fate of the measure uncertain.

Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky described the test vote as merely a "bump in the road" that could possibly be overcome within hours. GOP lawmakers "welcome the debate and are happy to have it," he said, adding they were insisting on equal treatment for an alternative measure expected to draw strong support.

The proposal, by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., says Congress should neither cut nor eliminate funding for troops in the field. That measure takes no position on the war or the president's decision to deploy additional forces.

The political jockeying unfolded as bombings and mortar attacks killed dozens across Baghdad amid indications that a much-awaited operation to restore peace to the capital is gearing up. Bush announced last month he would beef up U.S. troop deployments to work alongside Iraqi units in an attempt to quell sectarian violence.

Democrats sought passage of a measure, supported by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., that is critical of the administration's new Iraq policy. It was the first time Democrats had scheduled a sustained debate on the war since they won control over Congress in last fall's midterm elections.

"The American people do not support escalation. Last November, voters made it clear they want a change of course, not more of the same," said Reid. "The president must hear from Congress, so he knows he stands in the wrong place, alone."

Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Democrat, echoed Reid. "If the Republicans want to stand by their president and his policy, they shouldn't run from this debate. If they believe we should send thousands of our young soldiers into the maws of this wretched civil war, they should at least have the courage to stand and defend their position," he said.

But Gregg differed with them. "We should not take action once soldiers have been sent into the field and are putting their lives at risk," he said. "We should not be saying to them through a resolution, which is nonbinding, that we don't think the mission you're on makes sense and we don't want you to do it."

Republican Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota sided with Democrats on the vote. Reid switched sides at the end, a step that allows him to call for a new roll call at his discretion. Otherwise, Democrats voted to go ahead with debate and Republicans voted not to; Sens. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., Mary Landrieu, D-La., Mel Martinez, R-Fla., and John McCain, R-Ariz., did not vote.

The war has claimed the lives of more than 3,000 U.S. military personnel so far, and costs are counted in the hundreds of billions of dollars. The administration has asked Congress for $245 billion more to cover the costs of the conflict through 2008.

Political maneuvering surrounding the issue has been intense, and White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said the administration supports "Sen. McConnell's and the Republicans' right to be able to offer the amendments they want to offer."

Behind the procedural quarrel lay uncertainty about the verdict the Senate would ultimately reach on Bush's decision to send 21,500 additional troops.

Democrats hoped to gain enough Republican votes to pass the measure expressing disagreement with Bush's decision, and to send the commander in chief an extraordinary wartime rebuke on a bipartisan vote.

It was an outcome that the White House and Senate Republican leadership hoped to avoid. They concentrated on a relatively small number of swing votes, many of them belonging to GOP senators expected to be on the ballot in 2008.

Gregg's alternative said Congress should not take "any action that will endanger United States military forces in the field, including the elimination or reduction of funds for troops in the field, as such an action with respect to funding would undermine their safety or harm their effectiveness in pursuing their assigned missions."

The measure advanced by Democrats and Warner said the same thing, but it also said the Senate "disagrees with the `plan' to augment our forces by 21,500 and urges the president instead to consider all options and alternatives."

Republicans and Democrats carried out their clash as 10 members of "Code Pink," an anti-war group, were arrested and charged with disorderly conduct during a protest in front of McCain's office in a building across the street from the Capitol. "They were absolutely compliant, peaceful," Sgt. Kimberly Schneider said of the protesters.

McCain, a likely Republican presidential candidate, opposes the measure expressing disagreement with the increase in troops.

Vote On Iraq Is Blocked By GOP (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Republicans blocked the Senate from delivering a politically embarrassing rebuke of President Bush's Iraq policy Monday in a maneuver that could have implications for the conduct of the war and for next year's elections.

Both parties immediately moved to gain political advantage from the impasse.

SENATE ROLL CALL: How they voted

Democrats said Republicans are trying to muzzle growing public opposition to the war in Iraq. "They are not permitting debate on the most pressing issue facing America," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Republicans accused Democrats of trying to unfairly limit the debate on Iraq by refusing to agree on certain ground rules. "We're not trying to stop this debate," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky. "We're trying to structure it in a way that's fair to competing voices."

The high political stakes were evident in hours of negotiations over three non-binding but politically significant resolutions:

· One opposes the president's plan to increase troop numbers in Iraq.

· A third opposes cutting funds for troops.

Democrats needed 60 votes to begin debating the resolution opposing the troop increase but could muster only 49. All three Republican co-sponsors of the resolution opposed it in the 49-47 vote. The only Republicans voting for that resolution were Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Susan Collins of Maine, both of whom face potentially difficult re-election bids next year.

McConnell said he's willing to allow a vote on that resolution provided he wins two concessions: a requirement that it get 60 votes to pass, and a vote on the resolution opposing cuts in funding for troops. That resolution is sponsored by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H.

Reid objected because McConnell's demands set up the possibility that the Senate would have been on record as opposing cuts in funding for the troops, but not the president's policy.

That would "divert attention" from a Senate vote on the troop buildup, Reid said.

Democrats want to keep the focus on Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq by 21,500 "to demonstrate to him that his policy has little or no support," Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., said.

Supporters of Bush's plan said a Senate vote against it could undercut America's last chance for preventing a catastrophic implosion in Iraq. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who calls himself an "independent Democrat," sided with Republicans to forestall debate on the resolution of disapproval. "Its passage would compromise America's security," he said.

Reid vowed that Democrats will find other ways to oppose the president's policies. "You can run, but you can't hide," he said. "We are going to debate Iraq."

Sens. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., Mary Landrieu, D-La., Mel Martinez, R-Fla., and John McCain, R-Ariz., did not vote.

G.O.P. Senators Thwart Debate On Iraq Policy (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5 — Republicans on Monday blocked Senate debate on a bipartisan resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq, leaving in doubt whether the Senate would render a judgment on what lawmakers of both parties described as the paramount issue of the day.

The decision short-circuited what had been building as the first major Congressional challenge to President Bush over his handling of the war since Democrats took control of Congress last month, and left each party blaming the other for frustrating debate on a topic that is likely to influence the 2008 presidential and Congressional races.

At issue is a compromise resolution drawn up chiefly by Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, that says the Senate disagrees with President Bush's plan to build up troops and calls for American forces to be kept out of sectarian violence in Iraq.

The deadlock came after Democrats refused a proposal by Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, that would have cleared the way for a floor fight on the Warner resolution in return for votes on two competing Republican alternatives that were more supportive of the president.

One of those alternatives, by Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire, would declare that Congress should not cut off any funds for forces in the field. That vote was seen as problematic for Democrats because many of them opposed any move to curtail spending, raising the prospect that it could have attracted the broadest support in the Senate.

The procedural vote, which divided mostly along party lines, left the Democratic leadership 11 votes short of the 60 needed to begin debate on the bipartisan resolution. Forty-seven Democrats and two Republicans voted to open debate on the resolution; 45 Republicans and one independent were opposed.

The Republicans run a risk with their resistance in the event Democrats are able to persuade the public that Mr. Bush's allies are stonewalling in the Senate and shielding the president from criticism over an unpopular war. But their show of unity, with war critics including Mr. Warner of Virginia and Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska, siding with the leadership, lent some credibility to Republican claims that Democrats were being unfair. "I am confident that somehow this matter will be worked out," Mr. Warner said.

But Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, said that "time was tenuous" and that he would not guarantee that Democrats would try again to bring up the resolution. He did promise that there would be more clashes over Iraq policy as the Senate turned to measures like the president's request for $100 billion in emergency Iraq spending.

"You can run but you can't hide," Mr. Reid told his Republican colleagues on the floor. "We are going to debate Iraq."

The results left the future of the Iraq fight unsettled, though Senate leaders indicated that they would continue to negotiate over ways to restart the debate. Lawmakers on all sides of the issue said they anticipated that the Senate would ultimately approve a resolution of some kind because of intense public interest in the issue. Mr. Reid changed his vote and sided with Republicans at the end, a procedural move to allow him the option to reopen the issue.

Still, as they jousted over the terms of debate, senators provided a taste of what a floor fight over the resolution would look like as they traded tough words about the meaning of a resolution challenging Mr. Bush and what would happen if Congress remained silent.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, the independent who sided with Republicans in agreeing not to take up the resolution, called the proposal "a resolution of irresolution," saying it criticized the president's plan but did nothing concrete to stop it. He goaded colleagues who opposed the buildup to take more definitive action if that was their view. "Have the courage of your convictions to accept the consequences of your convictions," he said.

Senator Ben Nelson of Nebraska, a Democratic co-author of the resolution who typically promotes comity in the Senate, accused Republicans of stalling. "If not now, when?" he said. "If not now, do we wait for more troops to die before we oppose the president's plan?"

In addition to the resolution introduced by Mr. Gregg, declaring that Congress should not cut off financing for forces in Iraq, Republican leaders had sought a Democratic commitment for a vote on another alternative, one introduced by Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona. That measure would set 11 conditions for the Iraqi government if it wanted to retain American support. The Republican approach would need 60 votes for passage.

Democrats said that the Gregg initiative was meant as a distraction and that they wanted to focus on the question of whether senators supported Mr. Bush's plan or opposed it. "We are witnessing the spectacle of a White House and Republican senators unwilling even to engage in a debate on a war that claims at least one American life every day and at least $2.5 billion dollars a week," said Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat.

Some Republicans admitted that they were unsure how long the unity would last and whether Republicans could continue to make a case against the resolution on procedural grounds. And two Republicans facing re-election in 2008, Senators Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota, joined Democrats in voting to begin the debate.

Democrats tried to immediately pounce on the vote, with Mr. Reid saying Republicans had given Mr. Bush the green light to begin his buildup. They also warned of political consequences for Republicans given public frustration with the war.

"Senator McConnell led his Republican troops off the cliff," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

The White House welcomed the Senate vote. "All sides have a right to be heard in this debate, and we support Senator McConnell's and the Republicans' right to be able to offer the amendments they want to offer," said a spokeswoman, Dana Perino.

Senator John Sununu, a Republican of New Hampshire who is also up for re-election next year, acknowledged that voters were likely to be unhappy with the procedural wrangling over an issue as grave as Iraq.

Mr. Sununu, who sided with Republicans, but declined to say whether he would ultimately vote to oppose the Iraq plan, said, "It may come as a surprise to my colleagues, but most voting members of the American public think that the Senate spends all too much time talking and not enough time casting votes."

GOP Stalls Debate On Troop Increase (WP)

A long-awaited Senate showdown on the war in Iraq was shut down before it even started yesterday, when nearly all Republicans voted to stop the Senate from considering a resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send 21,500 additional combat troops into battle.

A day of posturing, finger-pointing and backroom wrangling came to nothing when Democratic and Republican leaders could not reach agreement on which nonbinding resolutions would be debated and allowed to come to a vote. The Senate's 49 to 47 vote last night to proceed to debate on Bush's new war policy fell 11 votes short of the 60 needed to break the logjam. Just two Republicans, Norm Coleman (Minn.) and Susan Collins (Maine), voted with the Democrats to proceed with the debate. Both are considered among the most vulnerable senators standing for reelection in 2008.

Republicans insisted that the impasse will soon be broken. But the leaders of the two parties appeared to be far from a compromise last night, and the White House has worked hard to block action on a resolution disapproving of the president's decision to boost troop levels.

"What you just saw was Republicans giving the president the green light to escalate in Iraq," Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said after the vote. Reid contended that Republicans "are trying to avoid a debate on this matter."

Republicans said they have no desire to avoid a debate, asserting that they simply want a fair hearing on their proposals.

"We are ready and anxious to have this debate this week," said Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.).

Reid and McConnell were expected to resume negotiations today after conferring with lawmakers. With the tremendous national interest and media buildup to this week's confrontation, it would be extraordinary if the two sides did not reach an agreement on ground rules. But regardless of the outcome of the talks, Congress is certain to be consumed with Iraq in the months ahead.

A huge budget bill for the remainder of the current fiscal year comes before the Senate tomorrow, and Reid promised war amendments to that debate. Bush has requested $245 billion in funding for the war, to cover this year and next year, and that legislation is certain to become a magnet for Iraq concerns.

Next week, the Democratic-led House is expected to move forward with its version of the nonbinding resolutions stuck in the Senate.

"You can run, but you can't hide," Reid said. "We are going to debate Iraq."

At issue are four separate measures. The main resolution, worked out by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) and Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), would put the Senate on record as opposing the additional troop deployment while calling for a diplomatic initiative to settle the conflict. It would oppose a cutoff of funds for troops in the field of battle.

The Republican leadership's alternative, drafted by John McCain (R-Ariz.), Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) and Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), would establish tough new benchmarks for the Iraqi government to achieve but would not oppose the planned deployment.

Two other versions appear at the heart of the impasse. The first, drafted by Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), would staunchly back the White House and the president's decision to boost troop strength in Iraq. It recognizes the power of the president to deploy troops and the "responsibility" of Congress to fund them -- before stating that "Congress should not take any action that will endanger United States military forces in the field, including the elimination or reduction of funds."

The other proposed resolution, hastily written by Democrats, would simply oppose Bush's plan and insist that all troops are properly protected with body armor and other material.

Gregg appeared to struggle to define the purpose of his proposal, insisting at one point that it is vital to protecting U.S. troops but then acknowledging that none of the resolutions under consideration would have any impact. He added that he may offer his language in binding legislative form during the upcoming debate on war spending.

The Democratic leadership gave Republicans a choice: Allow all four versions to come to a vote, with a simple majority needed for passing any of them, or debate and vote on the Warner and McCain resolutions, with both needing 60 votes to pass.

McConnell wanted all four resolutions to meet a 60-vote threshold, for a simple reason: Both Democrats and Republicans think the only measure that could attract 60 votes is Gregg's, because Democrats would be concerned about the political ramifications of appearing to take action that might harm troops in battle.

"If Republicans cannot swallow the thin soup of the Warner resolution, how are they going to stomach a real debate on Iraq?" asked Senate Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.).

Republicans struck a less combative tone. Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (Miss.) dismissed Democratic charges as "a bunch of show and tell," and McConnell called the dispute nothing more than "a bump in the road."

The White House worked closely with Senate Republican leaders on strategy while conducting an aggressive outreach that involved assurances from military leaders to wary GOP senators, in addition to personal interventions by Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0128371

On Friday, Republican senators met with Bush on a variety of issues, including Iraq. The president walked the lawmakers through his reasoning for the troop increase and asked for their support.

"He wanted us to clearly understand this was not just, he woke up on Thursday and decided this is what he was going to do," said Sen. Lisa Murkowski (Alaska), who has been critical of the escalation but is undecided on the resolutions. Murkowski also met with Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new U.S. commander in Iraq.

The White House gave a measured response to yesterday's vote. "All sides have a right to be heard in this debate, and we support Senator McConnell's and the Republicans' right to be able to offer the amendments they want to offer," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino.

Sen. John Cornyn, a Texas Republican who helped to rally his colleagues against moving ahead, said the vote was partly symbolic. "This is more of the principle that we're going to be a relevant minority and assert our rights to a fair process," he said. "They were either going to establish that they could roll us or that we'd be relevant in the process."

But Democrats believe Republicans may be losing politically, by defying what they perceive as a growing public desire for a robust war debate. Some Democratic senators were surprised that two Republican allies of Warner -- Collins and Coleman -- parted ways with their caucus and with Warner himself on the procedural vote.

After the vote, Collins issued a statement saying: "Since I returned from my third visit to Iraq in December, I have been convinced that it would be a mistake to send additional troops to Iraq. I believe that this is one of the most important issues facing our nation and that it is important for the Senate to go on record in opposition to the president's plan."

Collins continued: "It is my hope that the leadership will soon work out an agreement that will allow us to have a vote as soon as possible."

According to one senior Democratic aide, Reid left the Capitol last night confident that he is holding a winning hand. Negotiations between party leaders are expected to continue today, and Reid promised that the Senate will return to Iraq over and over until Democrats get a clean vote.

"Today, Senator McConnell led his Republican troops off a cliff," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the primary architect of the Democrats' takeover of the Senate in November.

Senate GOP Blocks Iraq Resolution (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

Senate Republicans yesterday blocked a resolution that would have condemned President Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq.

On a 49-47 vote that largely followed partisan lines, Democrats fell 11 "ayes" short of the 60 needed to bring about a vote on the resolution, which is nonbinding but is widely viewed as a declaration of no confidence in the continued mission of the Iraq war and Mr. Bush's handling of it.

Among those who voted against last night's motion was Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia, who wrote the resolution but joined other Republicans in opposition to holding a vote because the new Democratic majority is not allowing votes on other war resolutions.

Only two Republicans -- Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota -- backed voting on the resolution, and there was opposition from only two members of the Democratic caucus -- independent Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and, in a parliamentary maneuver that gives him the right to bring the resolution back up for debate, Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

Mr. Lieberman voted "no" because, he said, the resolution is meaningless.

"This resolution is not about Congress taking responsibility," said Mr. Lieberman, who was among the broad, bipartisan majority in Congress who in 2002 voted to go to war. "It is the opposite. It is a resolution of irresolution."

Before and after the vote, Democrats accused Republicans of trying to dodge a debate on the increasingly unpopular war.

"You can run, but you can't hide," declared Mr. Reid, a 2002 war supporter. "We are going to debate Iraq."

He promised that the resolution would resurface again during debates and votes on other matters.

Last night's "cloture motion," which Democrats supported, was a parliamentary procedure to end debate so that a final vote can be taken. Republicans accused Mr. Reid of restricting debate on the Iraq war.

"Senate Republicans are ready to proceed with a full and open debate on the president's strategy in Iraq," Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, said after the vote. "But we want a full debate on all the various resolutions, not just one that was handpicked by the Democratic leadership."

Minority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky said Republicans will not allow a vote on the Warner resolution unless it is accompanied by at least two others.

DOJ_NMG_0128372

Sen. Judd Gregg of New Hampshire has a resolution that promises not to cut funding for the war. Sen. John McCain also has a resolution in support of Mr. Bush's "surge" plan, but also setting benchmarks for Iraqi self-governance.

Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, called Mr. Reid's squelching of resolutions "an effort to short-circuit debate."

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, said a vote on cutting funds is not necessary.

"We don't want to withhold funds from the troops in the field," he said, referring to nonbinding resolution. "We want to change this policy."

But even as the rhetoric over the resolution escalated yesterday, there was agreement from all sides that the nonbinding resolution bore no legal consequences. While it condemns Mr. Bush's plan to increase troop levels, it doesn't withhold any money for doing so.

"The resolution before us, its sponsors concede, will not stop the new strategy from going forward," Mr. Lieberman said. "Instead, its sponsors say it will send a message of rebuke from the Senate to the president, from one end of Pennsylvania Avenue to the other. But there is a world beyond Pennsylvania Avenue that is watching and listening."

Sen. Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican, said the resolution was all "sound and fury ..."

"Signifying nothing," interrupted Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, who was among the 23 senators who voted against war in 2002.

But, Mr. Lieberman warned yesterday, the nonbinding resolution could have far-reaching implications abroad.

"For the Senate to take up a symbolic vote of no confidence on the eve of a decisive battle is unprecedented, but it is not inconsequential," he said. "It is an act which I fear will discourage our troops, hearten our enemies and showcase our disunity."

Mr. Lieberman chided the Democrats with whom he still caucuses for pushing a toothless resolution.

"If you believe that this new strategy is flawed or that our cause is hopeless in Iraq, then you should vote to stop it," he said. "Vote to cut off funds. Vote for a binding timeline for American withdrawal. If that is where your convictions lie, then have the courage of your convictions to accept the consequences of your convictions. That would be a resolution."

Four senators did not vote -- Republicans Mr. McCain and Mel Martinez of Florida and Democrats Tim Johnson of South Dakota and Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana.

Senate Debate On Iraq Stalls (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - Republicans blocked the Senate from beginning debate Monday on the Iraq war, a move that's expected to delay but not prevent a vote on a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's planned buildup of 21,500 troops.

The 49-47 procedural vote fell well short of the 60 votes that the Democrats needed to move to debate under Senate rules.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said Republicans were prepared to begin debate this week if Democrats agreed to allow debate on a proposal by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H. His resolution takes no position on the troop buildup but rejects the notion of cutting off money for ground operations. "There's not a single Republican senator seeking to avoid this debate," McConnell said.

Democrats shot back that they'll go beyond nonbinding resolutions against the troop buildup in the months ahead, including efforts to attach strings to war appropriations.

"You can run but you can't hide," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "They can maybe stop us temporarily from debating the escalation. They're not going to stop us from debating Iraq."

Democratic leaders had hoped to confine debate this week to two measures, one a bipartisan resolution to oppose the buildup led by Sens. John Warner, R-Va., and Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, D-Mich., the other a resolution by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., that supports the president.

Republicans say Democrats are afraid that many in their own caucus would sign on to Gregg's plan. Such a vote might reveal Democrats' divisions over the idea of cutting off money for troops. It also might be the only resolution that can pass, if the Warner-Levin plan falls short of the 60-vote threshold needed to avoid a filibuster.

Democrats accused Republicans of teaming up with the White House to derail a debate that could embarrass the administration. They said the purpose of Gregg's plan was to muddy the waters and predicted that Republicans would keep making additional demands if they won on this one.

"Iraq dominates our national life. It's on the mind of tens of millions of Americans," said Joseph Biden, D-Del., the Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman. Not voting on what course to pursue "would be a total forfeiture of our responsibility," he said.

Senate Republican Whip Trent Lott of Mississippi said, "This is all show and tell about nothing, because it's not binding. Let's stop questioning each other's motives. Let's work this out. This is all a whole lot of sound and fury signifying nothing, because the real debate will come on the supplemental or future appropriations" legislation.

The showdown over war powers came as a budget deadline approaches that also could force the war debate to be postponed. The Senate must pass a continuing budget resolution by Feb. 15 to avoid a federal government shutdown, because Republicans failed last year to pass spending bills for the current fiscal year.

While leaders were confident that a shutdown would be averted, they acknowledged that they'd probably need to put aside the war debate if it spills into next week. The week after that, Congress is in recess for Presidents Day.

Senate Majority Whip Richard Durbin, D-Ill., accused McConnell of trying to run out the clock until March.

"Senator McConnell is not new to the Senate," Durbin said. "If he can delay this matter for three days or four days, we'll reach a point where we can't reach it before the presidential break recess. That's their strategy."

Democrats To Launch PR Blitz On Iraq Vote (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, February 6, 2007

Following Republicans' successful filibuster of a resolution opposing President Bush's handling of the Iraq War, Senate Democrats are launching a national public relations campaign aimed at tying GOP moderates and incumbents facing difficult 2008 re-election races to Bush in the public's mind, Democratic leadership aides said Monday.

As expected, Reid failed Monday to overcome the GOP filibuster. However, the final vote was something of a surprise, with 49 Members — including GOP Sens. Susan Collins (Maine) and Norm Coleman (Minn.) — voting to begin debate. Sen. Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.) joined 46 Republicans in filibustering the bill.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said a vote against beginning debate was a "green light to George Bush to continue down the same failed course. A no vote is an endorsement of escalation. ... We must heed the results of the November elections and the wishes of the American people. We must change course. That starts with this next vote."

With neither Reid nor Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) inclined to give in on the issue, the Senate likely will remain at a standstill at least until Wednesday when Reid has said he will take up a continuing resolution to fund the government through fiscal 2007.

The defections of Collins and Coleman could represent a major setback for McConnell, who, just a few hours before, had confidently predicted at a press conference that all 49 Republicans would vote to block the debate. A Democratic aide said Democrats had not targeted either lawmaker prior to the vote, adding, "We're not going to now, either."

Hoping to increase defections, a senior leadership aide said Reid is closely coordinating his counteroffensive with other national leaders and Democratic Party organs, including Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the Democratic National Committee, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and the 50 state-party chairmen.

Specifically, this aide said, Democrats will look to cast the filibuster not only as a blocking tactic against debating the Iraq War, but also as an endorsement of Bush's policies.

Reid lambasted Republicans following the vote Monday evening, arguing that "the minority can't rubber-stamp the White House so they've decided to stamp out debate," while DSCC Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) warned that "Sen. McConnell today led his troops off a cliff ... it was lack of debate that got us in to this huge mess."

Likewise, Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) warned that "these [GOP] Senators will have to answer for their votes." Democrats will target both the 20 Members up for re-election in 2008 as well as Republicans like Sen. Olympia Snowe (Maine) who has backed a resolution opposing the troop "surge" proposal but who voted to filibuster the start of the debate, Democrats said.

A Senate Democratic aide said Pelosi has arranged to have Members use their one-minute morning speeches today to criticize Republican opposition to the resolution, and that Reid and the DSCC will be working with Democratic Party leaders in states of vulnerable Republican incumbents.

Additionally, leaders in the Senate are pushing their members to "amplify the issue" by doing radio and television interviews in their home states, while Reid and other leaders are working with the party's network of independent blogs, one source said.

And, although neither Reid's operation nor the DSCC is planning to delve into the paid media world at this point, one source noted that the activist group VoteVets ran an ad opposing the war during the Super Bowl and that MoveOn.org also is expected to play a role in the debate.

The Upshot Of The Debate: No Debate (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0128374

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

Perhaps too much was expected of an organization that began its "Morning Business" yesterday at 2 in the afternoon.

Still, the U.S. Senate set a new standard for procrastination last night when lawmakers decided, after nearly four years of war in Iraq, that they were not quite ready to have a debate about the conflict. Among those who voted against having this modest discussion was Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), the sponsor of the resolution that was to be debated.

Like arms negotiators in years past bickering about the shape of the table, the senators dedicated themselves to fighting about the terms of the debate. They spent the better part of an hour just quibbling over the speaking order.

"I'd like to inquire: At what point can other senators speak?" Warner queried.

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) asked that "I have 10 minutes to be followed by the time that Senator Byrd has."

But Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) wanted to give an hour-long speech before Lott spoke.

"You want the full hour in one block?" asked the presiding officer, Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.).

"Of course!" Byrd shot back. "An hour is an hour."

Laughter rippled through the gallery. Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) smiled. "If I could suggest, to speed this up, instead of taking the five minutes Senator Durbin was going to yield to me, I would defer to let Senator Lott speak for five minutes," he offered.

The matter was resolved. Byrd took the floor and spoke for 44 minutes -- about coal mining.

Those waiting for the much-anticipated Iraq debate in the Senate will have to wait a while longer. Republican leaders, eager to avoid a public airing of views on the unpopular war, raised procedural objections. Democratic leaders, figuring that public pressure would force Republicans to capitulate, refused to meet their demand that all resolutions on the Iraq war get 60 votes to pass. And each side got tangled up in talking points as it tried to blame the other for preventing a discussion.

"We are, in effect, being denied a fair process here for this extremely important debate," Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) declared at a news conference in his office.

But this assertion of importance was quickly contradicted by McConnell's deputy, Lott, who was sitting next to him. "We're going to produce, if anything, a nonbinding resolution that has no force in fact," he said.

McConnell took his act to the Senate floor, where Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) was wielding a 30-inch pointing stick, with which he had been jabbing a poster. When he spied McConnell, Reid began to thrust the pointer in the direction of the minority leader.

"Is there anyone who believes the Senate should remain silent on the most pressing issue facing the country today?" Reid demanded. "Unfortunately, Mr. President, the answer is 'yes.' According to the Republican leader, all Republican senators will vote not to proceed."

McConnell parried Reid's thrust. "Make no mistake about it," he said. "This vote at 5 o'clock" -- the one that scuttled the Iraq debate -- "doesn't have anything whatsoever to do with scuttling the Iraq debate. We welcome the debate. . . . But the minority will insist on fair treatment."

"Fairness?" Reid sputtered. "You start throwing the 60-vote number around when you have something to hide or stall." Reid knew that, because he has thrown the 60-vote number around to block some of President Bush's judicial nominees.

The Reid tirade temporarily got McConnell off his talking points. "Let me just say there are many members on my side who would argue that we shouldn't be having this debate this week at all," he admitted. "I hope none of those watching this on C-SPAN or any people up in the gallery are confused."

Why would anybody be confused?

It was already tense in the chamber, but Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) hadn't had his turn yet. "If the Republicans in the Senate cannot swallow the thin soup of the Warner resolution, how will they ever stomach a real debate on the war in Iraq?" he taunted.

Republican leaders were having some trouble with such questions, so Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), sponsor of an Iraq resolution celebrating the troops, called a news conference. "I think we ought to have a debate," he said, "but I'm not sure we should be passing resolutions with no impact." Gregg could not explain why he made an exception for his own nonbinding resolution.

Out on the Senate floor, Warner was similarly tangled. "No matter how strongly I feel about my resolution, I shall vote with my leader," he announced, explaining why he was opposing debate on his own legislation.

A few lawmakers took the novel tack of addressing the merits of the resolutions themselves. Sen. Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.), the only member of the Democratic caucus to side with Republicans, said the Warner resolution, which objects to Bush's troop increase in Iraq, would "hearten our enemies." Quoting Abraham Lincoln at Gettysburg, Lieberman argued passionately that "what we say here is heard . . . by al-Qaeda terrorists eager for evidence that America's will is breaking."

But the argument quickly turned back to the debate about the debate. "They are trying to avoid a debate on this matter," charged Reid.

"The Republican side of the aisle is ready for this debate," vowed McConnell.

Minutes later, all but two Republicans voted against allowing the debate. And, as the hour approached 6 p.m., the Senate returned to morning business. "I'd like to speak about two issues that have been in the news lately," announced Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa). "The tax gap and the minimum-wage bill."

President Bush Sends $2.9 Trillion Spending Plan To Congress; Giuliani Takes One More Step Toward Presidential Run (CNN)

CNN THE SITUATION ROOM, February 6, 2007

WOLF BLITZER, HOST: And happening right now, what can you get for a few trillion dollars?

President Bush has his wish list. He sent it to Congress. His $2.9 trillion spending plan covering items like tax cuts and health insurance. But it's getting a chilly reception from some in Congress, with one Democrat saying it's "filled with debt and deception." The budget also requests billions more for the war in Iraq.

But money and the military might have not yet been able to stop Iraq from exploding with violence. Right now, Iraqi and U.S. military officials are stepping up their plan to try to stop that bloodshed, at least in Baghdad.

And an explorer takes yet another step toward a presidential run. Rudy Giuliani -- we're going to tell you just what he's doing right now.

I'm Wolf Blitzer.

You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

$2.9 trillion from you, with Congress' approval, of course. Today, the president unveiled his $2.9 trillion spending plan for the fiscal year 2008. It covers spending on items like health care, education, tax cuts, the war -- money that would come from the pockets of American taxpayers.

We've measured this current budget against previous government budgets and even when adjusted for the value of the dollar in the year 2000, it's the biggest budget request ever.

By comparison, in 1978, the government spent just over $1 trillion. In 1988, it spent over $1.4 trillion, and in 1998, the government spent over $1.7 trillion. Again, those dollars adjusted for the year 2000.

Joining us now for more on this presidential budget request, our White House correspondent, Suzanne Malveaux -- Suzanne.

SUZANNE MALVEAUX, CNN WHITE HOUSE CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, as you mentioned, of course, this is our money that the government is talking about spending. And it really is hard to imagine what this figure means. But if you crunch all the numbers today looking at the budget, there is really one number that stands out, and that is $800 billion, the total estimated cost of the wars in Afghanistan as well as Iraq. It will reach that level within two years or so.

Now, today, we've heard from the president. He justified the cost of the war, saying, indeed, that the country can afford these increases while, at the same time, balancing the budget.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Today we submitted a budget to the United States Congress which shows we can balancing the budget in five years without raising taxes. Our economy is strong because of good policy and because the entrepreneurial spirit is strong. By keeping taxes down, we actually generate strong revenues to the treasury.

And I appreciate Director Portman helping us devise a plan that sets priorities and, at the same time emphasizes fiscal restraint.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MALVEAUX: Now, how is he going to do all of this, Wolf?

Well, the president, as well as his top economic advisers, laying out a plan here, saying that what they're going to do is really look for savings in the tune of $95 billion over the next five years or so. They are going to together more than 140 government programs to either reduce or eliminate and they are also going to together Medicaid and Medicare.

As you know, Wolf, this is a very controversial budget, a very controversial proposal and so far the Democrats have dismissed this. We know that this battle over the budget has really just begun -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Some suggesting it's dead on arrival on Capitol Hill, but we'll see what happens in the course of the legislative process.

Suzanne, thank you.

DOJ_NMG_0128376

Some members of Congress, as Suzanne says, are either skeptical or outright blasting the president's budget and its priorities.

The House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, says she wants more details.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

REP. NANCY PELOSI (D-CA), SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE: We'll have to take a look at what's in the budget, as we have discussed before. We'll put it to some scrutiny and see what it is. The day of the blank check for the president in the war is over.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: The Senate majority leader, Harry Reid, is not holding his tongue. Today he said -- and let me quote right now -- he said: "The budget uses deception to hide a massive increase in debt and its priorities are disconnected from the needs of middle class Americans." Meanwhile, there are new developments happening right now regarding a proposed resolution opposing President Bush's troop increase in Iraq.

Let's get the very latest from our Congressional correspondent, Dana Bash -- Dana, what is the latest?

DANA BASH, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, there is intense debate going on right now on the floor of the United States Senate on Iraq. But it's not on the substance of the war, it's not over the president's plan there. Instead, it's over process, whether and how specific Iraq resolutions are even going to come up for a vote.

Now, what's going on is Republican senators, even those who oppose the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq, have united in order to make it clear that they will not vote for that unless two other Republican measures are given votes by Democrats.

Now, Democrats are getting their first real taste of what it's like to be in the majority there, with a razor thin majority. Meanwhile, they are calling this obstructionism. Republicans say it's a matter of fairness.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. HARRY REID (D-NV), MAJORITY LEADER: Their actions aren't driven by getting votes on Republican proposals. They're not being driven by votes on Republican proposals. They're driven by a desire to provide political cover.

The minority can't rubber stamp the president's policies on Iraq anymore, so they've decided to stamp out debate and let the president's actions in Iraq proceed unchecked.

SEN. MITCH MCCONNELL (R-KY), MINORITY LEADER: This vote this afternoon should not be misunderstood. This is a fairness vote. This vote this afternoon is a vote to insist that the minority have a fair process in going forward to this very important debate.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BASH: Now, it sounds like a lot of parliamentary maneuvering. But, Wolf, as you know, in the Senate, politics equals process -- Wolf.

BLITZER: What's driving these Senate Republicans right now in this debate?

BASH: Well, what's driving them, the bottom line is they're trying to prevent an embarrassing vote that repudiates the president on the war. And here's how they're doing it. Take a look. There are three resolutions that are in play right now.

First of all, one that Democrats and some Republicans support, which says explicitly the Senate disagrees with this plan to send more troops to Iraq. There's one Republican measure that supports the plan, but says that there should be benchmarks for Iraqis and another Republican measure that makes clear that funding for troops won't be cut.

So what GOP leaders want is a 60 vote threshold on all three of those measures. What the -- what's at play there behind-the-scenes is that they are doing the math and they think, really, the only thing that would pass is something that senators are loathe to vote for, and that is a cut for -- for funding for -- cutting funding for troops in Iraq.

So Democrats are saying what Republicans are trying to do is demand a filibuster. And what they also say is that Republicans are simply trying to run out the clock because, Wolf, there's a limited amount of time that they can talk about this on the floor, because there's something else that's very important that's coming, and that is the Congress, the United States Senate, has to pass a resolution that continues to fund the government. That's left over from the last Congress.

BLITZER: All right, the rules of the Senate pretty complex. We're not going to get into all of them.

Dana will be watching this story for us.

Dana Bash and Suzanne Malveaux are part of the best political team on television.

And remember, for the latest political news at any time, check out our Political Ticker at cnn.com/ticker.

Another week. Jack Cafferty standing by with The Cafferty File -- Jack, the rules in the Senate, as you well know, and a lot of our viewers know, they are mind numbing.

JACK CAFFERTY, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, this whole thing is just stupid. And I'm going to talk about it, I think, in the next hour. But in the meantime the American public made their feelings on this war pretty clear in November and these morons in the Congress so far seem to be tone deaf to what was registered at the ballot box a month or two ago.

John Edwards wants universal health care for every American, but to do it, he's calling for a tax increase. The Democratic presidential candidate is out with the first detailed health care plan offered up by a Democrat running for the White House.

Other candidates are expected to come out with their own ideas about to help solve the health care crisis in this country.

Edwards' plan, which does address the 47 million uninsured Americans, aims for universal health care coverage by 2012. It's a combination of things, his program, including requiring all businesses to provide insurance.

Edwards says he'd free up $120 billion a year to pay for his plan by abolishing President Bush's tax cuts for people who make more than $200,000 a year and by having the government collect more back taxes.

So the question is this -- can John Edwards be elected president by advocating raising taxes?

E-mail your thoughts on that to caffertyfile@cnn.com or go to cnn.com/caffertyfile.

It's all in the semantics, I suppose, Wolf, but canceling tax cuts for people who have been living with tax cuts is a tax increase for those people. So that's the way we worded it.

BLITZER: And he's about acknowledging that himself. And we're going to be speaking with him about this and the war in Iraq in the next hour here in THE SITUATION ROOM. He's down in North Carolina. But he'll be explaining his stands on all of these issues.

Thanks very much, Jack Cafferty.

Coming up, the man known as America's mayor takes another step toward running for the White House. We're going to tell you what Rudy Giuliani did today, in the past few hours. That's coming up.

Also, a very deadly day in Iraq following a horrific weekend of violence. Our Arwa Damon has a report from Baghdad. That's coming up next.

And much more on the battle in Congress over the war in Iraq. The number two Republican in the Senate, Trent Lott of Mississippi, he's standing by to join us live right here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

We'll be right back.

BLITZER: It's a badly needed boost that's coming not a moment too soon. The plan to secure Baghdad expected, expected to intensify in the coming days. U.S. military officials say they're ramping up their efforts to stop the killings and the chaos. A drumbeat of violence that unfortunately continues today.

CNN's Arwa Damon is in Baghdad with more -- Arwa.

ARWA DAMON, CNN INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, in the span of just five hours in the capital, Baghdad, more than two dozen Iraqis were killed, more than 100 wounded in a number of attacks, ranging from car bombs placed outside of automobile repair shops, car bombs once again placed on busy, crowded commercial streets and, disturbingly, even a car bomb placed near to a children's hospital.

Mortar attacks in a number of neighborhoods in the capital, some even landing next to Baghdad University. And small arms fire and drive-by shootings also targeting mainly Iraqi civilians.

All of this coming ATN is still trying to recovery from the weekend's devastating bombing, the single deadliest bombing to take place in the country since this war began, that killed over 120 Iraqis when a suicide truck bomber plowed into a busy central Baghdad marketplace. Many Iraqis amongst the civilian population and amongst the Iraqi government now increasingly critical of this new Baghdad security plan put forward by the Iraqi government, even criticizing the U.S. administration for not sending American troops to this capital faster -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Arwa Damon in Baghdad for us.

Arwa, thank you.

Meanwhile, in the race for 2008, one explorer takes yet another step in the direction of the White House. That would be Rudy Giuliani.

Today, the former mayor of New York filed a statement of candidacy with the Federal Election Commission. That, according to a Giuliani spokeswoman. Giuliani already has filed paperwork for an exploratory committee. He did that back in November.

Let's get some analysis now on what's going on from our senior political correspondent, Candy Crowley.

He filed the initial paperwork back in November. He didn't really do much immediately thereafter. But in the last two weeks, there's been a spurt of Giuliani activity. He's been to Iowa -- excuse me -- New Hampshire, South Carolina.

What's going on?

CANDY CROWLEY, SENIOR POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT: Well, you know, he is the master of the micro step, as you know. The mayor is pretty good at moving along at a very slow pace. And so what this does is it keeps us talking. I mean even the campaign itself says this is adjusting the paperwork.

DOJ_NMG_0128378

What Giuliani has done is what everybody else has already done, which is mostly when you file your exploratory papers, you also file your statement of candidacy.

So what Giuliani is doing at this point is now keeping it -- catching up with the paperwork of the others, but he's also keeping his name out there. As you know, there have been a spate of stories about is he serious, is he not serious. And these now new stories say he's doing this and he's doing that. And so he's keeping his place on the page.

BLITZER: Let's take a look at some of the latest numbers, the poll numbers, involving Rudy Giuliani. In our most recent CNN/Opinion Research Corporation poll, just like a lot of other polls, national polls, registered Republicans, Giuliani comes out with 32 percent, John McCain at 26 percent. Everybody else in single digits.

But let's take a look at some other recent polls in Iowa, in New Hampshire, among registered Republicans. Giuliani in Iowa is ahead of McCain 27 to 22 percent; Newt Gingrich down at 16 percent. And in New Hampshire, in this ARG poll, McCain has got -- he's slightly ahead, 27 percent. Romney and Giuliani basically tied, both at 20 percent. Gingrich down at 11 percent.

It's very early in the process. Name recognition is always a key factor. But he does remarkably well, Rudy Giuliani, among these registered Republicans.

CROWLEY: He really does. And you wonder once he gets out there and they begin to look at his record exactly how these Republicans will feel. I don't think it's all that surprising that he would trail in New Hampshire, the one place where Giuliani seems to be trailing McCain, because McCain has a history of being very popular in New Hampshire. Obviously, he won that over George Bush in 2000.

So, I mean what's been happening here is that people like the Giuliani name. You know, it has a cachet. He was Mr. 9/11. He was the tough mayor of New York.

Now, here's the question. Are these social conservatives, most of whom vote in the primaries, going to take a gun who is pro-gun licensing, who is pro-choice, although he says he's personally against abortion, and who is pro-Gingrich?

I mean this is the huge question here.

But as you know, Wolf, in the end, what it all gets down to is who Republicans and, for that matter, who Democrats think is actually going to win. And if they believe Rudy Giuliani is the guy that's going to beat whoever the Democratic candidate is, that's who they'll go for.

BLITZER: He may be personally against abortion as an issue, but he's always supported a woman's right in the United States to have an abortion.

CROWLEY: Absolutely. Absolutely. And that's what he says. He's been down South explaining that presentation, trying to sort of draw the sting.

But obviously, South Carolina a really important primary. And that's where these social issues come to bear the most.

BLITZER: All right, Candy, we'll watch Rudy Giuliani and all of the other presidential candidates -- and there's a lot of them out there -- with you.

CROWLEY: There are.

BLITZER: Thank you.

Still ahead, we'll have much more on Rudy Giuliani. If he officially jumps in, will his past baggage actually hurt him?

James Carville and Terry Jeffrey -- they're standing by live for today's Strategy Session.

Plus, it's the trial that could rock the White House.

Will new audiotapes of "Scooter" Libby actually help or hurt his defense?

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Our Carol Costello is monitoring the wires. She's keeping an eye on all of the video feeds coming into THE SITUATION ROOM from around the world.

She's joining us now from New York with a closer look at some other important stories making news right now -- Carol, I understand that just within the past few minutes, there has been some developments on that kidnapping case out in Missouri.

CAROL COSTELLO, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Yes, there was just a news conference held and prosecutors in St. Louis County, Missouri now have filed 71 more charges against kidnapping suspect Michael Devlin. They include kidnapping and forcible sodomy. He already faces kidnapping charges for allegedly abducting two young boys, Shawn Hornbeck and Ben Ownby, and has pleaded not guilty. Both youngsters were found and reunited with their families last month. Hornbeck had been missing four years.

Prosecutors, as I said, held a news conference just about an hour ago.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

DOJ_NMG_0128379

ROBERT MCCULLOCH, ST. LOUIS COUNTY PROSECUTOR: A little while ago, we filed a total of 71 counts against Michael Devlin. The first 18 counts involve one count of kidnapping and 17 counts of forcible sodomy relating to an abduction that occurred in January of this year.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Devlin could get life in prison if he is convicted.

The court-martial of an Army officer who refused to deploy to Iraq is underway at Fort Lewis, Washington. First Lieutenant Ehren Watada could get five years in jail if he's convicted. He says he refused to ship out because the Iraq War is illegal and immoral. An Army prosecutor says he betrayed his fellow soldiers. We'll have much more on this story in THE SITUATION ROOM in our 5:00 p.m. Eastern hour.

If you've been outside today, oh, man, is it cold, really cold. From the Northern Plains to the Northeast, a bone chilling Arctic blast has closed hundreds of schools. The mercury plunging to 38 below zero in Hallock, Minnesota. Whoo. And along with frigid temperatures, Upstate New York got two feet of snow. Amtrak had to shut down passenger train service in some areas.

Prosecutors have scored several victories in former White House aide Louis "Scooter" Libby's perjury and obstruction of justice trial. The judge says jurists can see newspaper articles on the fallout over the leaking of a CIA officer's identity. Despite defense objections, the judge also said grand jury tapes of Libby testifying about when he learned of Valerie Plame's identity will be made public after the jury hears them. Prosecutors could wrap up their case tomorrow.

BLITZER: All right, we're going to watch this week. It's an important week in that trial.

Thank you, Carol.

Our Internet reporter, Abbi Tatton, is standing by.

She's got some more details on the audiotapes of "Scooter" Libby's grand jury testimony -- Abbi.

ABBI TATTON, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, the jury in this trial has just started listening to those audiotapes just in the last hour following this morning's ruling. And they haven't been released to the public just yet. They will be.

Right now, it's the bloggers who have been credentialed for this trial who are rapidly, on their Web sites, trying to keep up of just what the jury is hearing.

After the jury has heard what could be several hours, up to eight hours of this grand jury testimony recordings, they will be available for download on this, the Web site of the office of the special counsel. And this is where we've been seeing all kinds of trial exhibits appearing, from documents to video, as well. And this is where we are going to be seeing those audiotapes posted after the jury is through hearing them -- Wolf.

BLITZER: All right, we'll be watching together with you.

Thank you.

Up next, the Republicans' number two man in the United States Senate, Trent Lott.

What does he think about the president's plan to send more forces into Iraq.

And as the Senate debates a resolution on Iraq, what's the GOP's strategy?

Senator Trent Lott standing by live to join us next in THE SITUATION ROOM.

Also, the Rudy Giuliani factor.

Is he running for the White House? And how does a moderate Republican from the Northeast win the hearts and minds of conservative GOP voters?

That's coming up in our Strategy Session.

We'll be right back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Happening right now, Rudy Giuliani takes a key step toward a run for the White House. The former New York mayor filed a statement of candidacy, as it's called, with the Federal Election Commission just a little while ago. But he could face conservative opposition over his pro-abortion and gay rights stands.

Britain tells its citizens don't panic. The country's largest poultry producer is destroying thousands of turkeys to stop Europe's biggest outbreak yet of the deadly bird flu virus.

And tough words from Arnold Schwarzenegger. In a newly released audio -- set of audiotapes, the California governor calls the Democratic assembly speaker a passionless political operator. He also suggests Republican lawmakers were unrealistic about past pushing through a public works package.

I'm Wolf Blitzer. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

Let's get some more now on one of our top stories, a Senate resolution opposing President Bush's troop increase plan for Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0128380

Joining us now from Capitol Hill is the Senate minority whip, the number two Republican in the Senate, Trent Lott of Mississippi.

Senator, thanks very much for coming in.

SEN. TRENT LOTT (R-MS), MINORITY WHIP: Glad to be with you, Wolf.

BLITZER: I know you have concerns about this troop increase going forward in Iraq. But I just want you to spell out what your concerns are.

LOTT: The vote this afternoon in the Senate is just a procedural vote that will set up a process that determines how we go forward and have a full debate on this issue. And hopefully we'll have a series of votes, three or four votes, on different options, because different senators have different ideas about how we should go into the future.

Here's my concern.

First of all, these are non-binding resolutions so they don't mean anything. When we get through, we will not have bound anybody to do anything.

BLITZER: They may not mean anything, Senator, but they do send a powerful message to constituents.

And, as you know, there are 20 Republican senators who are up for reelection in 2008. And a lot of them really don't want to be on the record voting on one of these resolutions, the so-called Levin-Warner, or Warner-Levin, resolution, which opposes a troop increase.

LOTT: It also sends messages to our allies around the world and our enemies about what the United States is prepared to do here.

I have some concerns about how we're going to go forward. But here is the point. We have to change the status quo in Iraq. We can't just summarily pull out. Nobody wants that. We have to support our troops that are there or are headed there. I think, broadly, people support that.

Then, the question is: What do we do? You know, the president has a proposal, a plan. Maybe it's not, you know, a perfect plan. I don't deny that. But he -- he has made some recommendations. And we should look at that. I think we should give it a chance.

I realize it's -- it's a leap to expect things to really turn around there. But we have to move forward in a positive way. And I think this is the beginning of that process.

BLITZER: Is it -- is it -- the bottom -- the bottom line is this. Given the -- the arcane, very complex procedures in the United States Senate, what you're trying to do -- and correct me if I'm wrong -- is to avoid a formal vote, up-or-down vote, on the -- on the Warner-Levin resolution, which opposes this so-called surge the president has put forward?

LOTT: In the Senate, rightly or wrongly, over the years, it takes 60 votes out of 100, not 50, to take an action, because any one senator can stand up and say: I don't agree with this, and I'm going to filibuster it.

Then, you have to get 60 votes to cut off that senator or group of senators. So, that is the process that is under way. What will the votes be on? And, of course, any of them would probably have to have 60 votes, unless there was prior unanimous consent agreement not to do that. But it all gets too procedural.

BLITZER: Because I -- because, yesterday, when I spoke to Democratic Senator Dianne Feinstein, she -- she basically says, you're -- this is obstructor-ism. You're -- you're -- you're preventing the Senate from doing what everybody does in schools and neighborhoods around the country. They debate whether or not this policy the president has put forward is good or bad.

LOTT: Does anybody believe that we're not ready to have a full debate on this you, that you would oppose having a full debate?

The question is, what do you vote on at the end of the debate? We can work this out. And we should work it out. And I assume we will. We are going to have a debate, sooner or later, on this subject, probably more than once. So, the idea that we're trying to delay or obstruct a debate is just not credible.

The -- we do need to get an understanding of what the votes are going to be on. I think a lot of senators want to vote, showing their support for funds or the troops. I think that would have an overwhelming vote. And that is one of the things we have got to make sure we have an opportunity to vote on. BLITZER: So, what you're basically saying is, the Democrats could have their votes, as long as all the resolutions that are out there -- there are three major resolutions -- that all of them are allowed to come up for a vote?

LOTT: Well, as a matter of fact, Mitch McConnell has even agreed to a reduction.

Now, actually, we had some other senators that had some resolutions that had some good aspects to them. We had at least four or five. He has agreed to back that down to three.

Now, if the Democrats want to say, well, we want some balance, we want to add another one, maybe you could do that, too.

DOJ_NMG_0128381

But I think that -- that, once again, this is a lot of sound and fury, signifying nothing. We will get some sort of agreement how to proceed, and we will have a full debate.

BLITZER: Do you have all 49 Republicans united on this procedural...

LOTT: Republicans...

BLITZER: ... issue?

LOTT: Republicans united against a procedure that's not fair, that would cut off a legislate alternative being debated and voted on.

That's not to say that they support what the president is planning to do or what he is doing. But they want to make sure that, when we go forward, there is a fair process. How -- everybody is for that. And I think it can be worked out.

BLITZER: We have got to leave it there, Senator. Thanks very much.

LOTT: OK.

BLITZER: Good luck.

I know you understand the process. A lot of other people don't necessarily...

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: ... understand it. But you did a good job explaining it.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: Thank you.

LOTT: Thanks, Wolf.

BLITZER: Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi. There's a story happening right now.

I want to bring in Carol Costello. She's watching it.

This is what we call good news, Carol.

CAROL COSTELLO, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Oh, it's great news.

The Indianapolis Colts have arrived home. They're just getting...

COSTELLO: ... off the plane now.

And you can imagine the reception they're getting, after they just annihilated the Chicago Bears in the Super Bowl last night. They won 29-17. They're -- I expected to see jubilation and celebration. But this is a long shot of the airport.

You can see the Indianapolis Colts getting off the plane. I can't see close enough to see if the MVP, Peyton Manning, is getting off the plane right now. But, of course, he was the MVP. He received a call from President Bush earlier this morning congratulating him on a big win.

A parade is set for the city of Indianapolis at 5:00 p.m. this afternoon. And, then, after that, there will be this big celebration with fans in the RCA Dome. And, hopefully, we will have pictures from that and we can show even more celebration in Indianapolis this afternoon -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Very happy for Peyton Manning and all of the Indianapolis Colts. I know you are as well.

Carol, thank you.

Coming up: We're a year away from Super Tuesday, the day many analysts think the race for the White House actually will be set. Bill Schneider is standing. He will take a closer look at the front- loaded electoral calendar.

And, in our "Strategy Session" today: the Nader factor, among other things. Will Ralph Nader mount a run for the White House again? He had some tough words yesterday for Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton. We will tell you what he is saying.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Candidates clamoring, contentious contests -- it must be the race for the White House. There's a flurry of activity, as presidential prospects jockey for your attention.

Let's get some more from our senior political analyst, Bill Schneider -- Bill.

WILLIAM SCHNEIDER, CNN SENIOR POLITICAL ANALYST: Wolf, tired already of the 2008 presidential campaign? Here is some good news. Exactly one year from today, this could all be over.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SCHNEIDER (voice-over): February 5, 2008, could be even bigger than Super Tuesday. It could be super-duper Tuesday.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. ARLEN SPECTER (R), PENNSYLVANIA: You say super-duper?

JUDGE SAMUEL ALITO, SUPREME COURT JUSTICE NOMINEE: Right.

SPECTER: Good.

ALITO: Any sort of categorization like that.

SPECTER: I like that.

ALITO: It sort of reminds me of the size of laundry detergent in the -- in the supermarket.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

SCHNEIDER: Look at the nominating calendar, as it currently stands.

January 14, 2008, the Iowa caucuses open the race. Five days later, Nevada Democrats hold their caucuses -- January 22, the New Hampshire primary. January 29, South Carolina Democrats vote, followed by South Carolina Republicans on February 2.

Then, February 5 could be super-duper Tuesday. Right now, eight states are scheduled to hold primaries or caucuses that day. But another 12 states are considering moving their contests to February 5, including big states, like Florida, New Jersey, Michigan, and the biggest one of all, California.

February 5, super duper Tuesday, could become, essentially, a national primary. So, the campaign could start on January 14 and end just over three weeks later, with two-thirds of the Democratic delegates and over 80 percent of the Republican delegates chosen by February 5.

SEN. BARACK OBAMA (D), ILLINOIS: I'm so glad to be here in Manchester in New Hampshire.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: I want to start by thanking the people of Iowa.

SCHNEIDER: The big states want a cut of the action. But, to run in those big states, you need big money and national name recognition. Obscure contenders need not apply. But the new calendar could make Iowa and New Hampshire more important. You pull off a surprise win in one of the small states, and the news coverage propels you to victory in the big states. In 1984, Gary Hart upset Walter Mondale in New Hampshire, and then won the Florida primary a week later on sheer momentum, what President Bush's father once called the big mo'.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

SCHNEIDER: So, ironically, the best way to win a national primary may be to concentrate on Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina, and just ignore the big states -- Wolf.

BLITZER: And -- and some of those states, though -- correct me if I'm wrong -- do allow early voting.

SCHNEIDER: Yes.

In California and Florida and several other potential super-duper Tuesday states, people can start voting weeks before the primary. So, a lot of voters in those states could be casting ballots even before Iowa and New Hampshire, and long before the campaign ever gets to their states -- Wolf.

BLITZER: This is going to be very, very exciting for all of us. Thanks very much for that.

New numbers in the race for the White House top our "Political Radar" today.

Hillary Clinton comes out on top in a new poll of Iowa voters. Thirty-five percent of Democrats questioned by the American Research Group picked Senator Clinton as the Democratic presidential nominee. Eighteen percent are backing former Senator John Edwards. Fourteen percent pick Senator Barack Obama. The Iowa caucuses, of course, kick off the presidential primary season next January.

Senator Clinton also comes out on top in New Hampshire. Thirty- nine percent of the Granite State support Senator Clinton as their presidential nominee in a new American Research Group poll there. Senator Obama stands a distant second, at 19 percent, followed by former Senator Edwards at 13 percent. New Hampshire holds the first- in-the-nation primary.

And Ralph Nader says he is not -- repeat, not -- ruling out another run for the White House. The Green Party candidate told me yesterday, on "LATE EDITION," he will consider another presidential bid later this year. Nader ran for president back in '96, 2000, and 2004. Some Democrats blame Nader's 2000 bid for helping George W. Bush win the presidency over Al Gore.

They say, if Nader hadn't run, Al Gore would have won Florida and taken the White House.

Yesterday, Nader had some tough comments about Senator Clinton -- more on what he said coming up in a few minutes in our "Strategy Session."

And, as Jack Cafferty mentioned earlier this hour, John Edwards is out with a new health care plan. The Democratic presidential candidate is proposing health coverage for all Americans. The 2004 vice presidential nominee says, he would raise taxes on families making more than $200,000 a year to pay for the plan's $120-billion-a- year price tag.

I will be speaking to Senator Edwards about his controversial plan. That's coming up, right here in THE SITUATION ROOM, in the next hour. You're going to want to see that.

Let's get some more on what is going on, as far as that plan is concerned.

As with most aspects of presidential campaigns, former Senator Edwards is going online to promote his new health care plan.

Our Internet reporter, Jacki Schechner, has been examining this new proposal.

Jacki, what are you seeing?

DOJ_NMG_0128383

JACKI SCHECHNER, CNN INTERNET REPORTER: Wolf, that's right.

The whole thing is online. Edwards is the first Democratic presidential candidate to put a detailed health care plan on his Web site. You can download it, and take a closer look for yourself.

Now, in addition to the tax hike, he is talking about the principle here of shared responsibility. Basically, it would be the responsibility that -- of businesses to either provide health care or help their employees pay for it. It would be the responsibility of the government to make insurance more affordable with things like tax credits, with things like fairer premiums, or an expansion of Medicaid.

And, then, it would be your responsibility, as an individual, to make sure that you have health insurance. The Edwards campaign tells us today that they know all Americans have their own health care stories. And they are planning on discussing these online. People are going to be able to share their stories. And they will help come up with some solutions.

They say they plan on having new health-care related content on their Web site every day this week -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Jacki Schechner, Bill Schneider, and, you saw earlier, Candy Crowley, they are all part of the best political team on television.

And, for all the latest political news at any time, check out our Political Ticker, CNN.com/ticker.

And, remember, CNN is a partner with WMUR Television and "The New Hampshire Union Leader" for the very first presidential debates of the campaign season. They are on April 4 and April 5 of this year. These are the first debates in the leadoff presidential primary state of New Hampshire.

In the next hour: John Edwards says he has a prescription for universal health care coverage in the United States, but also, raising taxes on the rich, good politics or good policy? He is here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

But up next in our "Strategy Session": Is America' mayor in the race for the White House? And, if so, will moderate views on social issues sink him with conservative voters?

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Democrats are urging Republicans not to block a vote on -- on the bipartisan resolution criticizing President Bush's plan to send thousands of additional troops to Iraq.

Joining us now to discuss that and other hot political issues in our "Strategy Session," CNN political analyst and Democratic strategist James Carville and Terry Jeffrey. He's the editor at large of "Human Events."

Well, the explorer, another explorer...

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: ... Rudy Giuliani, he took another step today, a procedural step. But he seems to be stepping up his activity to run for president.

Are you convinced he is in?

JAMES CARVILLE, CNN POLITICAL ANALYST: Why wouldn't he?

Why -- why would he go to all this trouble if he weren't? And what he does is, he does one thing. And, of course, we cover it, because he's an interesting guy and a lot of people are interested in what he does. And he does another thing. And why wouldn't he take as many bites at the apple as we give him?

And I -- I have for reason to believe that he's not in, that he is going to all of this trouble, and forming all these committees, and doing all of these paperworks, and going to all these places just for the fun of it. Yes, I assume that he's in.

BLITZER: Because -- because some analysts were saying that he might be a little coy. But, in the last few weeks, he has really become very active.

TERRY JEFFREY, EDITOR, "HUMAN EVENTS": Well, basically, I think he's in, Wolf, because the race is on right now. As your last report indicated, 11 months from now, people are actually going to be going out and voting for the nominees of the party. Twelve months from now, it's likely to be all over. So, this campaign is on right now. And people are in it right now.

BLITZER: Here is the latest national, registered Republicans, CNN/Opinion Research Corporation poll: Giuliani with 32 percent, McCain at 26 percent.

But, if you take a look at registered Republicans in Iowa and New Hampshire, Giuliani is ahead in Iowa, 27-22 over McCain. He is behind McCain in New Hampshire, 27-20 percent, tied with Mitt Romney there, the former Massachusetts governor. He is doing very well among registered Republicans, even though, on many of the social issues, he's very moderate.

CARVILLE: Well, first of all, I -- I know that our network, which I dearly love, spends a lot of money on these polls. I have no idea why, because they're meaningless. And we could go...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: They're not meaning -- let me tell you why...

(CROSSTALK)

DOJ_NMG_0128384

BLITZER: ... they are not meaningless.

CARVILLE: OK. Tell me why.

BLITZER: Because -- you know this better than I do.

When -- when you're fund-raising, and you can point...

CARVILLE: Right.

BLITZER: ... to polls showing that you're doing really, really well, and you need millions of dollars, doesn't that affect the race?

(CROSSTALK)

CARVILLE: He's -- he's going to have -- no.

He is going to have a ton of money. And, then, somebody says: Look, I was at 5 percent in this poll and I was at 10 in the next one. I have doubled it.

It -- it -- it's not going to -- it doesn't mean a lot right now. Obviously, everyone has heard of Rudy Giuliani. There's -- there's hardly anybody in America -- everyone has heard of John McCain. Everyone has heard of Senator Clinton. Everyone has heard of -- of Senator Obama. All right?

So they are, obviously, going to do better, and they're going to suffocate the coverage, which is kind of a difficult thing for -- for -- for these lesser candidates. But these earlier trial heats, I don't think, are going to make a darn, because, once somebody wins Iowa, it -- it switches around. Look what Hillary did in one visit.

(CROSSTALK) BLITZER: Among registered Republicans, he is doing excellent right now, Terry. And I know that a lot of conservative Republicans, social conservatives, are not happy that he supports abortion rights, supports gay rights, gun control, affirmative action, which you would -- which you would regard as very liberal positions.

JEFFREY: Well, there's no question about it, Wolf.

I -- I -- I agree with James, in part. I think Giuliani's numbers are high now because he has national name recognition. Everybody knows who he is. And the basic persona he has is a guy who did a spectacular job on 9/11, when we had the terrorist attacks.

But, you know, there was another interesting poll, "USA Today"/Gallup poll that was released February 1, that showed -- that polled Republicans and Republican-leaning independents. And it showed that 75 percent of the people do not know Giuliani's position on marriage. Sixty-four percent of the Republicans did not know Giuliani's position on abortion.

And when they were told what they were, about 18 percent said they would never vote for him, and 25 percent said they would be less likely to vote for him.

When you narrow that down -- that was a national poll -- you narrow that down to states like Iowa and South Carolina...

BLITZER: Right.

JEFFREY: ... I think Giuliani is going to lose a lot of support when people find out where he stands.

CARVILLE: Let me tell why -- how meaningless these polls are.

Senator Clinton was 15 points down in Iowa. She made one visit. Now she is 20 points up. And -- and, I mean, and -- and we would think a lot of people were saying, well, everybody knows everything. These things are in concrete.

The -- the truth of the matter, they are going to shift a lot between now and Election Day.

BLITZER: Yesterday -- yesterday, I interviewed Ralph Nader on "LATE EDITION."

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: Now, he did not have nice words to say about Senator Clinton.

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: He also said he is leaving open the possibility he might run again...

(CROSSTALK) BLITZER: ... this time around.

CARVILLE: Right.

BLITZER: Listen to what he said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP, "LATE EDITION WITH WOLF BLITZER")

RALPH NADER, FORMER PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE: I -- I don't think she has the fortitude, actually. She's -- she's really a panderer and a flatterer. As she goes around the country, you will see more of that.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: And, certainly, if she were...

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: ... to get that Democratic nomination, I think that...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: ... will increase the possibility he might run.

CARVILLE: You know, only the American Green Party could stop Al Gore from being president.

(LAUGHTER)

CARVILLE: I mean, you have to sit there and say, here is the Green Party that has stopped the greenest candidate in the history of American politics from being president.

I -- it -- it's almost -- if he wouldn't be -- if the man would not have accomplished so much in his life, if -- if, for the first -- until 2000, one of the most influential -- I think made more contributions to American society than almost any non-president, and he's, like, turned into an old fool. And it -- it's kind of tragic to see it.

I would rather remember that -- the Ralph Nader of the -- the '60s or '70s, even the '80s and '90s, than what you see now.

JEFFREY: You know -- you know what Ralph Nader does that is getting increasingly rare in American politics? He says exactly what he thinks.

And it resonates with people. And, if he gets out there, and he tells the truth about Hillary Clinton, I know James won't like it.

CARVILLE: But...

JEFFREY: But -- and some voters may go out and vote for him, because he is speaking his mind about what he believes in.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: And you have no doubt that -- he got about 90,000 -- more than 90,000 votes in Florida. Al Gore lost by 500 or so votes.

(CROSSTALK)

CARVILLE: That's not -- that's not...

(CROSSTALK)

CARVILLE: ... no one -- again, no, that is indisputable.

But it is just so ironic that the Green Party of the United States of America is responsible for defeating Al Gore. I mean, if it wouldn't be so sad, you would just want to bust out laughing at the stupidity of the whole thing.

(CROSSTALK)

CARVILLE: I mean, it really is.

(LAUGHTER)

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: And he is thinking -- he is thinking about doing it again. But he says he is going to need more time...

CARVILLE: Right.

BLITZER: ... before he makes his decision.

We will watch what Ralph Nader does.

Guys, thanks for coming in.

CARVILLE: Thank you, Wolf. Appreciate it.

BLITZER: And still to come in our next hour: the Reverend Al Sharpton. Does he have an eye on a 2008 presidential candidacy, or does he have an eye on not running again? We are going to ask Al Sharpton: Will he be a candidate this time around?

But next: "The Cafferty File." Can John Edwards be elected president by advocating raising taxes? Jack Cafferty has your e-mail.

That's coming up next, right here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Here's a look at some of the "Hot Shots" coming in from our friends over at the Associated Press, pictures likely to be in your hometown newspapers tomorrow.

In Jakarta, Indonesia, children trek through flooded streets. Torrential rains and floods in Jakarta have already killed 25 people, left hundreds of thousands -- hundreds of thousands -- homeless.

In New Jersey, an ice-covered firefighter battles a blaze in a two-story condominium building.

In Pakistan, a child holds a toy gun at a rally for Kashmir day.

And, in Michigan, a man exits freezing cold water after taking a plunge during a polar bear challenge -- some of this hour's "Hot Shots," pictures often worth 1,000 words.

Let's go to Jack in New York.

These guys who like to jump in that cold water on freezing days, I don't get it.

JACK CAFFERTY, CNN ANCHOR: Do you understand why they would do that? There's some idiots in Brooklyn here that do that, too. They go...

DOJ_NMG_0128386

BLITZER: I don't understand it.

CAFFERTY: They go running into the ocean when it's -- you know, when it's barely capable of supporting life outside.

BLITZER: Yes.

CAFFERTY: You would never do anything like that...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: No. And I grew up in Buffalo. And I don't -- I don't like the cold. You know, I go outside now -- it's cold in Washington -- I don't like it.

CAFFERTY: Do the people in Buffalo know what became of you?

BLITZER: Some of them.

(LAUGHTER)

CAFFERTY: John Edwards, Wolf, is proposing universal health care for every American by 2012. He says he would free up the $120 billion a year he would need to pay this by abolishing President Bush's tax cuts for people who make more than $200,000 a year.

So, the question is: Can John Edwards be elected president by advocating raising taxes?

Sal in Buffalo: "I don't mind paying more taxes when it's for something that benefits Americans, like universal health care. John Edwards is my front-runner right now."

Pat in Idaho Falls: "What are the other options? One, forget about health care. Two, print more money -- i.e., borrow from China. Or, three, rob Peter to pay Paul -- i.e., juggle the books." Denise in Honolulu: "John Edwards should go back to North Carolina and put a few more additions on his mansion. He has been wrong about everything since he was elected to the Senate. Maybe, if he spent a few years learning, rather than campaigning, he would be ready for prime time."

Ed in New York: "It all depends on who Senator Edwards would like to tax. Everyone thinks universal health care is a good thing. However, if that means a bigger tax bill for the average American, then, I don't think his tax increases will be supported."

David in Ann Arbor, Michigan: "Absolutely. President Bush's tax cuts are the second biggest mistake of his presidency. I hope Edwards isn't the only Democratic hopeful with the chutzpah to go this route."

C. in Coppell, Texas: "These people are all idiots. Raise taxes? How much blood will you take from my body before I die?"

And Adam in Boyds, Maryland: "John Edwards is being very courageous in admitting that he will raise taxes. However, so was Mondale in 1984" -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Jack, thank you.

War Debate Goes To Heart Of Bush's Power (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

The Senate moved on Monday towards a historic debate on resolutions opposing President George W. Bush's troop "surge" in Iraq, the most significant sign of Congress reasserting itself against a powerful executive since the start of the war.

Even the prospect of the debate had stirred bitter exchanges, Senator John McCain accusing supporters of a resolution opposing the surge as "intellectually dishonest". John Edwards, a Democratic presidential hopeful said Congress would be guilty of "betrayal" if it did not exercise its constitutional powers to stop the war. Dianne Feinstein, a Democratic senator, charged Republicans with "obstructionism" amid weekend manoeuvres by Bush supporters to avert a vote on the issues.

The central resolution – a bipartisan text that would express disapproval of the surge – is non-binding. That has prompted some to dismiss it as inconsequential but for others it would be the first symbolic no-confidence vote in the president's handling of the Iraq war. "For the majority of Congress to resolve [that] the president is not doing the right thing is not a trivial matter in a time of war, even if it does not have a legal effect," says Cass Sunstein, a law professor at the University of Chicago.

The debate forms part of an intensifying battle over Mr Bush's exercise of executive power. Congressional concern has prompted a White House compromise over its terrorist surveillance programme. But when it comes to the conduct of the war and a more direct challenge to the commander-in-chief's power, this debate goes to the heart of the administration's philosophical view of its authority.

Mr Bush and Dick Cheney, the vice-president, have reacted to the congressional challenge with characteristic bluntness. Mr Cheney said a resolution was "not going to stop us". Mr Bush has used plainer language, arguing that he is the "decider," and invoking his constitutional authority as commander-in-chief. Last week, Senator Arlen Specter, the former Republican chairman of the Senate judiciary committee, took him on, noting Mr Bush "is not the sole decider, that the decider is a shared and joint responsibility". He said Mr Bush's expansion of power created "an atmosphere of confrontation".

His comments came during a hearing on "exercising Congress's constitutional right to end a war", initiated by Senator Russell Feingold, a Democrat and one of the most assertive critics of the war. Last week he introduced legislation to prohibit the use of funds to continue the deployment of forces in Iraq six months after the bill is enacted. “If Congress doesn’t stop this war, it’s not because it doesn’t have the power. It’s because it doesn’t have the will.”

Compared with previous occasions when Congress has asserted itself at a time of war, such as Vietnam, the political will is limited.

“The non-binding resolution seems palsied by comparison. It does not prevent the president doing anything. It is just optics and play-acting,” said Bruce Fein, a former Reagan administration official.

The most meaningful – and constitutionally clear – power that Congress has in a time of war is the direct power of the purse. In 1970, Congress set a date to cut off funds to prevent combat troops entering Cambodia. In 1973 it passed amendments stating that after August 15, 1973, no funds could be used to finance combat activities in or over Cambodia, Laos, North Vietnam and South Vietnam. In 1987 Congress cut off military assistance to the Nicaraguan Contras, and in 1988 passed legislation to restrict funding for Bosnia unless the president agreed to certain assurances.

“There are two reasons Congress is weaker now,” says Mr Fein. “There is still a post-9/11 fear factor. And they fear that if funds are not forthcoming in Iraq and it gets worse and the whole thing erupts, they will get blamed for it. What is worrisome is that Congress as an institution is becoming effete in challenging the president.”

Yet, as the death toll mounts in Iraq and the proposed budget for the war rises, dissent is building. Amid concern about whether the Senate would even get to a vote on a non-binding resolution, Ms Feinstein this weekend threatened: “If we can’t get this done, you can be sure a month or so down the pike, there’s going to be stronger legislation.”

Half Of Democratic Senators Regret Iraq Vote (POL)

By Christian Lowe And Daniel W. Reilly And Carrie Budoff

The Politico, February 6, 2007

Half of the current Democratic senators who backed President Bush's call to war in 2002 say they now regret authorizing the invasion of Iraq, according to a Politico survey.

But while nine of 18 Democrats who backed Bush now wish they had not, Republicans had fewer misgivings -- only three voiced regret. The lack of a similar GOP groundswell highlights the dilemma that some senators from the president's party face as they seek re-election amid sagging voter support for the war -- and, specifically, the president's plan to send 21,000 additional troops to Iraq.

From Maine to New Hampshire to Minnesota, potential Democratic challengers in the 2008 elections are already gearing up campaigns that will try to capitalize on the past and present congressional debates on Iraq.

"It is hard to see how Iraq does not remain a central issue," said Steve Marchand, the Democratic mayor of Portsmouth, N.H., and a potential challenger to Sen. John Sununu, R-N.H., next year.

As senators began a historic debate Monday on Bush's troop surge, a majority said they were wary of its success, with 58 telling The Politico that they opposed the plan. Yet, a core group of Republicans remained undecided on whether to express that discontent with a "yes" vote on a resolution critical of the president's plan.

The survey findings underscore the volatility of the debate at the outset of the 2008 Senate campaigns. The vote on a resolution opposing a troop boost will likely emerge as a defining moment, second only to the 2002 vote authorizing the Iraq invasion that for some senators has become the most painful episode of their public careers.

While the prospect of an up-or-down vote has left senators from across the country weighing public opinion against party loyalty and political prospects against national security policy, for more than 50 senators who held office in 2002, the Iraq war vote remains a matter of conviction.

"When I made up my mind to vote no, I went home and slept like a log," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt.

For others, the resolution is the chance to start righting a wrong. A dozen of the 100 senators surveyed by The Politico over the last week, including nine of the 18 Democrats who backed the war in 2002, said they regret their choice.

"I have apologized to my constituents and it will be something I will regret for as long as I live," said Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, who faces re-election next year and is supporting a non-binding, resolution crafted by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., and Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., that opposes Bush's troop boost.

Critics of a congressional rebuke of Bush say it is wrong-headed, the latest misstep in a four-year odyssey through the shifting sands of the Middle East with no simple resolution. At least 30 senators -- all Republicans, with the exception of Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, I-Conn. -- told The Politico that the Bush plan should be given a chance.

Many of those senators also criticize the Warner-Levin measure as a feel-good resolution that offers little concrete direction about how to steer the nation through the mounting sectarian fighting in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0128388

"The Democratic Party is making a huge mistake," said Sen. Lindsay Graham, R-S.C., also up for re-election next year. "We all embrace withdrawal at some point. But they will not talk in detail about what would happen in Iraq if we left in six months."

The senators facing the most excruciating decision in the coming days are the 20 Republicans and 12 Democrats -- particularly Sununu, Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. -- who are next in line to face voters.

On the eve of a historic Senate debate on President Bush's surge strategy for Iraq, the Politico surveyed the offices of all 100 senators to compare the senators' views on the 2002 vote to authorize the war with their most current positions on Bush's plan to boost troop levels and whether U.S. troops should begin to come home.

Of those who voted for the war in 2002, 35 senators said they do not regret their vote, while 14 now wish they had not voted for it.

On the question of Bush's new plan, the survey shows the White House faces significant opposition. Fifty-eight senators oppose it, 35 support it, and six are undecided or would not comment. Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., remains hospitalized.

Most senators -- 65 -- oppose any timetable to withdraw U.S. forces, while 23 support a timetable and 11 are undecided or would not comment. Again, this tally does not include Sen. Johnson.

Some notes on the survey: Nineteen senators were not members of Congress in 2002. Current senators who were House members in 2002 and voted on the Iraq authorization in that body are noted with an asterisk. Five senators said they would support the president's surge strategy only if certain conditions were attached.

When senators or staff members did not respond to repeated requests for comment, Politico used public statements to attempt to establish the senator's position. The three Republicans are feeling intense pressure here and in their home states, as opposition researchers catalogue their moves. Democrats in New Hampshire, Minnesota and Maine say the war -- and how their Republican senators have voted on it -- will dominate their campaign strategies.

"It will be one of the litmus test issues for Senator Sununu," said Marchand, the Portsmouth mayor. "In New Hampshire, if you look at last November, it's pretty clear that people of New Hampshire have made a statement with regard to the war in Iraq."

Sununu can't escape the question.

Reporters chase him down in the Capitol hallways, and collar him near the Senate elevators. Antiwar activists cajole him with pickets outside his Portsmouth office and television ads in the state urge him to reject the troop buildup in Iraq.

Sununu's coyness might be expected: He is considered one of the most vulnerable senators.

Five years ago, Sununu was a three-term congressman, elected to the Senate by a slim margin in a state that puts a premium on independence. As divergent as Washington is from the North Country, the wooded territory of New Hampshire that hugs the Canadian border, the political climate was far different then.

Bush, who campaigned for Sununu, enjoyed a 72 percent approval rating in the state, nearly twice what it is now. A month before the election, Sununu, like many of his colleagues, urged the passage of the war resolution, saying Saddam Hussein had shepherded the development of weapons of mass destruction.

"If we wait until Iraq succeeds in achieving these goals, we will have waited too long," Sununu said in 2002, when he voted in the House to support the move to war.

These days, Sununu's position on Iraq is hard to categorize -- and his state's electorate increasingly impatient with the war.

Sununu voices discontent with Bush's policy. "We made significant mistakes after Saddam Hussein's fall in April of 2003," Sununu wrote in a column posted on his Senate Web site last month.

But he has not backed a resolution challenging Bush's policy, and he voted against the most critical one when it came before the Foreign Relations Committee -- although even then Sununu expressed concern about the buildup.

"John Sununu is looking at what happened in New Hampshire: the decapitation of the Republicans," said Ross K. Baker, a Rutgers University political science professor who has written several books on Congress. Voters ousted the state's two congressmen, both Republicans, and turned the statehouse Democratic.

Sununu and Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., "both feel the ground is shifting under them," Baker added.

As Sununu surveys his options, at least five of his fellow Republicans have signed on to Warner's compromise resolution. All are among those up for reelection next year. Coleman, who could face a Democratic challenge from liberal radio talk show host Al Franken, has been trying to carve out a middle ground, criticizing Bush in one breath, and raising questions about a quick troop withdrawal in the next.

The first-term senator grew testy with reporters last week, ruffled at the suggestion that politics was steering his decisions.

"This is not about the election, and a lot of us … find that offensive," Coleman said. "This is about the toughest decision you make in the Senate."

He can expect the issue to dog him.

DOJ_NMG_0128389

Jessica McIntosh, spokeswoman for the Minnesota State Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party, said Iraq would "absolutely" be the centerpiece of the party's campaign against Coleman. And like Sununu and Collins, Coleman has been targeted by VoteVets, a political action committee that began a national campaign last week arguing that those who decline to oppose the president's plan "don't support the troops." The group has raised about $500,000, which it has spent in four states and the District of Columbia.

Collins, who voted for the war in 2002, also faces the likelihood of running for re-election against an antiwar candidate in a state that favored Democrats for president and governor during the last two elections. At least three potential challengers have emerged.

Collins, however, has been one of the most vocal critics of Bush's surge plan, resisting softer resolutions crafted by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., in favor of those pushed by Warner.

While she says politics has nothing to do with it, others wonder. Next year's election "certainly will be a challenge for her," said Chellie Pingree, the former president of Common Cause who got drubbed by Collins in the 2002 Senate race, and is considering another run. "Now, Collins, like a lot of Republicans, (are) looking for ways to re-craft their stand. That's the politically unpredictable part. That didn't work for everybody in this cycle."

Jonathan Martin contributed to this report.

PolarBear -- Amen. I also supported Bush and the war back in 2003. Of course, that's before history proved him to be a blatant liar and the worst president in a hundred years.

The Republicans are making a big mistake. The public wants a show of force from their Senators, they want push back to Bush and Cheney. The public understands that we can't just leave but we want the esclation to stop and we want the sabor rattling towards Iran to stop. If they block a debate on the subject they deserve the consequences.

by polarbear on 02.05.2007 at 11:03 PM

Mr. Badura, I suggest you take your argument door-to-door, like a real politician, and see how far you get. I can hear it now. "I'm here to tell you parents what to do with your children because, by God, I know what's best for you." Good luck, sir.

As Pat Benator once put it: "It's a little too little, it's a little too late...

?Congress Makes Unprecedented Move: Actually Debate Iraq War!??

Nearly forty months after Congress approved the Iraq War Resolution, they?re prepared to make a bold, unprecedented move on the congressional floor: Hold a non-binding debate over the War in Iraq!?

If you remember, back in October of 2002 our Congress signed over their powers to President Bush, which granted the Commander in Chief the almighty power to authorize military intervention in Iraq if Saddam Hussein refused to give up weapons of mass destruction. All of this was done with little debate or dissent, other than Senator Byrd?s attempt to filibuster against the resolution -- arguing the resolution amounted to a ?blank check? for the White House (his attempt was cut off on a 75 to 25 vote). "This is the Tonkin Gulf resolution all over again," Byrd said. "Let us stop, look and listen. Let us not give this president or any president unchecked power. Remember the Constitution." (Wink, Wink*: the Senate voted overwhelmingly to repeal the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution on June 24th of 1970.)

only half? ha. big surprise there...

by jeff Badura on 02.05.2007 at 10:00 PM

point of recent history- the senate voted overwhelmingly in 02 to give bush support in his pending action in Iraq, the people were behind it, the press was behind it, and there was a national consensus from top to bottom to remove Saddam, from the "Iraq liberation Act" of 98 signed by Pres. Clinton and the congress to our national feeling of resolve after 9/11, we all (80%) were for this coarse of action!! now that the rating hungry press has flipped flopped and the Dem's have amnesia and are revising history with the Bush lied People died, rush to war slogans our national fecklessness and national cowardice is showing for all the world to see !! so we lost 3000 soldiers in 4 yrs, a total less than one day of causalities during the D-day invasion of WW II lets send the troops to war and refuse them reinforcements and tell them we think the mission is a failure and we will call it supporting the troops, to hell with our promises to the Iraqi people, to the US troops who already gave there life and limb it doesn't matter we will read the polls and act accordingly ??? this is what our Dem senate has become. I'm sorry to say Bin

Laden might have been right ?? "bloody the nose of the Americans and they will run away" thank god there are GOP members in the senate still trying to do the right thing !!

C'est la vie. We certainly can't get back the lives or money wasted on this debacle in the name of oil and neoconservatism. But staying the course appears to be the default option now for both parties, regardless of any rhetoric to the contrary. President Bush was given the power to execute this war by a now semi-regretful Congress and I don't see him ordering any troop withdrawals while he's in the White House. If the Democrats seriously want to leave Iraq, then they need to read their history books on how to instigate a Watergate: Investigate every instance of possible wrong-doing on the part of President Bush and Vice President Cheney; if found, indict Vice President Cheney and force his resignation; Bush can then pardon Cheney and choose his "Gerald Ford"; then the Democrats can impeach President Bush and/or make the GOP force the President's resignation; then President "Ford" can pardon then ex-President Bush; then the Democrats can force "Jerry" to get out of Iraq. But by then, it will be 2009! So, Big Oil be praised, the acquisition of Iraqi and Iranian oil marches on. C'est la vie.

Well, myself and most of my neighbors supported President Bush at the time of the Iraq invasion. We believed he had access to intelligence, and we did not know that he and his administration were committed to this neoconservative nonsense.

Today, myself and my neighbors do not support President Bush, and regret having supported the Iraq invasion. The data we see, and the administrations' behavior indicates they lied about the WMDs, purposely exaggerating intelligence to favor what appears to be a predetermined strategy to invade. That, and the mismanagement of the war has voters frustrated, angry, and in a foul temperament.

It looks to me like the 9 Democratic Senators and 3 Republican Senators who have expressed regrets are representing their constituents.

by AH2 on 02.05.2007 at 08:23 PM

IF half the Democrats regret their original Iraq invasion vote in support of Presidebt Bush's plans IF they don't NOW go all out to defeat his latest "war" escalation (AKA expanded occupation) each should be forced to wear a sign around their necks with the old adage written on it .... A Detached Debate (WP)

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

THE ARGUMENTS on Iraq in Washington, as so often in the past, don't seem to have much to do with the realities in Baghdad. The Senate yesterday was debating -- or debating whether to debate -- a fistful of resolutions for and against President Bush's surge of U.S. troops into the capital, with the loudest voices belonging to those senators planning or contemplating a run for president or facing reelection in 2008. Nothing that has been proposed would help in any material way in Iraq; nor is any resolution likely to demoralize the troops or encourage the enemy, as some opponents claim.

Most senators seem to be aiming to position themselves against their domestic competitors -- in the case of Democrats such as Barack Obama or Joseph R. Biden Jr. -- or cover themselves with voters who are angry about the reverses in the war, in the case of Republicans such as Gordon Smith or Susan Collins. The most overtly political posture may be that of Hillary Rodham Clinton, who petulantly called on President Bush and Congress to "end this war" -- whatever that means -- before the next president takes office, presumably so that it will not trouble the administration she hopes to lead.

But what of the actual situation in Iraq? As the horrific bombings in Baghdad over the past few days have all too graphically signaled, it is rapidly getting worse. Sunni insurgents have responded to President Bush's launch of a new counterinsurgency campaign with an offensive aimed at slaughtering as many innocent Shiites as possible. The Iraqi government, meanwhile, is already failing to live up to its commitments under the counterinsurgency plan. As Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates acknowledged last week, Iraqi army units that were supposed to arrive in Baghdad by the beginning of this month have shown up with about half of their troops, which "probably isn't good enough." Just four weeks ago, senior administration officials cited the arrival or non-arrival of those troops as a critical test for the new strategy.

These events reinforce the National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq that was released last week. The unclassified summary of the document has bad news for all sides. It predicts that during the next 12 to 18 months, Iraq's "overall security situation will continue to deteriorate at rates comparable to the latter part of 2006." It is not optimistic that the surge strategy, which is aimed at providing a space for Iraqi political accords, can work: "Even if violence is diminished . . . Iraqi leaders will be hard pressed to achieve sustained political reconciliation. . . ."

Yet the estimate also concludes that coalition troops "remain an essential stabilizing element in Iraq" and predicts dire consequences if they are "withdrawn rapidly" during the next 12 to 18 months. Among those are the dissolution of the Iraqi army, open intervention by neighboring countries, and the use of Iraq by al-Qaeda for "increased attacks in and outside the country." "Massive civilian casualties and forced population displacement," says the estimate, "would be probable."

What all this suggests is that, however much Ms. Clinton or other senators might wish it, the war in Iraq will not end before the next president takes office. Mr. Bush's surge is unlikely to produce a breakthrough toward peace; in fact the violence may continue to worsen. All the same, the United States may not be able to withdraw from Iraq without triggering worse consequences than those that might arise from remaining. In short, the country needs a strategy for defending its interests in Iraq for years to come. That perspective, and not the American political calendar, is what Congress ought to be focused on.

To Help Iraq, Let It Fend For Itself (NYT)

By Edward N. Luttwak

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

Chevy Chase, Md.

THE sooner President Bush can get his extra troops for a “surge” in Iraq, the sooner he will be able to announce that all American troops are coming home because of the inevitable failure of the Iraqi government to “live up to its side of the bargain.” In fact, in the run-up to the surge proposal, it is unlikely that there was any real two-sided bargaining before Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki was induced to issue promises — particularly in terms of government troops taking on Shiite militias — that he cannot possibly fulfill. Mr. Maliki, it seems, simply agreed to whatever was asked of him, to humor the White House and retain American support for a little while longer.

For the Iraqi Army and police to disarm the Shiite militias, the prime minister would have to be a veritable Stalin or at least a Saddam Hussein, able to terrorize Iraqi soldiers and policemen into obedience. Mr. Maliki, of course, has no such authority over Iraqi soldiers or police officers; indeed he has little authority over his own 39-person cabinet, whose members mostly represent sectarian parties with militias of their own.

Actually the situation is even worse than that, because only the Kurdish militias unfailingly obey their political leaders — one is the president of Iraq no less, Jalal Talabani — while for the rest, it may be more true to say that Iraqi militias have political leaders to represent their wishes. The largest and most murderous of the Shiite militias, the Mahdi Army, which is invariably described as belonging to the truculent cleric Moktada al-Sadr, is actually divided under a bevy of local commanders, some of whom obey Mr. Sadr some of the time.

In sum, the most that Prime Minister Maliki can do is not to interfere when American troops arrest suspects and fight militias, as he has done in the past.

Nor can the Iraqi leader fulfill his other major promise: leading a new effort to reconcile the warring sects of Iraq. He is not another Gandhi, but a leader of the fiercely sectarian Dawa Party. It is very much as a militant Shiite that he speaks out; lately he has been threatening Sunni members of Parliament and accusing them of grave crimes. (It was not a coincidence that Saddam Hussein was tried, convicted and executed not for his greatest crimes, but for his 1982 reprisal killings for a failed attempt by Dawa members to assassinate him.) It would be remarkable if Mr. Maliki could even reconcile with his Shiite rivals, let alone the Sunni insurgents.

Fortunately, there is a promising, long-term policy ready and waiting for President Bush whenever he decides to call off the good old college try of his surge: disengagement. By this, I don’t mean a phased withdrawal, let alone the leap in the dark of total abandonment. Rather, it would start with a tactical change: American soldiers would no longer patrol towns and villages, conduct cordon-and-search operations, or man outposts and checkpoints. An end to these tasks would allow the greatest part of the troops in Iraq to head home, starting with overburdened reservists and National Guard units.

The remaining American forces, including ground units, would hole up within safe and mostly remote bases in Iraq — to support the elected government, deter foreign invasion, dissuade visible foreign intrusions, and strike at any large concentration of jihadis should it emerge. This would mean, contrary to most plans being considered now, that United States military personnel could not remain embedded in large numbers within the Iraqi Army and police forces. At most, the Americans would operate training programs within safe bases.

What would be the result of disengagement along these lines? First, it would not be likely to increase the violence afflicting Iraqi civilians. The total number of American troops in Iraq — even including any surge — is so small, and their linguistic skills so limited, that they have little effect on day-to-day security. Nor have they really protected Iraqis from one another. At most, the presence of American soldiers in any one place merely diverts attacks elsewhere (unless they themselves are attacked, which is a sad way indeed of reducing Iraqi casualties).

Intelligence is to counterinsurgency what firepower is to conventional warfare, and we just do not have it or the capacity to gather information on our own. Thus the sacrifices of our troops on the ground are mostly futile.

Politically, on the other hand, disengagement should actually reduce the violence. American power has been interposed between Arab Sunnis and Arab Shiites. That has relieved the Shiite majority of responsibility to such an extent that many, notably the leaders of the Mahdi Army, feel free to attack the American and British troops who are busy protecting their co-religionist civilians from Sunni insurgents. For many Arab Sunnis, on the other hand, the United States must be the enemy simply because it upholds the majority of the heretical Shiites.

Were the United States to disengage, both Arab Sunnis and Shiites would have to take responsibility for their own security (as the Kurds have doing been all along). Where these three groups are not naturally separated by geography, they would be forced to find ways to stabilize relations with each other. That would most likely involve violence as well as talks, and some forcing of civilians from their homes. But all this is happening already, and there is no saying which ethno-religious group would be most favored by a reduction of the United States footprint.

One reason for optimism on that score is that the violence itself has been separating previously mixed populations, reducing motives and opportunities for further attacks. That is how civil wars can burn themselves out.

In any case, it is time for the Iraqis to make their own history.

The War To Save The Surge (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

When political opponents tell you that to prove your seriousness you need to pursue a strategy they know is doomed to failure, shouldn't you be skeptical of their advice?

As the Senate considers a resolution to put itself on record opposing President Bush's escalation of the Iraq war through a "surge" of troops, Bush's backers are saying one thing and doing another.

They are saying that the resolution is meaningless and that true opponents of the war should prove their sincerity by cutting off funding altogether. But they are doing all they can to keep the Senate from even voting on a bipartisan anti-surge resolution that would send a powerful message to Bush that most Americans have lost faith in his bungled war policy.

If you doubt that the war's supporters would love its opponents to put all their eggs in the fund-cutoff basket, consider what it means for them to sound as if the administration's only serious foes were the likes of Dennis Kucinich and Cindy Sheehan.

"I don't think these resolutions, nonbinding resolutions, are going to accomplish anything," Sen. John Cornyn, a Texas Republican and a Bush loyalist, told Gwen Ifill on PBS's "NewsHour" last week. "If we really had the courage of our convictions," Cornyn said, the "we" referring to the war's opponents, "if people said, 'You know what? This is an immoral task we've asked our troops to do because we don't believe in the mission, we think they're going to fail.' They ought to cut off funds. But to have this sort of -- this debate without any real consequence, I just don't think is the best use of our time."

So Cornyn wants to block a vote on a supposedly unimportant anti-surge resolution, but he would be happy to entertain a debate on a funding cutoff. Does that not send a message to the war's critics?

And it's not just Cornyn. It is now a standard talking point for supporters of this war, from the editorial pages of the Wall Street Journal and the Weekly Standard to Vice President Cheney himself, to try to block any statement by Congress of its views, except through a vote to block funds for Iraq.

"The Congress has control over the purse strings," said Cheney, who on most other occasions insists upon the executive's supremacy over Congress. In an interview with CNN's Wolf Blitzer last month, Cheney added: "They have the right, obviously, if they want to cut off funding, but in terms of this effort the president has made his decision. . . . We'll continue to consult with the Congress. But the fact of the matter is, we need to get the job done."

In other words: Even if a substantial majority of Congress that includes many Republicans demonstrates a lack of confidence in the Bush-Cheney surge, the administration will feel free to ignore the other elected branch of our government -- and the more recently elected branch (remember November, anyone?) at that.

Oh, and if an anti-surge resolution were trivial, why would William Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard and one of the war's most passionate advocates, devote a long and angry editorial in the latest issue of his magazine to attacking Sen. John Warner (Va.) and other Republicans as "ignominious" for their support of an anti-surge measure? Kristol knows that every Republican vote against escalation carries special weight in speeding this war to an end. So does the Senate's Republican leadership, which used a procedural vote yesterday evening to impede the majority's will on the surge.

Supporters of Bush's war policy would love a vote on a full funding cutoff right now because they know that, at this moment, they could win it. They would love responsibility for the failures in Iraq to fall not on an administration that planned its policy so badly and carried it out so incompetently. Far better for them to heap blame on the war's opponents for "losing faith."

And they know, as the war's opponents should, that in a democracy whose constitution accords so much power to the president, turning around even a failed war policy takes time, persuasion, organizing, legislative strategizing and pressure.

The impatience of the administration's critics is entirely understandable. But it would be a shame if impatience got in the way of a sensible long-term strategy to bring America's engagement in this war to as decent an end as possible as quickly as possible -- even if not as quickly as they'd like. The anti-surge resolution is a necessary first step, which is why those who are against a genuine change in our Iraq policy are fighting so hard to stop it.

Democrats To Question Bremer On Iraq Contracts (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democrats begin their scrutiny of contracts in Iraq today by grilling the top civilian official in Iraq after the 2003 invasion.

Paul Bremer, the former head of the Coalition Provisional Authority, testifies today before the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee about the billions of dollars his agency spent in Iraq. It will be his first appearance on Capitol Hill since he left office more than two years ago.

It's all part of the examination of the Bush administration's conduct in Iraq that Democrats promised after regaining control of Congress.

The committee's chairman, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., is a longtime critic of the administration's handling of the Iraq war and reconstruction contracts. As head of the committee, Waxman has the power to force officials to testify and hand over documents, as well as to decide what the panel will investigate.

The panel also will hold hearings this week on allegations of price-gouging by contractors and mismanagement by the Department of Homeland Security.

The stakes are high. Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania and other Democrats have criticized the reconstruction effort in Iraq as wasteful, suggesting that the money would be better spent to rebuild New Orleans or improve military readiness at home.

The president's 2008 budget proposal presented to Congress on Tuesday requests $3.4 billion in reconstruction funds, but Democratic leaders have said they would closely scrutinize the administration's spending requests for Iraq.

The committee cannot directly punish wrongdoing but can refer possible criminal conduct to prosecutors, publicize the faults and propose legislation to fix the problems.

The panel's hearing today will scrutinize spending and oversight by the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA), which ruled Iraq from May 2003 to June 2004.

Audits by the United Nations and the U.S. Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction found the provisional authority under Bremer couldn't properly account for the billions of dollars it spent. Bremer has responded that he and other CPA officials did the best they could in dangerous and chaotic post-invasion Iraq.

The inspector general, Stuart Bowen, also is scheduled to testify. Two years ago, his office found that the provisional authority never released spending guidelines and relied on a questionable Iraqi bureaucracy in spending the $8.8 billion allocated under U.N. auspices. As a result, the report said, there was no assurance that the money was spent on legitimate projects.

Last week, Bowen reported to Congress that corruption and mismanagement continue to plague Iraqi ministries, and the sectarian violence there threatens to undo the rebuilding efforts.

That report also highlighted audits finding waste and mismanagement of hundreds of millions of dollars of U.S. government money, including a Baghdad police academy with serious construction defects and a State Department police training program that paid more than $48 million for a training camp that was never used but included an Olympic-size swimming pool.

House To Probe Management Of Iraq, Health Care Programs (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

Rep. Henry A. Waxman today opens a series of hearings promised by Democrats to look into Bush administration management of Iraq reconstruction efforts, homeland security projects and federal health care programs.

DOJ_NMG_0128394

Mr. Waxman, California Democrat and chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, has said the four days of hearings will examine "waste, fraud and abuse."

The hearings by the new Democratic majority are not designed to embarrass President Bush but are "just fact-finding," a committee aide said.

Witnesses will include L. Paul Bremer, former administrator of the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) in Iraq; testimony by the family of private security workers killed by a Fallujah mob in 2004; and an examination of "fraudulent, abusive or wasteful" drug pricing in Medicaid and Medicare programs.

Mr. Waxman last week conducted a hearing on charges of White House meddling in the work of government climate-change scientists. He vowed more hearings into what he described as the abuses of power and taxpayer money by the Bush administration.

White House officials say they welcome added oversight, but House Republicans said the hearings more closely resemble a botched firing squad than a fact-finding exercise.

"This is a classic example of 'ready, fire, aim' oversight," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III of Virginia, the committee's ranking Republican. He said the committee organized a "slap-and-dash" judgment instead of the methodical oversight that war and security demand.

"The main value in revisiting past mistakes is to make sure the right lessons are learned and corrective actions put in place," Mr. Davis said. "Self-righteous finger wagging and political scapegoating won't make Iraq any more secure, won't rebuild that ravaged nation and won't bring U.S. troops home any sooner."

The hearing today will delve into the administration's decisions on Iraq reconstruction. Mr. Bremer is scheduled as the first to testify and will answer charges that he "filled positions with unqualified staff who were politically connected," according to committee briefing documents.

"He will answer questions about an audit report issued in 2005 by the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction that concluded that more than $8.8 billion in cash was disbursed without adequate financial controls," the documents said.

Other officials scheduled to testify are Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the special inspector for Iraq reconstruction, and David Oliver, former CPA director of management and budget. The State Department refused a request for testimony by Timothy Carney, coordinator for economic transition in Iraq.

The hearing tomorrow will focus on four employees of security contractor Blackwater USA who were killed and mutilated by a mob in Fallujah in March 2004. Family members -- two mothers, a daughter and a wife -- are set to testify "about what they view as profiteering by Blackwater USA, including the company's alleged failure to provide armored vehicles and other critical safety equipment," the documents said.

The third day of hearings Thursday will look at the Department of Homeland Security's management of large projects, focusing on the Deepwater program to develop new Coast Guard ships and the Secure Border Initiative for high-tech border defense.

The committee Friday will explore whether more congressional oversight is needed to combat "fraudulent, abusive or wasteful" pricing by drug companies dealing with Medicare, Medicaid and other federal programs.

As New 'Cop On The Beat,' Congressman Starts Patrol (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5 — Halliburton? Tobacco executives? Vice President Dick Cheney? You've been warned.

Representative Henry A. Waxman, the California Democrat who is the new chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, is promising the sort of oversight that the Bush administration has not experienced before.

"There has been no cop on the beat," said Mr. Waxman, who accuses Congressional Republicans of having abdicated their responsibility for oversight in recent years. "And when there is no cop on the beat, criminals are more willing to engage in crimes."

Without constant policing by Congress, he said, "the bad actors feel they can get away with anything."

Returned to power when the Democrats took over Congress last month, Mr. Waxman has already made things difficult for the Bush White House. Last week, he held a televised hearing on accusations that the administration was interfering with the work of climate scientists to protect polluters.

On Tuesday, he has scheduled a hearing on reports of fraud in multibillion-dollar reconstruction projects in Iraq. The main witness will be L. Paul Bremer III, the former American civilian administrator in Baghdad, who is expected to be questioned about his role in awarding some of the most troubled contracts.

Also testifying will be Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the government's special inspector general for Iraq, whose most recent quarterly report found that the government's reconstruction program was riddled with waste and corruption.

Mr. Waxman is 5-foot-5. He has a big, toothy grin and a bushy mustache. He has none of the glitz of some of his constituents in the 30th Congressional District, which includes Beverly Hills, Malibu and Santa Monica, some of California's richest and flashiest communities.

The congressman, a 67-year-old grandfather of four, would strike no one — at least no one meeting him for the first time — as a candidate for the role of Congress's most aggressive muckraker.

But the liberal Nation magazine has called him the Democrats' Eliot Ness, and Republicans who have tangled with him say the description is apt.

"The guy is partisan," said Representative Dan Burton of Indiana, a Republican who was the oversight committee's chairman during the Clinton administration and often accused Mr. Waxman of ignoring the misdeeds of that White House, including campaign financing abuses that led to the prosecution of some Democratic fund-raisers.

"But I admire his tenacity," Mr. Burton said. "If the administration were to ask me what to expect, I would tell them to expect one of the toughest investigatory committees you've ever faced."

Other Democratic committee chairmen in the House are expected to bring fresh scrutiny to the administration, notably Representatives John D. Dingell, returning as chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, and John Conyers Jr., reinstalled as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, both from Michigan.

But Mr. Waxman may be more feared, if only because he alone among House committee chairmen can issue subpoenas without a committee vote. House rules give the chairman of his committee unusually broad power to force witnesses to testify or turn over evidence; if Mr. Waxman wants a subpoena, out it goes. And he can look into almost anything he wants. His is the main investigative committee in the House, with virtually unlimited jurisdiction over federal agencies.

Mr. Waxman acknowledged it had been difficult to figure out just where to start, but he said, "I want to concentrate on the theme of waste, fraud and abuse of taxpayer dollars."

Aside from looking at large government contractors in Iraq, Mr. Waxman said he intended to look at businesses involved in the cleanup after Hurricane Katrina.

"I don't think we've ever seen the magnitude of money that's being wasted through fraud and abuse and just pure lack of competence," he said. "There are criminal investigations going on right now about fraud, about billions of taxpayer dollars."

A Halliburton spokeswoman, Cathy G. Mann, did not address Mr. Waxman's criticisms of the company and its major subsidiary in Iraq, KBR. Ms. Mann said in a statement that Halliburton "has always been forthcoming with information regarding KBR's government contracts, and we will continue to do so."

Despite concerns at the White House and in corporate boardrooms about a blizzard of subpoenas in the first months of Democratic control in Congress, Mr. Waxman said he had no plans to issue any for now.

"I'd prefer not to," he said in an interview, insisting that he hoped to work with Republicans to press the administration to cooperate. "I am determined to try to restore some stability and bipartisanship."

Mr. Waxman noted that many of his investigative successes when Democrats had control of the House in the 1990s had not resulted from subpoenas.

He has long pushed for regulation of the tobacco industry; it was his 1994 public hearing at which executives of the nation's big cigarette makers swore under oath that they did not believe smoking was addictive. The televised hearing created momentum for the flood of litigation against the industry that followed. Those executives appeared voluntarily, Mr. Waxman pointed out. Mr. Waxman, who first entered Congress in 1974 and once described himself as a "proud, self-confessed, unapologetic liberal," said he became a muckraker with some reluctance.

Until the Republican takeover of the House in 1995, he was considered one of the ablest legislators, responsible for landmark bills on the environment and health care. In 1988, he was the chief architect of the government's first comprehensive bill on AIDS. He was a primary author of the Clean Air Act in 1990.

"The thing I love to do," Mr. Waxman said, "is legislate."

But when Republicans took control, he found another focus. "When the Republicans excluded me and other Democrats from legislating, we had to figure out something else to do," he said. "So we did our own investigations."

In recent years, Mr. Waxman and his team of Democratic investigators managed to embarrass the Bush White House repeatedly, most recently with a report that documented meetings between Karl Rove, President Bush's political adviser, and the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

A repeated target of Mr. Waxman's attention has been Vice President Cheney, both because of his ties to Halliburton, which he once ran, and Mr. Cheney's refusal to discuss the workings of his energy task force.

DOJ_NMG_0128396

Mr. Waxman has prodded other watchdog agencies, including the Government Accountability Office and the inspectors general at cabinet departments, to carry out the inquiries that he could not. Until now, that is.

With subpoena power, Mr. Waxman can demand answers from administration officials, even though he knows that may provoke lengthy court battles.

"Do they want to litigate this?" he asked. "If we're doing our constitutional duty of oversight, how can they refuse to give us information? If they withhold information and try to get away with it, I think it will be very unfortunate for them."

The Politico Interviews Bremer Prior To Testimony (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, February 6, 2007

L. Paul Bremer III, for 14 months the civilian administrator of the Coalition Provisional Authority in post-Saddam Iraq, will be the marquee witness Tuesday when House Democrats begin an intensive probing of administration spending in Iraq.

Bremer, who has said little publicly since publication of his memoir "My Year in Iraq: The Struggle to Build a Future of Hope," talked with The Politico ahead of his testimony. Some excerpts:

Q: You voluntarily agreed to testify after receiving a letter of invitation from Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee? Why?

A: I welcome the opportunity to go up and talk about it. In the letter of invitation, the committee spoke about their interest in lessons learned. Given the difficulty that we've encountered in reconstruction in Iraq, I think it's helpful to look at lessons learned. That's a good approach to have, and I look at it as a constructive opportunity for me to do that.

Q: Do you get the feeling that the committee members are genuinely inquisitive, or do you worry that this will be something of a show trial?

A: My experience with Congress is that congressmen tend to take their job seriously. It's kind of exciting to remember that this is the 110th American Congress. There are not a lot of countries in the world that can say they've been electing congress two years at a time, 110 times. There are times when they're not that way, but I think that generally congressmen try to do their job seriously, and I hope that will be what happens.

Q: You've given speeches in Pittsburgh and St. Louis and elsewhere. What's the main point you hope audiences will take away from these appearances?

A: I've been talking about the threat of Islamic terrorism. I've been involved in the war on terrorism now for more than 20 years, almost 30 years. I draw on my experience as chairman of the bipartisan National Commission on Terrorism, which reported to President Clinton in June of 2000. Our conclusions were that we face a new threat of Islamic extremists who, unlike old terrorists, intended to kill us by the hundreds and thousands if they could. It's very important in speeches to set the stage so people can understand what we're up against here in the beginning of the 21st century. I usually talk also about the situation in Iraq, the situation we encountered on the ground and how we tried to deal with it. But the important message I'm trying to get out is that much as the threat of international communism dominated American national security policy for almost half a century after World War II, we're, I think, at the beginning of a very long period where this Islamic extremism is going to be the dominant problem in American national security policy. We are really at a change point in our national security.

Q: Are you thinking decades?

A: Even perhaps generations, as it was in the Cold War.

Q: You've said you're supportive of the president's "new way forward."

A. The president sort of looked around at the various alternatives: Baker-Hamilton, some of the Democratic proposals, some of the Republican proposals. And I think he correctly concluded that the strategy which has the best chance of success -- and it's certainly a risky strategy; it's by no means sure it will succeed -- was the one he chose, which was to augment our troops there. I agree with him. I think that is the strategy which has the best chance of success.

Q: You have long written and said that there should have been more U.S. troops, sooner.

A: I felt right from the start that we were the government of Iraq and the most fundamental response of any government is to provide security for its people. We, in my view, did not have sufficient troops to do that. It was protecting the people. It was guarding pipelines and electrical power lines and patrolling the border. All of the things that needed to be done, I thought we were stretched too thin.

Q: Did the lack of attention to your early call for more troops foreshadow other problems?

A: It's easy for me to say in hindsight that we should have had more troops, although I was saying it at the time. Here's the problem: I sat in literally hundreds of hours of meetings with our generals -- in Baghdad; out in their command posts in Mosul, Tikrit, Fallujah, down in the south in Basra; back in Doha, at the Central Command advance headquarters; here in Washington; classified video links in Baghdad -- I never heard a general ask for more troops. And the president always said if they asked for more troops, he'd give them to them. I can only tell you know what I know. That's what I know.

Q: Did the president ask if they wanted more troops, or did he wait for them to ask?

A: There probably were times when he was very direct and said: If you need more troops, I'll send them to you. I remember many times when they simply said: We have enough troops to accomplish our mission.

Back On Capitol Hill, Bremer Is Facing A Cooler Reception (WP)

By Rajiv Chandrasekaran

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

The last time L. Paul Bremer testified before Congress, he was lauded as an American hero. Rep. Ander Crenshaw (R-Fla.) congratulated Bremer, who was leading the U.S. occupation authority in Iraq, for a "tremendous success." Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) commended his "energy and focus." Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) praised his "brilliant analysis."

When Bremer returns to Capitol Hill today to appear before the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, he will receive a far less effusive reception than he did in September 2003. The now-ruling Democrats plan to pounce on him for disbanding Iraq's army, firing many members of the Baath Party, hiring GOP loyalists and not fully accounting for the spending of billions of dollars in Iraqi oil revenue.

Fellow Republicans have pointed questions for the first time in public as well.

"Had Bremer made better decisions, we would be in a very different place today," said Rep. Christopher Shays (Conn.).

"Some of the key mistakes in Iraq occurred on his watch," said Rep. Darrell Issa (Calif.). "I think there will be a tendency among Republicans to look very carefully and say, 'Who is this man . . . who made decisions that we're still paying for today?' "

Two and a half years after he left Baghdad, the steel-haired viceroy who wore combat boots with his navy-blue suits has emerged as an embodiment of reconstruction policy gone awry. The Senate began debate yesterday on a resolution condemning President Bush's troop buildup, and House members will have their sights on Bremer this week as they seek to assign blame for U.S. mistakes in rebuilding Iraq.

While deep divisions remain about Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq, there is near-unanimity among Democrats and Republicans that the United States needs to roll back key political and economic decisions that Bremer's Coalition Provisional Authority made.

Bremer has become something of a bipartisan-consensus candidate among those looking for officials to hold responsible for what has occurred in Iraq, eliciting that sort of opprobrium once reserved for Donald H. Rumsfeld, who as defense secretary was a chief architect of the war. For Democrats, Bremer is a particularly juicy target because he, along with retired Gen. Tommy R. Franks and former CIA director George J. Tenet, received the Presidential Medal of Freedom from Bush, who would shower Bremer with praise on his visits to Washington.

For many Republicans, who believe they must acknowledge mistakes if they want to increase public support for continued U.S. military involvement in Iraq, defending Bremer may be too much to ask. Even senior Bush administration officials who were once effusive in their descriptions of Bremer privately point to some of his decisions as key errors.

"With some of the major issues we're dealing with today, the roots of the problem go back to the days when Iraq was under Bremer's control," said Shays.

Some who worked for Bremer in Baghdad contend that he is a scapegoat for Bush administration decisions that were out of his control.

Bremer, they note, raised concerns about the number of troops in Iraq with Bush in the summer of 2003. And, they point out, Bremer wanted to capture Moqtada al-Sadr, a Shiite cleric and militia leader, in the fall of 2003, when he had far fewer supporters and the backlash would have been much smaller, but U.S. military commanders refused to act on the request.

Indeed, Democrats and Republicans have criticized others who have shaped the U.S. presence in Iraq, chief among them Gen. George W. Casey Jr., whom GOP senators lambasted last week for not trying harder to stem sectarian violence while serving as the overall military commander in Baghdad. Some have questioned whether Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, has done enough to push the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to promote reconciliation between Sunnis and Shiites. In military and intelligence circles, veteran staffers still seethe over decisions Franks and Tenet made.

But Bremer is unique in this environment of finger-pointing because of his former visibility: For more than a year, he was the symbol of the U.S. occupation. A frequent presence in front of the cameras, Bremer was the only American to have the dictatorial powers of an occupation administrator -- the ability to enact laws with the scribble of his pen, the power to hire and fire Iraqis, the freedom to spend Iraq's oil revenue. The Americans who followed him have all been advisers to a sovereign Iraqi government.

"We spent a lot of money in Iraq with very little to show for it," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee. "I think it's important to understand, going back to the CPA period, how we got into the position we are in."

Bremer did not respond to repeated requests to comment.

The criticism of Bremer is often indirect, but the implication is clear. When Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, now the top military commander in Iraq, testified before the Senate last month, he called the occupation authority's "de-Baathification" and dissolution of Iraq's army two of the most "significant mistakes the U.S. has made to date in Iraq." Bremer made both decisions in Baghdad without extensive consultation with the State Department, the National Security Council or other U.S. government agencies.

"Disbanding the Iraqi army . . . without simultaneously announcing a stipend and pension program for those in the Army, the future plan for Iraq's defense forces, and provisions for joining those forces undoubtedly created tens of thousands of former soldiers and officers who were angry, feeling disrespected, and worried about how they would feed their families," Petraeus wrote in a response to questions submitted by the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Other less-recognized Bremer policies have also come under scrutiny in recent months, particularly his formation of the Commission on Public Integrity to ferret out government corruption. As with many of the occupation authority's decisions, it targeted a problem of the old Iraq -- the endemic graft and cronyism that existed under Saddam Hussein.

But the result has been far from what the Americans expected: The commission's chairman has mounted so many investigations that Iraqi bureaucrats are afraid to spend government money even on crucial reconstruction projects, according to U.S. government officials. It is one reason the Iraqi government was unable to disburse $10 billion that it had budgeted last year. The Bush administration wants Maliki's government to spend that money on reconstruction this year, but it is still working on ways to mute the unexpected influence of Bremer's commission.

The administration is also pushing Maliki's government to modify Bremer's de-Baathification policy and his decision to transfer authority over the process to a commission headed by a controversial former exile, Ahmed Chalabi. David Satterfield, the State Department's Iraq coordinator, told the Senate last month that the U.S. government believes changes to the de-Baathification law are "a critical element in any meaningful national reconciliation."

Bremer has acknowledged that handing responsibility for de-Baathification to Chalabi's commission was a mistake. "The error was that I left the implementation of the policy to a political body within the nascent Iraqi government, where it became a tool of politicians who applied it much more broadly than we had intended," he wrote last year. "De-Baathification should have been administered by an independent judicial body."

The chief purpose of today's hearing is to focus on the Coalition Provisional Authority's spending of Iraqi oil revenue in 2003 and 2004. Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, issued an audit stating that the CPA engaged in "less than adequate" managerial and financial control of approximately $8.8 billion given to Iraqi government ministries.

"The CPA management of Iraq's national budget process and oversight of Iraqi funds was burdened by severe inefficiencies and poor management," Bowen wrote.

Bremer fired back with a blistering letter to Bowen. He argued that the audit incorrectly assumed "Western-style budgeting and accounting procedures could be immediately and fully implemented in the midst of a war." The CPA, he wrote, accepted that its payroll system was imperfect because "it would have been dangerous for security -- ours and Iraq's -- to stop paying armed young men."

Although Bowen issued his audit in 2005, the ruling party in Congress opted not to hold a hearing on the findings. "The Republicans chose to ignore it," Waxman said. "We believe examining what occurred during the CPA period is still relevant today."

Bowen, who is scheduled to sit at the same witness table as Bremer, will contend that there were basic steps the CPA could have taken to improve oversight of how the money was spent, according to an official familiar with his plans.

Bremer may get the benefit of the doubt from Republicans with regard to the expenditure of Iraqi oil money. "Mistakes have clearly been made," said David Marin, director of the Oversight Committee's Republican staff. "But every time we talk about money being spent without appropriate internal controls, we also need to remember the importance of getting money out quickly to get Iraq up and running."

But Shays indicated that GOP committee members are inclined to take a dim view of decisions other than the expenditure of oil money, particularly the dissolution of the Iraqi army and de-Baathification.

In those cases, "it's hard to imagine a lot of members coming to his defense," one congressional GOP official said. "He's got to defend himself."

Dozens Killed As Baghdad Crackdown Nears (AP)

By Robert H. Reid

AP, February 6, 2007

Bombings and mortar attacks killed dozens across Baghdad on Monday as Iraqi troops set up new checkpoints and an Iraqi general took command — indications that the much-awaited operation to restore peace to the capital is gearing up nearly a month after it was announced.

With little sign of an end to the carnage, many Iraqis have begun complaining that the security drive has been too slow in starting, allowing extremists free rein to launch spectacular attacks that have killed nearly 1,000 in the past week.

Monday's death toll supported their frustration. At least 74 people were killed or found dead across the country — all but seven of them in Baghdad.

With so much at stake, U.S. commanders have moved methodically to plan the operation and assemble the force, eager to avoid the mistakes that accompanied two failed crackdowns last year.

The U.S. military officials said Monday they consider the operation to have been under way ever since Bush signed the order last month to start moving troops to Iraq. U.S. officers offered assurances that once the operation gets rolling, Iraqis will begin to see a difference.

"It's going to be much more than this city has ever seen and it's going to be a rolling surge," Col. Douglass Heckman, the senior adviser to the 9th Iraqi Army Division, said of the operation.

But Iraqi politicians — Shiite and Sunni alike — urged the government to speed up implementation of the plan, which President Bush announced Jan. 11. The operation would put thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops on the street to protect civilians against sectarian bombers and death squads.

In a sign that the crackdown is near, Iraqi troops manned a major new checkpoint Monday at the northern gate to Baghdad, searching cars and trucks heading to and from Sunni insurgent areas to the north. Soldiers and police said the checkpoint was set up as part of the security plan.

Elsewhere, Rahim al-Daraji, a senior official in Sadr City, said police were already moving into the capital's sprawling Shiite slum, stronghold of the notorious Mahdi Army militia.

And Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar, who will direct the operation, took charge of his still-unfinished command center Monday in a former Saddam Hussein palace located inside the American-controlled Green Zone.

Gambar, who was taken prisoner by U.S. troops in the 1991 Gulf War, will have two Iraqi deputies, one on each side of the Tigris River, which flows through the center of the capital. The city will be divided into nine districts, each with as many as 600 U.S. soldiers to back up Iraqi troops who will take the lead in the security drive.

In announcing the plan, Bush said he was sending 21,500 additional American troops mostly to Baghdad in what is widely seen as a last chance to quell the sectarian violence ravaging the capital and surrounding regions.

About 3,000 paratroopers from the 2nd Brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division arrived in Iraq in late January and were expected to begin operations in the coming days. But the last of the U.S. reinforcements are not due until May.

Monday's slaughter killed 15 people in back-to-back car bombings at a gasoline station in Sadiyah, a mostly Sunni neighborhood of southwestern Baghdad, police said. Eight people were killed when a bomb exploded in a garbage can in a Sunni enclave in central Baghdad, according to police.

Four mortar shells exploded about sundown in a Shiite part of Dora, killing seven people, police said.

The U.S. military reported the deaths of two American soldiers, both killed on Sunday north of Baghdad.

With violence roiling the capital, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has come under strong pressure from fellow Shiite politicians to speed up the operation because most of the recent victims of Baghdad attacks have been Shiites.

DOJ_NMG_0128400

They were joined in their appeal by Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashimi, who said the government needs to move fast "because people cannot tolerate ... this sort of chaos and the killing around the clock."

"I am very much interested in fact to speed up the implementation of this plan in fact," al-Hashimi told the British Broadcasting Corp. Two of his brothers and one sister were assassinated last year in separate unsolved murders.

U.S. officials believe the previous crackdowns faltered because the Iraqis were unable to bring enough of their own troops to the capital. Some units in southern Iraq refused orders to move to Baghdad.

This time, the Iraqis have promised up to 8,000 new troops, including well-trained Kurdish units from the north.

While Iraqi units have been arriving on schedule, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said last week they were at only 55 to 65 percent strength and that "probably isn't good enough."

"There is no specified time for starting the security plan, but preparations and deployment of the forces including the checkpoints inside and surrounding Baghdad has begun," Deputy Prime Minister Salam al-Zobaie told Al-Jazeera television.

Al-Zobaie, a Sunni, said the government had great hopes for the success of the security plan although the Iraqi military contribution would be "less than expected."

Public anger, especially among Shiites, has welled up since a huge truck bomb Saturday devastated the Sadriyah market in a mostly Shiite part of central Baghdad, killing 137 people. It was the fifth major bombing in less than a month against Shiite targets in Baghdad and southern Iraq.

Such attacks have discredited Iraqi security forces at a time when the government is urging people to put their trust in the army and police — rather than sectarian militias.

Under American pressure, Shiite politicians persuaded radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr to pull his Mahdi militiamen off the streets to avoid a confrontation with the Americans.

But many Shiites complain that the move effectively handed the streets to Sunni extremists before U.S. and Iraqi forces were ready to assume control.

"This delay in the implementation of the security plan is not good and has had negative consequences for Iraqis," said Falah Hassan, a spokesman for al-Sadr's movement. "We demand that the plan be executed as soon as possible because the terrorists are going too far in their vicious attacks."

In Washington, Bush said he understood that the Iraqis are eager to see improvements in security.

"We'd like to do it as quickly as possible," he said. "The success of that plan is going to depend upon the capacity and willingness of the Iraqis to do hard work. We want to help them do that work."

Much of the sectarian violence has been blamed on forces loyal to al-Sadr, a close political ally of al-Maliki.

Last weekend, two key members of al-Sadr's organization were killed, one in the southern city of Basra and another in a confrontation with U.S. troops northeast of Baghdad.

Ali Khazim, who ran al-Sadr's political organization in volatile Diyala province, was killed Sunday by American soldiers at his home 12 miles east of Baqouba, according to Saleh al-Ageili, a spokesman for the Sadr Movement's parliamentary bloc.

The spokesman said Khazim was stabbed with a bayonet.

"What has happened to Khazim is part of the series of provocative acts by the occupation forces against the Sadr movement. The occupation forces know well who are the terrorists and their whereabouts, yet they are targeting our people," al-Ageili told The Associated Press.

The U.S. military said in a statement that Iraqi troops backed by Americans had shot and killed the leader of a rogue Mahdi Army group but did not name Khazim as the victim.

The second Sadr organization official, Khalil al-Maliki, was killed by three gunmen in a drive-by shooting on Sunday in Basra.

U.S. Unit Walks 'A Fine Line' In Iraqi Capital (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 5 -- The camouflaged American soldiers, weary from hours of struggling to talk with Iraqis during a patrol in eastern Baghdad, laughed with relief after an Iraqi army major's wife met them at her door. The soldiers had no interpreter. She had a master's degree in English translation.

"Do you want to work for the Americans?" asked U.S. Army Lt. Anthony Slamar, 26. "Do you want a job as a translator?"

The woman stepped back into her darkened doorway.

"With you? No. Not with you. Do I want to die?" she said. "I am afraid of you, I'm sorry."

The American and Iraqi plan to pacify the capital rests on the assumption that U.S. troops can win the trust of a wary population by protecting civilians trapped amid sectarian warfare. Each day, U.S. soldiers go door-to-door in the city, searching bedrooms and bathrooms, cabinets and closets, for unauthorized weapons. The operations also offer a chance to cultivate Iraqis as sources of information about the violence entangling their neighborhoods.

But soldiers in a task force from the 1st Battalion, 26th Infantry Regiment, who have patrolled Baghdad for months, say that trying to gain cooperation from Iraqi civilians is a thankless struggle. They say they feel powerless to prevent the city's slide into wider war and that Iraqis seldom open up to them with detailed intelligence. Since the task force of more than 800 soldiers arrived in August, 15 of them have been killed.

Although their commanders argue otherwise, the extent of the challenge led some soldiers to express doubt in interviews that the additional 17,500 American troops slated for Baghdad can make a lasting difference.

"I don't think the infantry or pretty much anyone in the United States Army are properly trained to deal with the guerrilla tactics these guys use against us," said Spec. Jeffrey Steele, 22. "This is a policing thing, you know. It needs more investigation into how these guys work, where they're located. I don't think we can do any better."

At 7:30 a.m. Thursday, under a drizzling rain, Slamar gathered his unit in a circle in a gravel lot on their base to brief them on the day's mission. He passed around a photograph of a tire filled with explosives, a new type of roadside bomb found in the sector they patrol.

"They are filled with rifle ammunition, nails and pieces of iron to increase the intensity of the explosion and increase its fragmentation effect. Lovely," Slamar said. "Make sure you're . . . scanning, okay? Hey, now's not the . . . time to give up, all right? We've still got a long deployment ahead of us. Keep on going."

The five-Humvee convoy rumbled out of the camp gates and drove south to Qahira, a mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhood in northeastern Baghdad caught between the Shiite militias in Sadr City to the east and Sunni insurgents in Adhamiyah to the west.

The first goal was to identify potential rooftop sniper positions for a future operation. The troops, armed with M-4 assault rifles, fanned out and soon found a resident, Ahmed, to lead them into a house they wanted to inspect. When the soldiers entered, past plates of orange peels and half-eaten bread in the kitchen, nervous children came down a marble staircase in their pajamas and stood next to their barefoot mother.

"We're just in the area to secure the area, so we're visiting people," said Capt. Andrew Jasso. "There's been a lot of explosions, like on the road here, the bombs."

"No, no, no, no, okay, okay," Ahmed said, motioning toward neighboring houses. "Friend and friend and friend, okay, no problem."

"So this area is pretty good?" Jasso said, sounding dubious. A single bullet hole was visible in the wall above the stairway.

"No problem," Ahmed said.

The lack of an Arabic interpreter -- a chronic problem, the soldiers say -- made communication more difficult. But even when Americans and Iraqis can understand each other, U.S. soldiers said, many Iraqis do not speak openly because they are afraid of being perceived in their neighborhood as collaborating with the Americans.

The Iraqi army major with the English-speaking wife begged the Americans not to reveal his profession to his neighbors, and said he would be risking his life even going outside with them.

"If the people see me with you, they do this," he said, shooting an imaginary gun with his hands. "Okay? Understand? They come and kill me: 'You work with the U.S.A.' "

The American troops took some care to be polite when entering Iraqi homes. During Thursday's six-hour patrol, they handed out Iraqi newspapers and packets of gum and attracted an eager following of young children. But machine-gun-toting Americans rooting through bedrooms, inspecting weapons and demanding identification cards clearly unsettled some residents.

Inside the Iraqi major's house, Jasso tried to put the major's wife and her relatives at ease by telling stories about his two young children. She interrupted him. "Sorry, I have to ask you. Why didn't you just knock at the door? Why did you just jump in?"

A soldier explained to her that the Americans avoid standing in the street in front of houses because of the threat of snipers.

"Just trying not to give everyone a bad impression of Americans is the hardest thing," said Staff Sgt. Andrew McKay, 27. "Being courteous, being nice to the kids, being nice to the families, but still maintaining your military bearing and doing your job -- it's a fine line to walk."

Faced with an often distrustful, frightened populace, members of the task force said they doubted that adding thousands more U.S. troops would change this frustrating dynamic. One soldier, on his second tour in Iraq, said the attitude of the Iraqi civilians toward the Americans continues to deteriorate.

"Whatever new plans they come up with, it won't work out here. It's getting worse and worse," the soldier said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he worried about a reprimand from his superior officers. "I was here last time, in the beginning. Now it's totally changed. They don't even respect us anymore. They spit at us, they throw rocks at us. It wasn't like that before."

Higher-ranking officers with the task force said they see encouraging signs that cooperation with Iraqis will improve as the new security initiative in Baghdad begins.

The unit's acting commander, Maj. Clay Padgett, said the influx of U.S. troops and changes in tactics would generate more intelligence about insurgent and militia activity. He said the troops would move onto smaller bases to increase their presence in violent neighborhoods.

Within the past month, Padgett's task force has set up one office known as a joint security site, or JSS, that brings together representatives from the Iraqi police, army and coalition forces to coordinate information and operations. The new security plan calls for about 35 more such sites spread over Baghdad's nine security districts.

"When you hear the stories about soldiers who say the local Iraqis don't want us to be here, you would be amazed at the amount of tips that have come in just from us establishing inside of the JSS," Padgett said. "And because we're right there" with the Iraqi police, "we're right there inside the community. All of a sudden the community feels as though here's another window of opportunity to come up and talk to coalition forces."

Sgt. 1st Class Luis Enrique Gutierrez Rosales, 38, said most of the Iraqis he has met say they are pleased that the Americans patrol their neighborhoods. "They said they always feel safe when we're around. People stop on the road and say thank you. They say, 'If it wasn't for you, I probably wouldn't be alive,' " he said.

But some of his soldiers saw less reason to be hopeful about either their relations with the Iraqis or the troop increase. After the patrol on Thursday, Sgt. Michael Hiler, 26, stepped down from his Humvee and described the day's effort as "stupid."

"We should have pulled out a long time ago," Hiler said. "It's going to take the hand of God to change anything about what we do here, which is nothing. This country's going to fall apart sooner or later, and at this point I say, 'Good riddance.' "

Sitting on bunks while waiting for an evening patrol, a group of soldiers discussed the enemy and the latest security effort, described by Padgett as "the last best hope for Iraq."

"All these extra troops start coming into Baghdad, you'll start reducing the anti-American violence. That way, it will show quick results for the Bush administration. And that way, 'Hey, we won the war, let's get out of here,' " said Pfc. Daniel Gomez, 21, a medic. But he said of the forces opposing the Americans: "They're like the Viet Cong, they can wait it out. We're not going to be here forever, and they know that. And then we're gone, and it's all theirs."

Anti-violence Push Begins In Baghdad (WT/AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

BAGHDAD -- An Iraqi general took charge of the security operation in Baghdad yesterday as Iraqi police and soldiers manned new roadblocks -- initial steps indicating the start of the anticipated joint operation with American forces to curb sectarian bloodshed.

Stung by continuing violence, Iraqi officials urged the United States to implement the plan as quickly as possible, particularly as some militias -- which had offered the only protection in certain neighborhoods -- have disappeared from the streets.

At least 38 persons died in bomb and mortar attacks across the city yesterday, 15 of them when two car bombs blew up in quick succession as they waited to buy gasoline in southern Baghdad. Seven persons died after nightfall, when four mortar shells struck a Shi'ite neighborhood in southern Baghdad.

The command center for the joint operation, staffed by Iraqis and Americans, opened yesterday inside the fortified Green Zone next to the prime minister's office.

U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Christopher Garver said the Baghdad command center was manned but "not yet up and running."

"It'll take a few days to get things organized," he said.

A spokesman for the Sadr Movement, an important Shi'ite bloc in parliament, complained that the security crackdown has been too long in coming, leaving a security vacuum that has allowed suicide bombers to devastate several Shi'ite marketplaces over the past few weeks.

An estimated 135 persons died in a truck bombing Saturday in the Sadriyah market, the deadliest single bomb attack since the war began.

Falah Hassan, the Sadr bloc lawmaker and spokesman, said the delay "has negative consequences for the lives of the Iraqis."

"We demand that the plan be executed as soon as possible because the terrorists are going too far in their vicious attacks," Mr. Hassan said on behalf of the lawmakers loyal to renegade anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

DOJ_NMG_0128403

Two senior members of Sheik al-Sadr's political and military organization were killed outside Baghdad yesterday, a sign that leaders of the organization are being targeted by Sunni insurgents as well as U.S. and Iraqi forces.

Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashimi, also called on the United States to speed up its the deployment of extra troops, telling the British Broadcasting Corp. that he wanted the plan in place "as soon as possible, because people cannot tolerate in fact this sort of chaos and the killing around the clock."

The White House said the new strategy was going about as well as could be expected.

"This is not a problem that's going to be solved overnight," spokesman Tony Fratto said. "This plan is intended to bring long-lasting security to Baghdad. It's going to take some time to put all of the elements in place."

The security sweep will be led by Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar, who was named to the top position under pressure from the United States after it rejected Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's first choice, Lt. Gen. Mohan al-Freiji.

Gen. Gambar will have two Iraqi deputies, one on each side of the Tigris River, which splits Baghdad north to south. The city is to be divided into nine districts, and as many as 600 U.S. forces in each district are to back up Iraqi troops.

The security drive, for which President Bush has dispatched 21,500 additional American forces, was seen by many as a last chance to quell sectarian violence in and around the capital.

Two security operations over the past nine months -- Operations Together Forward I and II -- have failed to halt the violence, in part because Iraqi authorities failed to produce the number of troops promised.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said last week that Iraqi troops who arrived to augment the newly assembled Baghdad force were only at about half strength.

US Prepares For Baghdad Crackdown (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

A new command centre for US-Iraqi operations aimed at restoring security in Baghdad will be operational “within days”, US officers said on Monday, paving the way for a planned offensive in the capital.

US advisers to Iraqi forces predicted that the scale of the operations – designed to contain both Shia militias and Sunni insurgents – would be larger than previous sweeps of the capital.

However, a weekend of violence – including an explosives-rigged truck that killed at least 135 in a Baghdad market on Saturday – may undercut Shia support for the operations, particularly as many believe the US is focusing too heavily in its new offensive on Shia militias, such as the Mahdi army associated with Moqtada al-Sadr, the radical cleric.

Saturday’s attack – possibly the most deadly single bombing since the US-led 2003 invasion – could feed perceptions that Shia have become more vulnerable as their militias take a low profile for fear of a crackdown by US forces. The deaths of two Sadrist leaders at the weekend – one in a raid by the US military and another by gunmen assumed to be Sunni insurgents – may reinforce Shia perceptions that they are being unfairly -targeted.

The new Baghdad offensive will be backed by reinforcements that are part of the “surge” pledged by US President George W. Bush last month.

US troops reportedly intend to move into Baghdad neighbourhoods in greater numbers than before and establish a more lasting presence in the form of small combat outposts that will prevent insurgents and militias – once forced out of districts – from returning.

US officers have in the past suggested that the surge is intended to be a sustained, months-long effort, and Iraqis will not feel the full impact in their neighbourhoods until the late summer. Previous US offensives have often led to a short-term fall in violence, with bloodshed escalating again as forces move elsewhere.

However, supporters of the surge – both US and Iraqi – argue that a sustained period of stability may allow Iraqi state institutions to become more confident and more established on the neighbourhood level, with citizens putting their trust in government forces rather than militias or insurgents.

The deployment of additional US troops is predicated on support from the government of Nouri al-Maliki, prime minister, which is implementing its own security clampdown.

“What we’re trying to do with this reinforcement of our troops is to provide enough space so that the Iraqi government can meet certain benchmarks or certain requirements for a unity government to survive and for the country to be strong,” Mr Bush said on Monday.

U.S. Advisers Find Joint Patrols With Iraqis Don't Go As Planned (USAT)

By Jim Michaels

DOJ_NMG_0128404

USA Today, February 6, 2007

MAHMOUDIYA, Iraq — In the pre-dawn chill, 1st Lt. Seth Reimers briefed his men. A joint patrol of about 60 soldiers equally divided between Iraqi and U.S. forces would storm a compound outside of town and grab a suspected insurgent financier.

"The Iraqi army is taking the lead," Reimers, 24, explained to the U.S. troops before they climbed into idling Humvees. "We're there to support."

It didn't quite work that way. A couple hours after the briefing, the combined patrol broke through a gate surrounding a compound and burst into the main house. The American soldiers immediately took the initiative. They stormed through, searching rooms and looking for suspects. With their weapons raised to their shoulders, the Americans moved deliberately up the stairs, calling to each other as they cleared rooms.

Meanwhile, many of the Iraqi soldiers hesitated, waiting for someone to tell them what to do. They stood to the side watching the action, their weapons at their sides.

Outside, two American Apache attack helicopters clattered overhead, tracking the locations of suspects who fled across surrounding farm fields. U.S. officers kept in radio touch with the pilots and directed the search.

Capt. Ian Perry, 26, executive officer of Battery A, Task Force 2-15, said later of the Iraqi soldiers, "They hung back a little bit. That's not common. Usually they're really into it." Perry said the Iraqi troops might not have been fully briefed about the mission or the pre-dawn start may have been a little early for them.

Getting Iraqi forces trained, motivated and taking the lead in the fight against insurgents and illegal militias has been a struggle for the U.S. military.

"This is occurring slower than we originally projected," Gen. George Casey, the outgoing top U.S. commander in Iraq, acknowledged last week in congressional testimony.

A major U.S. intelligence report released last Friday said that Iraqi security forces lack the training, equipment and skills necessary to replace U.S. troops. The National Intelligence Estimate said that, if U.S. troops were withdrawn in the next 12 to 18 months, "this almost certainly would lead to a significant increase in the scale and scope of sectarian conflict in Iraq."

To improve the performance of Iraqi forces, the U.S. military is boosting the number of advisers and American units training and living with Iraqi forces, says Maj. Gen. Carter Ham, commander of a new school for training military advisers at Fort Riley, Kan.

Raids such as the one Reimers led illustrate the complexity of their mission. Even the best of Iraqi units still have trouble operating without American assistance. "In my opinion it will take three or four years" before Iraqi forces are capable of functioning without any U.S. assistance, says Sgt. Olan Aldrich, 25, part of the American advisory team here.

It's a risky mission. Since the first military and national police advisers came to Iraq in September 2004, 33 have been killed, according to the Iraqi Assistance Group, which oversees U.S. advisers. Almost half the deaths occurred in the past six months as Iraqis have played a more prominent combat role.

That has exposed advisers, as well as Iraqis, to greater dangers. "The Iraqi security forces are truly more in the lead, and the transition teams are with them," says Brig. Gen. Dana Pittard, commander of the Iraqi Assistance Group. "They're out there in harm's way constantly." There are about 5,000 American advisers in Iraq now.

Since 2004, the U.S. Army and Marines have placed about a dozen advisers with each Iraqi battalion of about 500 troops.

Reimers' unit is part of an experiment to take the partnership a step further, by placing an entire American battalion, in this case about 400 soldiers, with an Iraqi brigade of 3,000 soldiers. Col. Mike Kershaw, 45, says the move puts "more people against the problem."

The brass are watching the experiment closely. "That's the future," Pittard says. "We will see more and more of that."

Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, the No. 2 ranking U.S. commander in Iraq, says the Iraqi brigade based here, the 4th Brigade, 6th Army Division, is successful largely because of the decision to place more Americans with the unit.

Advising is not a role that comes naturally to American officers and non-commissioned officers. Advisers are told to take a back seat during operations, allowing Iraqi leaders to take charge. "We've taken officers and NCOs who for their entire time in the Army were encouraged to be aggressive," Ham says. "Now we're saying, 'Don't do that. I don't want you to lead from the front.' "

Reimers, from Ogden, Iowa, coached his Iraqi counterpart, Maj. Dhamad Shaiah al-Musawy, as the raid unfolded. Reimers and al-Musawy began questioning a suspect found in the compound. He wasn't the man they were looking for, but he might have been related.

Reimers turned to the Iraqi officer. "What do you want to do?" Reimers asked. "It's your call, brother. I recommend we detain him, but it's up to you." The Iraqi officer ordered the suspect detained.

After leaving the compound, the soldiers took off across fields in pursuit of men who had fled the compound moments before the soldiers arrived. Reimers yelled "Yallah," or "Let's go," as he encouraged Iraqi soldiers to keep up as the group dashed across muddy farm fields and jumped across irrigation ditches in pursuit of the men.

Overhead, one of the Apache helicopters dropped flares over locations where the pilots saw fleeing men. The stink of a nearby chicken coop hung in the air, and stray dogs barked at the running soldiers.

After the initial raid, Perry said the Iraqi soldiers did a thorough search of the compound and helped scour the surrounding farm fields for men who fled the compound. "With some guidance from Lt. Reimers, they performed to standard eventually," he said.

About a dozen men were detained during and after the raid. All were later released. It turned out the two informants who told U.S. forces about the suspect were not able to provide enough specifics to hold any of them, including a couple brothers of the suspect. Nor was anything incriminating found in the home.

In order to keep suspects in custody, U.S. and Iraqi forces have to provide evidence to hold up in Iraq's court system, where they are eventually tried. "The evidence was insufficient," Perry says.

Planning for the Americans started days before the raid. But most Iraqis going on the raid learned about the target only hours before it was launched. The Americans say they don't brief their Iraqi counterparts until the last moment to avoid a leak that might tip off a suspect. Iraqi troops often have ties to the community or can be intimidated by insurgents who regularly threaten the families of Iraqi soldiers.

"There are some leaks," Perry says. "That is recognized by everyone."

Still, the Americans work hard to develop relationships with their Iraqi counterparts. Sipping sweet tea and eating flat bread, American and Iraqi advisers gathered at an Iraqi base here to review satellite photos and discuss details of the plan before heading out on the raid.

"I work with this group (of Americans) like my family," says al-Musawy, 35, who has spent most of his adult life in the Iraqi military. "They're my brothers. They work hard. They know military science."

When the Iraqi brigade commander's father fell seriously ill, his American adviser, Lt. Col. Bob Morschauser, saw to it that he received treatment at an American military hospital.

"The American adviser is not in command," says Col. Timothy Reese, director of the Combat Studies Institute at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., which has studied past U.S. adviser missions in Vietnam, Korea and elsewhere. "Your authority is limited to the personal rapport you develop with your counterpart."

U.S. advisers are encouraged to read the works of T.E. Lawrence, the legendary British author who helped lead an Arab revolt during World War I and became known as Lawrence of Arabia. "Do not try to do too much with your own hands," Lawrence wrote in a 1917 article in The Arab Bulletin. "Better the Arabs do it tolerably than you do it perfectly. It is their war, and you are to help them, not to win it for them."

"You can't go into this job thinking they're the American Army," says Maj. Matt Zimmerman, the operations officer of the 2-15 Task Force, which advises the Iraqi brigade. "They're not."

During a joint patrol in Mahmoudiya, one Iraqi officer strolled down the road without body armor or a rifle, a violation of normal operating procedures. He carried a handheld radio.

Reimers said he notices improvements and cannot correct every transgression he sees. Before a foot patrol got underway, the Iraqi battalion sergeant major, the top enlisted man, was hustling to get the Iraqi troops prepared when it was clear they were running late. In the past, only Iraqi officers had exercised any leadership. Reimers noted that non-commissioned officers were now taking initiative. "They feel like they're letting us down if they're not ready," Reimers said, watching him scramble after his troops. "That's more progress."

The Iraqi forces are not nearly as well-equipped and protected as their American counterparts.

The lack of equipment and logistical support is the largest problem facing Iraqi forces, say U.S. advisers.

The 566-man Iraqi battalion here in Mahmoudiya, just south of Baghdad, has only 11 Humvees that work. Four were disabled by roadside bombs and are waiting to be fixed. They have five pickups, used in part to ferry troops.

The Iraqi battalion is equipped with AK-47s and machine guns but has no mortars or artillery support.

A U.S. battalion of similar size has about 55 Humvees. American troops travel only in Humvees or other armored vehicles when they drive outside their base. Iraqi and U.S. troops here are regularly attacked by roadside bombs.

Iraq's Defense Ministry has struggled to support its troops. "There is a big problem with the Ministry of Defense," says Lt. Col. Abdul Muhsin Falei Jabar, the Iraqi battalion commander here.

"Iraqis need a little help in getting the wherewithal to run a large army," Ham says. "That is probably the next major undertaking" for the U.S. effort to build up the Iraqi military.

DOJ_NMG_0128406

One advantage of placing an entire U.S. battalion with an Iraqi unit is that the Americans can plug the gaps left by Iraq's Defense Ministry. Instead of waiting on the ministry, the Americans fixed the Iraqi Humvees. The U.S. government has paid for new barracks on the Iraqi base here.

"They're trying to get flashlights for their weapons," Aldrich says. "They can't get them, but I can."

Aldrich, an armorer, sat on a wall eating a bowl of rice and meat given to him by Iraqi colleagues.

Pvt. Saif Saad sat next to Aldrich, watching him eat. "We're like brothers," Saad said. "We feel safe when we go with Americans."

Well-fed and equipped American troops are often a source of wonderment to Iraqi soldiers. Iraqi troops who eat at the U.S. mess hall are often amazed at the quantity and variety of food available to Americans.

A couple of Iraqi officers visiting the nearby U.S. base carried trays piled high with food. Chips, pastries and packages of small snacks were balanced precariously on their trays. One of the Iraqi officers expressed surprise, however, that smoking wasn't allowed in the mess hall.

Part of the idea behind having the Iraqis work closely with U.S. forces is to have American military values rub off on Iraqis.

In the former Iraqi army, "all the officers were like dictators," Jabar says.

"There were no good relations between officers and soldiers. We understand stuff now," he says.

"They strive to be like we are," Reimers says.

But not all the time. The American military has a tradition of officers serving enlisted troops in the mess hall during holidays. The sight of American officers at a Christmas dinner behind the serving line with small white hats appeared strange to Iraqi officers accustomed to a different, more autocratic, style of leadership.

Troops In Iraq Kill Official Who Worked For Shiite Cleric (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 5 — The director of the political office in Diyala Province for the powerful anti-American Shiite militia leader Moktada al-Sadr was shot and killed by troops during a raid on Sunday, a Sadr political spokesman said Monday.

A statement by the United States military did not identify the official who was killed. It said Iraqi troops had killed a leader of "rogue" and criminal elements of Mr. Sadr's Mahdi Army in Diyala who had directed attacks on American forces as well as "kidnappings, assassinations and other violence targeting Iraqi civilians and Iraqi police."

But a spokesman in Baghdad for Mr. Sadr's political movement, Salah al-Agaili, identified the official as Ali Khazim al-Hamdani. The spokesman said that Mr. Khazim had been the chief of Mr. Sadr's political office in Diyala and that he had not turned rogue or otherwise distanced himself from the Sadr movement. The spokesman also termed the death a "provocation."

Some American officials familiar with Diyala, a volatile province north of Baghdad, have said that Mr. Khazim provided intelligence to the American military, beginning last summer. In one instance, they said, Mr. Khazim supplied information that led to the capture of Shiite militiamen who had killed three American soldiers with a powerful roadside bomb near Baquba last fall.

One American official said that at one point last year Mr. Khazim sought to reduce the Mahdi militia's emphasis on attacking American and Iraqi forces, but that the effort had helped put Mr. Khazim in conflict with other more militant factions associated with the Mahdi Army, including forces allied with Abu Dera, the feared Shiite death squad commander.

In an interview last year, Mr. Khazim explained that Mahdi militiamen were pouring into Diyala to protect Shiites being terrorized by Sunni insurgents. "If my brothers are killed, we have to react to that," he said.

Sunni insurgents have overrun much of Diyala Province and killed or driven out thousands of Shiites. They often attack the province's Shiite-dominated security forces, whose commanders, American officials have said, include officers with close ties to Shiite militias and death squads.

2 Key Members Of Mahdi Army Killed (AP)

AP, February 5, 2007

Two key members of radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's political and military organization were gunned down just days before the U.S. and Iraqi forces planned to open a massive security drive in Baghdad.

Ali Khazim, who ran al-Sadr's political organization in volatile Diyala province northeast of Baghdad, was killed Sunday by U.S. forces at his home in Howaider village, 12 miles east of Baqouba, Saleh al-Ageili, a spokesman for the Sadr Movement's parliamentary bloc, said on Monday. Provincial police confirmed al-Ageili's account.

DOJ_NMG_0128407

"What has happened to Khazim is part of the series of provocative acts by the occupation forces against the Sadr movement. The occupation forces know well who are the terrorists and their whereabouts, yet they are targeting our people," al-Ageili told The Associated Press.

The U.S. military did not immediately respond to telephone and e-mail requests for comment.

The second official, Khalil al-Maliki, a key figure in al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia in Basra, was killed by three gunmen in a drive-by shooting on Sunday in the southern city of Basra, police reported. He survived an assassination attempt in the city last year.

As many as seven key figures in the al-Sadr organization have been killed or captured in the past two months, at least three of them by U.S. forces, after Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, also a Shiite, dropped his protection for the organization — a crucial backer in his rise to power.

The coming security drive, to which President Bush has dispatched 21,500 additional American forces, was seen as a last-chance effort to quell the sectarian violence ravaging the capital and surrounding regions.

Security Crackdown In Capital Takes Shape As Attacks Kill Dozens (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 5 -- Bombs and mortar shells killed more than 37 people in Baghdad on Monday, as U.S. officials said that the command structure for the new security crackdown in the capital was ready.

In the deadliest attack, a small truck rigged with explosives was detonated near a gas station in the Bayya neighborhood, killing 15 people and wounding 58, according to Col. Fakher Hussein of the Interior Ministry. A car bomb that exploded in an industrial area of central Baghdad took the lives of 13 people, he said.

The U.S. and Iraqi militaries have for months been preparing a massive security initiative aimed at quelling the daily killing in the capital. A spokeswoman for the U.S. military, Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, said Monday that the command structure and choice of personnel to head the effort have now been established.

Iraqi forces in the capital will be led by Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar, a former naval commander in the military of deposed president Saddam Hussein. Gambar was taken prisoner by U.S. forces during the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

A Shiite from the southern city of Amarah, he will report directly to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, whose viability as Iraq's leader hinges on his ability to temper the violence in Baghdad.

The selection of Gambar, a relatively unknown officer, was greeted with skepticism by some Iraqi and U.S. officials. But an aide to Maliki said the prime minister remains confident in his choice and that Gambar has the support of coalition commanders. During a meeting last month between Maliki and Lt. Gen. Graeme Lamb, the senior British general in Iraq, Lamb pronounced Gambar a "good man," the aide said.

Gambar will have deputies in charge of the east and west sides of Baghdad, which is divided by the Tigris River, and will oversee the nine security districts recently established in the capital. President Bush plans to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq, and thousands of them have begun arriving in Baghdad.

The troop increase "changes the dynamic by adding an air of confidence to operations that we do in conjunction" with Iraqi forces, said Maj. Clay Padgett, acting commander of the 1st Battalion, 26th Infantry Regiment, a task force that patrols northeastern Baghdad.

"Quite frankly, we have had difficulties with areas inside of Baghdad that do not have a coalition forces presence. Because it's almost like putting your finger on a dot of mercury. You hit it and it goes all over the place. And unfortunately, you didn't have enough hands doing the same thing."

Also on Monday, Iraqi followers of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr reacted angrily to the killings of two alleged leaders of the Mahdi Army, the powerful militia that is largely controlled by Sadr. One Sadr follower, Ali Kadhum al-Hamdani, 38, was shot dead by Iraqi soldiers, backed by U.S. advisers, during a raid on his home in the insurgent hotbed of Baqubah, in Diyala province north of Baghdad.

The U.S. military did not name the dead man but identified him as a "rogue" leader of the Mahdi Army.

"The suspect is believed to have facilitated and directed numerous kidnappings, assassinations and other violence targeting Iraqi civilians and Iraqi Police. He is reportedly responsible for several attacks against Coalition and Iraqi Forces in the area," the military said in a statement.

A spokesman for the Diyala police, Ali al-Khaiyam, said Hamdani was killed near his home. He owned a flower shop in the main Baqubah market and handed out candy to children to celebrate the fall of Saddam Hussein.

The second Sadr official, Khalil al-Maliki, from the Mahdi Army in Basra, was killed in a drive-by shooting on Sunday, according to a Sadr spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0128408

Abdul Razzaq al-Windawi, the spokesman, said he viewed the killings as part of an increased effort by Americans "and their agents" to target Sadr's followers. The Iraqi government has been widely criticized for not doing enough to target violent followers of Sadr.

The U.S. military on Monday also announced the recent deaths of two U.S. soldiers. On Sunday, one soldier was killed and two were wounded by a roadside bomb during a patrol north of Baghdad. A soldier in Diyala province died during a small-arms attack by insurgents, the military said in a statement. The Americans' names were not released.

At least nine other people were killed in Baghdad on Monday, at least one in a mortar attack, officials said.

US Eases Tone On Iran's Role In Iraq (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON

In an atmosphere of sharp skepticism about intelligence and heightened sensitivity to saber rattling since the Iraq invasion, the Bush administration is signaling a more cautious tone toward Iran.

Less than a month ago, President Bush used a speech on a way forward in Iraq to present fresh accusations against Iran and roll out a more aggressive approach to the regime in Tehran. Now, the Iran debate is sounding markedly different.

Senior officials from the White House, State Department, and Pentagon are playing down the evidence the US possesses of "nefarious" Iranian involvement in Iraq's spiraling violence – in particular against US forces there. They're also insisting the US wants to work out problems with Tehran diplomatically.

A repeated delay in a promised presentation of evidence against Iran reflects the administration's desire to get things right, and to neither overplay nor underestimate involvement, officials say.

Explaining why the rollout of facts on Iranian involvement has been delayed, Stephen Hadley, Mr. Bush's national security adviser, told reporters Friday that "the truth is, quite frankly, we thought the briefing overstated, and we sent it back to get it narrowed and focused on the facts."

But the moderated tone also suggests an administration still smarting over memories of the earlier botched campaign to justify taking on Saddam Hussein, some experts say. And with some military officials cautioning against the risks of an "accidental escalation" resulting from a mishandling of the new aggressiveness toward Iran, the administration may have decided to pull back, they say.

Yet others with experience in similar situations involving both policy and intelligence motivations believe some evidence linking Iran to recent acts of violence is in US hands – but that intelligence officials have resisted its release for fear of compromising a fruitful information channel.

"What we've seen so far suggests information from somewhere in the Iranian government, perhaps from the Quds force of the Revolutionary Guard, but the intelligence people don't want to let it out for fear of tipping off the Iranians or losing a source," says Wayne White, a former Middle East analyst with the State Department's bureau of intelligence and research.

"Cat fights" are common, Mr. White says, between "policy people" who want to get the information out, and the intelligence side that is more focused on long-term effectiveness. "I suspect there was quite a lot of friction last week over Iran," he says.

The charges against Iran so far appear to stem from the following incidents:

·On Jan. 11, the United States raided the Iranian mission in the Kurdish city of Arbil, detaining six people and seizing what it said was material suggesting Iranian involvement in the supply of more powerful and sophisticated arms used in attacks on US forces.

·In late December, other Iranians, including two diplomats, were detained in Iraq and questioned. The diplomats were later released.

·Five US soldiers were abducted and killed in a sophisticated operation Jan. 20 in the Shiite city of Karbala. US military officials in Baghdad suspected the attackers, who wore US-style uniforms, of either being Iranian or benefiting from Iranian training. US military sources said they had never seen so sophisticated an attack from Iraqi insurgents.

·For more than a year, US armored vehicles, including the M1 Abrams battle tank, have been the target of increasingly powerful and sophisticated weaponry.

Last August, Brig. Gen. Michael Barbero cited "irrefutable" evidence that Iran was providing the technology for advanced explosive devices being used against US forces. In a Pentagon briefing, he said Iran was funding, equipping, and training "Shia extremist groups." But British forces patrolling Iraq's southeastern border with Iran reported last fall encountering more hearsay than evidence of such activity.

Zalmay Khalilzad, US ambassador to Iraq, said after the Arbil operation that some of the detained were from the Quds force and that one detainee was a director of operations for the Quds force.

DOJ_NMG_0128409

But last week, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said that information he had seen from the Karbala attack was "ambiguous" as to an Iranian role, adding that it was too early in the investigation to be conclusive.

Also last week, Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of State for political affairs, said it was "not possible to say exactly who" was responsible for the Karbala attack.

One issue the Bush administration faces is that it is seen to be focusing on Iran when Iraq's civil war – and Iraqi sectarian violence – is reaching a new intensity. Even the National Intelligence Estimate released last week minimized the Iranian role in Iraq, saying internal factors are more significant contributors to Iraq's instability.

"The involvement of [Iran and Syria] is not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability because of the self-sustaining character of Iraq's internal sectarian dynamics," the report says.

That conclusion mirrors the view of experts like White, who believe Iran is involved in Iraq, but not in any decisive manner. "Yes, I believe the Iranians are doing this, but at a level that doesn't matter very much. Compared to the magnitude of the Iraqi-on-Iraqi violence, they are really playing a bit part in all of this," says White, now an adjunct scholar at the Middle East Institute in Washington.

Focusing on Iran now would risk suggesting the administration was trying to put up a smoke screen, some observers say. It would also not appear to be the right time to amplify accusations that Shiite Iran is providing material and personnel to target Sunni neighborhoods, given that the horrendous bombings of the last week have all hit Shiite neighborhoods.

As to why the Bush administration is choosing to verbally confront Iran now, White sees three reasons beyond a desire to stop suspected arms supplies. "I suspect they want to push Iran back a little to give the troop surge a slightly better chance of success," he says. "But I also think they are setting up a target to blame for if and when the surge fails. And then it is part of a steady vilifying of Iran, so that if they do go after them over their nuclear program, the US public is that much more prepared for it."

Iranian Diplomat Kidnapped In Baghdad By Iraqis With Official ID (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

BAGHDAD, Tuesday, Feb. 6 — An Iranian diplomat was abducted Sunday evening when his convoy was stopped by men with official Defense Ministry identification in the Karrada neighborhood here, senior Iraqi and American officials said Monday.

Iraqi security forces captured several suspects after pursuing their vehicles through the streets of Baghdad, two of the Iraqi officials said.

The vehicle with the diplomat was not caught, though.

Bombings killed at least 29 people and wounded 90 more in Baghdad as preparations for the latest attempt to secure the city were under way. Those preparations are part of the American-led troop buildup that some American and Iraqi officials view as a last-ditch effort to keep violence in the capital from degenerating into an all-out sectarian war between Shiite and Sunni Arabs.

The abduction of the Iranian took place in a largely Shiite section of the city not far from where a truck bomb killed at least 135 people on Saturday and where residents have complained that the slow pace of the increase in American troops has left them open to attacks.

The men captured in the chase by Iraqi forces on Sunday were Iraqis with Defense Ministry identification, Iraqi and American officials said, raising serious questions about whether government forces themselves were involved in the abduction.

A senior Iraqi official said that the credentials initially appeared to be genuine but that investigators later received conflicting information about whether the men had been dismissed from the ministry but somehow kept their identification.

When asked about indications that an Iranian diplomat had been abducted in Baghdad, Mohammad alHosseini, an Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman in Tehran, said: “We need to investigate, because we have been receiving a lot of news like that these days. I cannot confirm it yet.”

If the kidnappers’ credentials turn out to be genuine, there will be enormous pressure on the Iraqi government to recover the diplomat and capture all of those involved. The Iraqi government has been critical of recent raids by American forces in which Iranians working with diplomatic offices in Iraq have been detained.

The Americans have accused some of those Iranians of supporting illicit armed groups in Iraq, but the raids have been embarrassing to the Iraqi government, which has been encouraging foreign diplomatic missions — in particular Iran’s — to increase their presence here. Iraqi officials have distanced themselves from the American raids, while Iran has simply termed those operations kidnappings.

In fact, the American position on those raids was weakened after American forces in Baghdad first announced that they would formally present evidence on illicit Iranian activity in Iraq, then pulled back amid indications that officials in Washington were not persuaded that the case was strong enough.

Tensions between the United States and Iran have recently soared over the issues of Iran's nuclear program and statements by its ambassador to Iraq that his country planned to increase its economic and military ties with Iraq substantially.

The Iranian Embassy has not publicly acknowledged the kidnapping. But in an indication of how high tensions between Iran and the United States have risen over the American raids, the embassy privately voiced suspicions that the kidnapping of its diplomat might have been done at the behest of American forces in Baghdad, an Iraqi official said.

American Embassy and military spokesmen did not immediately respond to requests for comment that were made after midnight on Monday in Baghdad.

Beyond the unsubstantiated suspicions about the involvement of the United States in the kidnapping, there were no clear indications of whether the Iranian diplomat might have been taken by insurgents seeking to cast doubt on the stability of Iraq's government, or simply for ransom.

But in videos, Sunni insurgents claimed responsibility for a series of attacks on Arab embassies in Baghdad in 2005, when the top diplomats from Egypt and Algeria were kidnapped and killed.

Also on Monday, the United States military reported that two American soldiers had been killed the day before.

One soldier from Task Force Lightning was shot by insurgents during combat in Diyala Province. Another soldier, assigned to the 13th Sustainment Command (Expeditionary), was killed by a roadside bomb during a patrol north of Baghdad.

A British soldier was killed Monday by a roadside bomb in Basra, the 100th British military combat death in Iraq, according to British news reports.

Another 31 members of the British military have died in Iraq from accidents or other causes.

U.S. May Seek Sanctions Against Iran (AP)

AP, February 6, 2007

The United States will push for more U.N. Security Council sanctions against Iran if Tehran continues to ignore council demands for suspension of the country's uranium enrichment program, the State Department said Monday.

Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Iran appears to be continuing "down the path of isolation" by its recent announcement of stepped up installation of centrifuges that process uranium gas into fuel that can be used for weapons or generating energy.

McCormack said the U.S. would seek "incremental" sanctions at the U.N. should the standoff continue, though he did not specify what they might be or the exact timing of any action.

The U.N. Security Council approved economic sanctions on Iran on Dec. 23 due to its refusal to halt uranium enrichment. If Tehran fails to comply by the end of a 60-day deadline that the U.N. imposed, the Security Council will consider new measures.

Tehran already has cascades of 164 centrifuges installed above ground at Natanz, and has announced plans to operate 3,000 centrifuges below ground there, enabling it to speed up production of nuclear fuel.

Defying U.N., Iran Installs Centrifuges (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

VIENNA, Feb. 5 -- Shrugging off the threat of tougher U.N. sanctions, Iran has set up more than 300 centrifuges in two uranium enrichment units at its underground Natanz complex, diplomats and officials said Monday.

The move potentially opens the way for larger-scale enrichment that could be used to build nuclear warheads. Iranian leaders have repeatedly said the Natanz facility would house 3,000 centrifuges at first and, ultimately, 54,000 of the machines.

It also poses a direct challenge to the U.N. Security Council, which late last month imposed limited sanctions targeting programs and individuals linked to Tehran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs.

The uranium enrichment process can be used to fuel nuclear power plants. But at higher levels of enrichment, uranium can be used for the core of nuclear warheads.

Time To Act On Iran Is Now (USAT)

By Dr. Richard Saccone

USA Today, February 6, 2007

An objective look at the ominous threat from Iran provides a clear solution to the policy the United States must pursue. Iran is easily the most significant source of terror worldwide, providing financing, training, advice, support and supplies to its proxy Hezbollah as well as other groups as far away as Asia. That makes it a major opponent in the war on terror.

DOJ_NMG_0128411

In addition, Iran has increased efforts to undermine the U.S. mission in Iraq through operations in the south as well as in Baghdad. It has dared to confront the United States, stirring Shiite sectarian violence and providing Shiite militias with advanced weapons and knowledge of constructing sophisticated explosive devices for use against U.S forces. Iran has consistently followed its goal of becoming a regional power while secretly hoping to gain control of combined oil reserves (in Iran and southern Iraq) that reportedly would stand second only to Saudi Arabia's.

Iranian officials have showed almost no inclination of pausing in their efforts to acquire nuclear weapons, even openly cooperating with the North Koreans to expedite the process. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad routinely threatens to wipe out our closest ally in the region, Israel, and drive the United States from the Middle East.

And what have our multilateral efforts of diplomacy accomplished so far? Almost nothing. Iran has defied United Nations deadlines, played Europe and China against U.S. interests and deceived U.N. inspection teams with false reports on storage, processing and importing of nuclear materials.

Even more troubling, we are dealing with a president who firmly believes in an apocalyptic vision that the 12th Imam will return to Earth to establish a worldwide Islamic caliphate. Ahmadinejad told a cleric that he felt the "hand of God" mesmerizing world leaders as he spoke at the U.N. General Assembly in September.

The stakes are far too high to allow Iran to buy any more time through feigned receptivity to diplomacy. Iran must be confronted quickly and persistently, and the growing dissent within the country fanned so that it challenges the current regime. The clock is on the side of Ahmadinejad. Dealing resolutely with Iran is the only option that promises to yield tangible results.

USA Today, February 6, 2007

With each passing week, tensions between Iran and the United States seem to escalate. Iran announces another step toward going nuclear; the United States presses for sanctions. Iraq helps Shiite militias in Iraq; the Bush administration detains Iranian agents and sends ships into the Persian Gulf. Iraq funds Mideast terror groups; the United States struggles to curb their influence.

All the while, Iran's extremist president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, rants in denial of the Holocaust and predicts apocalypse.

By any measure, Iran and the United States are in a long-term contest for power and influence that carries stakes even higher than those in Iraq, and there is little certainty as to how that contest will unfold.

What is certain is that the United States needs a fresh approach. So far, it has inadvertently been the primary enabler of Iran's ambitions to reclaim its historic role as a regional power. America toppled the two players who had kept Iran in check: Saddam Hussein in Iraq and the Taliban in Afghanistan.

How best to keep Iranian ambitions in check without incurring a new conflagration? A historical analogy, inexact but apt, offers important lessons.

In 1947, as Europe lay in ruins from World War II, a similar U.S. struggle for influence was taking shape with the Soviet Union. The novel approach the United States devised, the brainchild of diplomat George Kennan, came to be known as "containment." It sought to isolate and pressure the Soviets militarily and diplomatically, while relying on the power of the U.S. economy and the appeal of U.S. ideas to win allies. It was a high-stakes chess game and, in the long term, it worked.

An emerging U.S. strategy in the Middle East looks a lot like containment. Rather than direct military confrontation or outright appeasement, the administration has been building up points of leverage to isolate and pressure the Iranian regime.

President Bush has been talking tough. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been lining up Sunni allies — Saudi Arabia and other Gulf Arab states, plus Jordan and Egypt — that are concerned about Shiite Iran's rising power. The United States has sent two aircraft carriers to the Persian Gulf as well as missile defense systems. It has disrupted Iranian international financial dealings.

All are reasonable steps. But a vital part is missing: dialogue. Through the Cold War, there was always a dialogue — sometimes just at embassy levels, sometimes at full-scale summits. Talking to Iran (and Syria) was a core recommendation of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. But the administration insists Iran first suspend uranium enrichment.

Rather than insisting on a precondition, why not try to open regional or bilateral talks focused only on Iraq, where Iran and the United States have more converging interests than is usually recognized? Neither wants war spilling over Iraq's borders. And both want to combat al-Qaeda insurgents.

Perhaps the biggest irony in the current confrontation is that Iran is the Middle East country most ripe for the democracy Bush says he is fighting to bring. The present religious extremism is not the historic norm. Iran has elections. Women vote. Most Iranians are under 30 years old and tend to look westward. Even the tame U.N. sanctions on Iran have created a backlash against Ahmadinejad. He and the ayatollahs who hold real power are the problem, not the entire nation.

Iran, like the former Soviet Union, has caused much mischief and needs to be checked. But confrontation alone risks once again uniting nationalistic Iranians behind Ahmadinejad's extremism. It also risks igniting sectarian conflicts between Shiites and Sunnis across the Middle East.

Containment has more chance of forcing the regime to collapse from within. The wisdom of Kennan's approach is as relevant today as it was 60 years ago.

Syria Urges Talks On Iraq (WT/AP)

By Lee Keath

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

CAIRO -- Syrian President Bashar Assad said cooperation -- and negotiations -- between Syria and the United States could be the "last chance" to avoid full-scale civil war in Iraq.

However, in an interview on ABC's "Good Morning America" aired yesterday, Mr. Assad said he wasn't optimistic that President Bush would seize the opportunity and talk to Damascus.

He said the Bush administration does not have the vision to bring peace in Iraq.

"This administration is not willing to achieve peace; they don't have the will, and they don't have the vision," Mr. Assad said in the interview from Damascus.

In contrast, he praised Mr. Bush's father, who sponsored a 1991 Arab-Israeli peace conference that included Syria. Mr. Assad said the first President Bush had the "will to achieve peace."

The interview was the strongest attempt yet by Mr. Assad to overcome President Bush's rejection of dialogue with Damascus over Iraq. Syria has been trying to break its international isolation and win a resumption of peace talks with Israel, with the ultimate hope of getting back the Golan Heights, seized by Israel in 1967.

Mr. Bush has stepped up criticism of Syria, accusing it of fueling the crises in Iraq and Lebanon. In recent weeks, Iraq's Shi'ite-led government also has increasingly spoken out against Syria, accusing it of harboring fugitives who finance and support the Sunni insurgency.

Mr. Assad said Syria could play an important role in Iraq, contending it has the trust of all sides, including those who "oppose [Iraq's] political process" -- a reference to Sunni insurgents.

"We're not the only player; we're not the single player. But we are the main player in this issue," he said. "Our role is going to be through supporting the dialogue between the different parties inside Iraq with support from the other parties, like the Americans and any other country in the world. So that's how we can stop the violence."

Mr. Assad said the Syrians were not optimistic that the Bush administration would pursue diplomatic contacts despite pressure from Congress to do so.

"After nearly four years of occupation, [the Americans] haven't learned their lesson; they haven't started the dialogue," he said.

"I think it's too late for them to move toward that. It doesn't mean we can't turn the tide. But [it may be] too late because Iraqis are heading toward civil war. So maybe [this is] the last chance that we have now to start."

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended in December that the Bush administration make diplomatic overtures to Syria and Iran to use their influence with Sunni and Shi'ite extremist groups to curb the violence and prevent the conflict from spilling over into the rest of the Middle East.

But the White House rejected the recommendation, instead deciding to send 21,500 more U.S. troops mostly to Baghdad for a major security crackdown.

Mr. Assad criticized Washington for trying to solve the Iraqi crisis with more troops. "They only talk about troops and power, not about the political process," he said.

Iraqi Shiite Calls For U.S.-Iran Talks (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

TEHRAN, Feb. 5 — A senior Iraqi Shiite leader said Monday that his country had urged Iran to hold talks with the United States and that such talks were important for the security of the region.

“Given the special conditions in the region, talks between the United States and Iran are of the utmost importance,” Abdel Aziz al-Hakim, one of Iraq’s most powerful Shiite leaders, said at a news conference in Tehran after meeting with the chief of the Supreme National Security Council, Ali Larijani according to the ISNA news agency.

DOJ_NMG_0128413

"Negotiations between Iran and the United States are useful for the whole region," added Mr. Hakim, who lived in exile in Iran during Saddam Hussein's rule in Iraq and who has close ties with Iranian leaders. But Mr. Hakim said he did not have any specific messages on the subject.

Other Iraqi officials have also urged Iran to hold talks with the United States. Iran has said it is open to the idea. The United States has refused to hold direct talks with Iran over Iraq or over Iran's nuclear program.

Mr. Hakim also held talks on Monday with Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

The details of the discussion in Tehran were not disclosed. Mr. Larijani said only that the two sides discussed "security, economic and bilateral ties," ISNA reported.

However, analysts speculated that they might have discussed the fate of six Iranians who were arrested by American forces in a raid on an Iranian consulate in Erbil last month. Mr. Hakim said the Iraqi government was continuing its efforts for their release.

Numerous diplomats have traveled to Iran in the past month as tension has grown over its nuclear program and its role in Iraq. The visitors have included the foreign ministers of Qatar and Syria, an envoy from Saudi Arabia and Iraq's security minister, Shirwan al-Waili.

European diplomats said Monday that Iran had set up two cascades of 164 centrifuges each in its underground nuclear plant, laying a basis for full-scale enrichment of uranium and increasing the stakes in its standoff with the West over its plans to enrich uranium, [a news agency] reported.

President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan visited Iran on Monday, meeting with Ayatollah Khamenei and President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. ISNA reported that the two sides discussed a natural gas pipeline between Iran and India, which would cross Pakistan. The United States has been critical of the proposal. ISNA said the men also discussed Iraq and the Israeli-Palestinian situation.

India's foreign minister, Pranab Mukherjee, is expected to be in Tehran on Tuesday to discuss the proposed pipeline.

Iraq Allies Dawdle On Aid For Rebuilding (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

Foreign countries are billions of dollars delinquent on their pledges to help Iraq rebuild, and four years after the war began, the international reconstruction effort is still mostly funded by the United States.

Some of the biggest deadbeats are Iraq's oil-rich neighbors, such as Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, which are both about a half-billion dollars in arrears, and the United Arab Emirates, which has failed to make good on one penny of a $215 million promise, according to Iraqi government statistics.

The poor fundraising is another blow to President Bush, who in June assigned a special team to try to get other nations to meet their pledges -- but eight months later has little to show for it. Of $15 billion in initial pledges at the Madrid donors' conference in 2003 and in follow-up conferences, foreign donors have made good on about $4 billion.

Italy, Canada and the United Kingdom are all more than $100 million delinquent, as is Japan, which has finalized only $1.5 billion of its $5 billion pledge. And momentum has waned -- the international donor committee that oversees Iraqi reconstruction funding hasn't met since 2005 -- even as other demands pile up for international aid, such as the nearly $8 billion countries pledged last month to help Lebanon.

The Iraqi statistics also show that the United States is the most delinquent of any nation in nominal terms, with $6.4 billion still outstanding on the U.S. pledge of $18.4 billion, although the $12 billion the United States has sent is far and away the most of any country.

The Defense Department's Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, Stuart W. Bowen Jr., in a new report last week, said international funding is reaching a turning point where those bilateral foreign donations will become more critical as the existing funds managed by the World Bank and United Nations become exhausted.

"Assistance from other international donors is likely to play an increasing role in financing reconstruction in Iraq," the inspector general said.

Congress is also looking at reconstruction, with House Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry A. Waxman, California Democrat, holding hearings today and tomorrow on the U.S. role in the process and the use of private military contractors.

The issue has been an on-again, off-again priority for Mr. Bush. Back in June, as he prepared to meet European leaders before the U.S.-EU summit, the president demanded other nations come through, noting that just $3.5 billion of the $13 billion in non-U.S. pledges had been paid at the time. He named a team of top officials, including Deputy Treasury Secretary Bob Kimmitt and State Department Counselor Phil Zelikow, to travel the world to secure support.

DOJ_NMG_0128414

The White House has been reluctant to name the delinquents, with National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley telling reporters in June he didn't want to "get into specific names." But Iraq has now named them, establishing a Web site to track pledges, contributions and projects at www.mop-iraq.org.

Calls to the Iraqi Embassy in Washington went unanswered, as did an e-mail seeking information.

House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos said nations in the region, particularly Saudi Arabia, have benefited from oil prices but have not stepped up their commitments to help out neighboring Iraq.

"The countries in the region are not indifferent bystanders to the events in Iraq. They must engage, at a minimum, by sharing the financial burden of this enterprise," said Mr. Lantos, California Democrat, calling on Mr. Bush to lean harder on others. "The administration must do a better job at applying effective diplomacy to engage other partners who have a stake in the outcome in Iraq."

At a hearing last month, Mr. Lantos asked Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice why neighbors such as the Saudis have not come through. Miss Rice said they have had to try to convince the Saudis that a failed Iraq would be a problem for them.

"I think they are getting there," she said of the Saudis' thinking.

Earlier reports by the inspector general also said the dangerous security situation in Iraq was making some nations wary of committing funds.

This week the State Department official told The Washington Times there are several avenues countries are working through, including debt forgiveness. The official also said the United Nations is trying to launch a new International Compact with Iraq (ICI) that would bind Iraq to an economic-restructuring program "in return for increased political and financial support from the international community." The compact has been negotiated but not finalized.

The official said some countries and multilateral organizations have fulfilled their pledges: The European Commission met its initial $235 million pledge and provided an additional $269 million by the end of 2006, with more on the way in 2007.

And the official said that Japan, the second-largest pledged nation, is giving much of its money as soft loans that have long-term durations, which take longer to set up. In December, Japan announced two new loans totaling $738 million.

In addition to international funds, the U.S. inspector general identified $50.45 billion the Iraqi government has had from oil sales, frozen or seized funds and new government spending that has gone to its own reconstruction.

US Sets Up Task Force On Iraqi Refugees (AFP)

AFP, February 6, 2007

The United States set up a task force to tackle the mounting Iraq refugee crisis, after Washington came under criticism for not doing enough to help millions of people displaced by the war it unleashed nearly four years ago.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced the creation of the task force, to be headed by Undersecretary of State Paula Dobriansky and including the State Department's top Middle East and Iraq officials.

The team will coordinate US assistance for Iraqi refugees and internally displaced persons and "devise strategies for Iraqis at risk because of their work with the US government," Rice spokesman Sean McCormack said.

According to the United Nations, about two million Iraqis, some eight percent of the pre-war population, have fled the country to escape the war and mounting sectarian violence.

Another 1.7 million have been forced to flee their homes to safer areas inside Iraq, and the number of these "internally displaced persons" is growing by 1,000 every day, the International Organization for Migration reported last week.

The United States has come under growing criticism for taking in fewer than 500 Iraqi refugees since leading the 2003 invasion which toppled the government of Saddam Hussein, and for failing to sufficiently fund UN efforts to help the displaced.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack last week said Washington was prepared to take in "a fairly significant number" of Iraqi refugees, but he declined to provide figures and said the government had to follow UN procedures for determining who is eligible for asylum.

While he said the State Department and military were looking at specific cases of Iraqis who could be in danger for having worked with the United States occupation, McCormack expressed concern that offering asylum could unleash an exodus of trained people needed to help rebuild Iraq.

"Certainly we want to do everything we can to encourage those Iraqis who are going to be critical to help rebuilding their country stay in Iraq and invest in their future," he said.

"At the same time, you also want to honor the service of those individuals who in many cases have risked their lives to help us out."

100th British Soldier Killed In Action In Iraq (AFP)

AFP, February 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128415

A British soldier was killed by a roadside bomb in southern Iraq, the 100th to die in military action in the violence-scarred country, the Ministry of Defence said.

The bomb exploded near the US consulate in the main city of Basra, a spokesman said, adding that the soldier was part of a patrol in Warrior armoured vehicles.

"It is with deep regret that the MOD must confirm that the soldier who was killed by a roadside bomb today was a member of 2nd Battalion The Duke of Lancasters Regiment," said an MoD statement.

"The roadside bomb detonated targeting a ... Warrior patrol manoeuvring on routine duties in the Al Ashshar district of Basra city. A number of civilians were also injured," it added.

His death brings to 131 the number of British soldiers who have died in Iraq since the US-led invasion was launched in March 2003 to topple Saddam Hussein, and the 100th death in action or as a result of injuries sustained in action.

The soldier's next of kin were informed, and requested a period of 24 hours before any further details were released, the ministry added.

Some 7,100 British soldiers are currently deployed in Iraq, mainly in and around Basra, although London says it hopes to withdraw "thousands" by the end of this year.

There has been criticism in the past that British troops deployed in both Iraq and Afghanistan have not been sufficiently protected by their existing armoured vehicles.

Britain was the United States' key ally in the controversial 2003 invasion of Iraq, and its main supporter in the multi-national coalition deployed since in the country.

Trial Starts For Officer Who Refused To Go To Iraq (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

FORT LEWIS, Wash., Feb. 5 — A court-martial started here on Monday against an Army officer who refused to serve in Iraq last summer because, he has said, the war is illegal.

The officer, First Lt. Ehren K. Watada, was charged in July with missing a movement and conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman after he refused to join his unit, the Third Brigade, Second Infantry, when it was deployed. Before and after his unit left, Lieutenant Watada gave interviews and made other public comments denouncing the war.

Lieutenant Watada has said the Bush administration has falsely used the 9/11 attacks to justify the war. He has said that the war has been proved unjust because unconventional weapons have not been found in Iraq and that American soldiers have mistreated the Iraqis.

Many enlisted soldiers have faced discipline for refusing to serve in Iraq. Lieutenant Watada is the first officer to refuse to do so publicly. He could face up to four years in prison and be dishonorably discharged if convicted on all counts.

The case has become a rallying point for antiwar groups, and scores of Lieutenant Watada's supporters waved signs on Monday at a highway overpass outside Fort Lewis.

His prospects appear uncertain. The judge, Lt. Col. John Head, reinforced on Monday an earlier ruling that Lieutenant Watada could not base his defense on his contention that the war is illegal.

Lieutenant Watada has pleaded not guilty but he has not disputed that he missed the deployment or that he commented against the war.

"From what I understand, that under military law those in the military are allowed to refuse — in fact, have the right to refuse unlawful orders — a duty to refuse," Lieutenant Watada said last month at a forum featuring war opponents, according to a transcript distributed on Monday by Zoltan Grossman, a professor at Evergreen State College who helped organize the forum.

In the transcript, Lieutenant Watada said being denied the chance to argue the legality of the war in his court-martial was "a violation of our most sacred premises of due process and, indeed, is un-American."

"We will fight it," he said. "I will always flight. We will try to appeal to the highest court."

Lieutenant Watada, of Honolulu, asked to go to Afghanistan instead of Iraq but he was denied. He also tried to resign but was denied. He has been working in an administrative office here. Experts expect the trial to last much of this week.

On Monday, Army prosecutors and a defense lawyer, Eric Seitz, interviewed potential jurors drawn from a pool of officers on this post. Under questioning, several officers said it was "odd" that Lieutenant Watada refused to go because, as one put it, officers "should support our leadership and our tent command."

Opening arguments could begin on Tuesday.

Outside the base, arguments were well under way. A woman held a sign reading "Lying and Bullying = Conduct Unbecoming a President." A man a few feet away held one that said "Jail Weasel Watada."

Specialist Pleads Guilty to AWOL

DOJ_NMG_0128416

FORT BLISS, Tex., Feb. 5 (AP) — A soldier from Minnesota pleaded guilty on Monday to being absent without leave and missing a flight to Kuwait in July.

The soldier, Specialist Melanie McPherson, 28, told a military judge that she had left for Minnesota the day before her Army unit was to leave for Kuwait because she was afraid that she would be sent to Iraq as a truck driver or a military police officer. Specialist McPherson is trained as a photojournalist.

The Taliban In Pakistan (WSJ)

By Said T. Jawad

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

Pakistan's recent proposal to fence and lay landmines along its 1,500-mile Afghanistan border is impractical, ineffective and irrelevant to the problem of terrorism and the Taliban. Terrorism will be contained only if we end the institutional support for extremism and strengthen traditional leadership in our region.

On Jan. 11, National Intelligence Director John Negroponte testified before the Senate Intelligence Committee. He identified Pakistan as "a major source of Islamic extremism" and said that al Qaeda leaders enjoy a "secure hideout" in Pakistan, while rebuilding their terrorist network and pursuing WMD. These statements reflect a growing consensus among political and military leaders. In his recent trip to the region, Secretary of Defense Robert Gates noted a "significant increase in cross-border attacks." Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley has stated that Jalaluddin Haqqani and other Taliban leaders are in Pakistan, and in Congress Rep. Frank Pallone urged President Bush and Condoleezza Rice to "work with President [Pervez] Musharraf to eliminate extremist training camps in western Pakistan." The Taliban are currently training and preparing for a bloody spring operation against Afghan, U.S. and NATO troops. Neither exchanging barbed comments nor concealing and misrepresenting the threat is the solution. Frank discussions and constructive engagements are necessary to contain the impending surge of Taliban violence.

The Afghan government values the high price the people of Pakistan are paying to restrain extremism. We appreciate that President Musharraf, a crucial ally of the U.S. and NATO in the war against terror, has recognized the threat posed by cross-border terrorist excursions into Afghanistan and is intending to do more. However, the border is not where the problem lies. Terrorist sanctuaries in Pakistan are the real threat to regional stability and global security. Such sanctuaries are breeding grounds for extremism and violence.

We share the concern of Canada, European countries, the U.N. and human-rights organizations such as Pakistan's Human Rights Commission that new mines will take the lives of many more innocent civilians in one of the most heavily mined regions in the world. In 2005, 825 new landmine casualties were recorded in Afghanistan. The tribes along the border demand and deserve peace, prosperity and human security. Expanding the benefits of development and trade and providing economic aid for the Federally Administered Tribal Areas and the North-West Frontier Province will be the best means of achieving these goals. Mining the border will neither stop trained terrorists nor deter suicide bombers. Rather, these measures will divide nations, tribes and communities with a shared culture and common heritage.

In the past, Pakistan has rightfully objected to the fencing of the Kashmir border as ineffective. The most secure fence becomes useless if the border guards at the crossing points are corrupt or accomplices to the extremists. Laying mines along some of the most mountainous terrain in the world is not only impractical but also irrelevant. If the sources of terror remain untouched we will continue to face this threat, even if the border were to become impenetrable.

Afghanistan remains the original front of the war on terror and the chief victim of the Taliban's safe havens in Pakistan. The international community must help Pakistan take additional steps to ensure that the terrorist threat posed by these havens is contained or eliminated. A concerted plan to close down sanctuaries for training, command, control, regrouping and supply will eliminate cross-border incursions. Such a plan should be accompanied by a dismantling of the Taliban's organizational structure in Quetta, Balochistan and Miranshah, North Waziristan. Our allies in the war against terror should work with Pakistan to shut down those madrassas that have become factories of hatred, as well as sources of recruitment and financial and logistical support.

Strengthening the traditional leadership in the tribal areas will yield valuable dividends. The majority of Pashtuns in our region are victims of extremism. Talibanization is a threat to their identity and culture; extremist groups must not be allowed to suppress nationalist leaders who seek "enlightened moderation," traditional values and secular rule. Tribal elders and civic institutions should be provided effective resources to strengthen civil society and empower moderate political parties. Lifting the ban on political parties in the tribal areas will help fend off extremism. The proposed Joint Peace Jirgas in Afghanistan and Pakistan by President Hamid Karzai are intended to empower the border region's traditional leadership through an honorable and time-tested mechanism of conflict resolution.

Afghanistan is in favor of friendship with all its neighbors, through trade and commerce and people-to-people contacts. The people of Afghanistan and Pakistan demand constructive engagement, and the sincere cooperation of our governments. Since reconstruction began five years ago, Afghanistan has followed global trends to open borders and break down the boundaries, physical or otherwise, between peoples. If we must lay land mines and build fences to prevent attacks against Afghan and Coalition forces, it should be around the terrorist sanctuaries and training grounds, not along the border. We must isolate terrorists, not divide tribes and communities.

Mr. Jawad is the ambassador of Afghanistan to the United States.

Turnover In US Attorneys 'Disruptive' (FT)

By Brooke Masters

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

The current mid-term turn-over in US attorneys is unprecedented and could seriously disrupt pending investigations, witnesses plan to testify at today's Senate judiciary committee hearing on whether the Bush administration is politicising the appointment process for top prosecutors.

Traditionally, US attorneys are named by the president and confirmed by the Senate, although "interim" appointees could serve for 120 days without confirmation.

Last year a little noticed amendment to the Patriot Act reauthorisation allowed the president to make "interim" appointments that lasted indefinitely.

Since then, 13 of the 93 US attorneys have left and at least seven of them were asked to leave by officials in Washington. The departures include the top lawyers in New Mexico, San Diego, Arkansas, Nevada, Washington state and Arizona, according to senators and Justice Department sources.

Democrats have described most of them as respected prosecutors who enjoyed the esteem of their subordinates and were reportedly asked to leave to make room for politically connected insiders.

Senator Chuck Schumer, the New York Democrat, will chair a hearing this morning on the issue. He said: "The highly unusual recent flurry of firings of many well-respected US attorneys not only raises some flags, but also requires some explanations."

Mark Pryor, Democratic senator from Arkansas, planned to testify about the recent appointment of a protege of Karl Rove as interim US attorney in his state. Several other witnesses gave advance copies of their written testimony to the Financial Times.

"We have never seen the type of turnover now in progress, where the attorney-general, not the president, is asking mid-term that demonstrably capable US attorneys submit their resignations so that Washington insiders may be appointed in their place," Laurie Levenson, a Loyola law professor, planned to say.

Mary Jo White, a former US attorney from New York, wrote that turnover has a price. "Changing a United States attorney invariably causes disruption and loss of traction in cases and investigations," she planned to testify.

Justice Department officials declined to make deputy attorney-general Paul McNulty's testimony available. But they have said the Bush administration is not trying to circumvent the traditional appointment process and will seek Senate confirmation for all replacement US attorneys.

The Bush administration has nominated five permanent replacements for the 13 departed US attorneys and three have been confirmed by the Senate. Nine of the last 11 interim appointees are career prosecutors, the Justice Department said.

Justice IT Funding Appears Flat (GCN)

By Wilson P. Dizard III, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, February 6, 2007

But State's IT spending could rise amid centralization

Domestic agencies generally fared poorly in the 2008 budget proposal, and law enforcement technology spending appeared to reflect that reality.

But the State Department's technology arm appears to have both gained control over IT money formerly managed by other agency organizations and bumped up some of its systems spending.

DOJ_NMG_0128418

The draft Justice Department IT spending plan calls for increases in various FBI and department technology projects seeded throughout the department's overall discretionary funding request of $21.8 billion, according to the department's press release.

Detailed funding proposals point to flat or declining funding levels for several flagship programs, such as the Justice Information Sharing Technology program. That project, which covers IT investments across the department, is set to see its total new budget authority dwindle from $103 million in fiscal 2007 to $101 million next year.

The JIST account covers signature programs like the Joint Automated Booking System, the Justice Consolidated Office Network, the Litigation Case Management System, the Law Enforcement Information Sharing Program and the Unified Financial Management System that help hold the department's largely independent bureaus together.

Justice's CIO, Vance Hitch, controls the JIST account and is in position to use it to harmonize the various bureaus' operations.

But Justice's press release touted a $514 million boost to Interpol's links with state and local agencies. Using different yardsticks for the department's IT spending, Justice claimed that the draft budget, when taken as a whole, included $74.5 million in funds for new IT projects.

Justice claims a total IT program increase figure of $133.2 million for new IT projects including projects affecting several department components. That statement in the department's press materials was not reflected in detailed budget documents.

Federal accounting methods, which include various types of transfers between programs and often redirection of funds among renamed projects, can render the analysis of such claims a matter of debate.

The FBI is slated to receive $7.1 billion in newly obligated funds in fiscal 2008, in contrast to a 2007 figure of $6.4 billion.

The bureau's 2008 IT work will partly fall under a $315 million proposed increase in projects to boost information sharing and communications as well as related systems work, according to budget documents.

One section of Justice's budget publicity materials referred to 2008 funding of "$47.5 million to advance the FBI's data intake, information sharing, and IT project management mechanisms, as well as $11.5 million to improve the organization's data storage and work facilities." That statement could not be immediately correlated with detailed budget accounts.

The State Department is slated to receive $10 billion overall in 2008, according to budget documents. Technology spending will account for about $905 million of that figure, State said.

Budget tables indicate that State's Information Resources Management arm is set to control about $848.2 million of that figure. The IRM organization appears set to gain control over significant IT operations of other parts of the department, officials said.

For example, $509.3 million of IRM's budget kitty will flow from diplomatic and consular program accounts, $70.7 million from the department's Capital Investment Fund and about $270 million from various passport and visa fees.

State's IT Central Fund, another method of slicing the diplomatic technology apple, reflects a planned increase to $313 million in technology spending for more than a dozen projects, up from a comparable 2007 figure of $289 million.

Budget Proposal Includes 2.6 Percent Increase For IT (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, February 6, 2007

The Bush administration's fiscal 2008 budget proposal contains a 2.6 percent increase for information technology, but offers few new governmentwide technology projects.

The budget includes about $65.5 billion for IT, up from the $63.8 billion requested for fiscal 2007. Because Congress has failed to finish up the fiscal 2007 spending bills, a detailed breakdown of the request traditionally available upon the budget's release will wait until the spring. In fiscal 2006, the administration sought $65.2 billion for IT.

Jonathan Breul, a senior fellow at the IBM Center for the Business of Government, said the increase in IT spending is not unexpected, "but there was reason to worry that [IT spending] was not going to increase as much."

"My bet is that a good deal of all that is money that's going to national security and homeland security," Breul said. "In many cases, you can count your program several ways. Budget guidance as I understand it was that the war, defense and homeland were going to get 'all that was needed.' So anyone was going to try to frame their activities that way."

The 2008 budget proposal stated that the percent of "well planned and managed" major IT investments went down 17 percent from fiscal 2007 to fiscal 2008, from 594 to 494. Meanwhile, the number of "not well planned and managed" major IT investments rose 32 percent, from 263 to 346. The overall number of major IT investments declined from 857 to 840.

As previously reported, the budget identified agencies that will provide information security services to others as part of the Office of Management and Budget's "lines of business" effort to consolidate back-end IT systems across government. The Office of Personnel Management, U.S. Agency for International Development and the Defense Department will provide shared service centers for security awareness training, and the Environmental Protection Agency and the Justice Department will offer centers for meeting the reporting requirements in a federal law -- the Federal Information Security Management Act.

OMB did not announce new lines of business consolidation projects, as it has in previous budget proposals.

Ray Bjorklund, senior vice president of McLean, Va., Federal Sources Inc., said the lack of initiatives is likely because OMB is still trying to achieve stability for the existing ones.

The budget proposal's update to the lines of business consolidation initiative lists the adoption of uniform governmentwide best practices under its accomplishments. A section on next steps does not include the creation of more shared service centers.

The budget proposal has a heavy emphasis on information security. The proposal stated that the percentage of certified and accredited IT systems rose from 85 percent in fiscal 2005 to 88 percent in fiscal 2006. But certification and accreditation processes deemed "satisfactory" as determined by agency inspector general offices decreased from 68 percent in fiscal 2005 to 60 percent in fiscal 2006 and the number of agencies that can demonstrate an effective process for correcting security weaknesses fell from 19 to 18.

In addition, the budget release included a document evaluating the effectiveness of agencies' IT management and e-government processes, a list of the number of agency IT investments on OMB's management watch list and updates on the e-government initiatives.

Jenny Mandel contributed to this report.

Analysis: Bush's Federal Budget Proposal (FRESBEE)

By Michael Doyle, Bee Washington Bureau

Fresno Bee, February 6, 2007

President Bush on Monday proposed a $2.9 trillion federal budget for Fiscal 2008. The new budget year starts Oct. 1, giving Congress the next eight months to work out the details.

WINNERS:

Yosemite National Park would receive an additional $3,259,000 for operational costs, a 14 percent increase. The money would pay for an additional 28 seasonal rangers to combat marijuana growing.

Sequoia and Kings Canyon national parks would gain an additional $1,410,000 for operations, a 10 percent increase. The money would pay for an additional 13 seasonal rangers.

The administration adds $1 billion to construct fences and other protective measures along the U.S.-Mexico border, and provides more money to hire an additional 3,000 Border Patrol agents.

Some of the roughly 2 million Californians now receiving Food Stamps could benefit, under an administration proposal to exclude retirement savings when calculating eligibility.

The Army Corps of Engineers would spend an additional $42 million on Oakland Harbor to improve commercial navigation.

The Corps of Engineers would spend an additional $18 million on safety improvements for the Success Dam on the Tule River.

The Agriculture Department would spend $200 million on the Market Access Program, the maximum allowed for the grant program that California farm groups use to assist with overseas ads and promotions.

LOSERS:

Cal-Fed, the joint state and federal plan to restore and protect the Sacramento-San Joaquin Delta and other state waterways, would receive a total of $155.6 million. This represents a 44 percent decrease from the Fiscal 2007 total of $199 million.

The State Criminal Alien Assistance Program would be eliminated. Currently, the program receives about $660 million, with the funds provided to states like California that incarcerate large numbers of illegal immigrants.

The Community Oriented Policing Services grant program would be slashed to $32 million, down from the current level of $500 million.

The Justice Department would eliminate a number of other programs, including ones to assist Southwest border prosecutors, stop prison rape and protect Alzheimer's patients.

A Migrant and Seasonal Farm worker training program would be eliminated. This year, the Labor Department is spending $80 million on the program.

Head Start, which serves about 106,000 California children, would bet cut to $6.79 billion, down from $6.89 billion this year.

Attorney General Speaks To Law Students (SMUDC)

By Kelsey Jukam, News Editor

DOJ_NMG_0128420

SMU Daily Campus, February 6, 2007

Law students flocked to the Underwood Law Library Friday at noon, and not just for the free lunch. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who was in town this weekend to receive a distinguished alumni award, spoke to a lecture hall filled with students to discuss the responsibilities of the judicial branch and other topics related to law.

Although Gonzales initially emphasized that each of the three branches of government would affect law students' lives, his speech focused primarily on the role of the judicial branch and the characteristics of good judges. According to Gonzales, judges need to understand their role in the government.

"I am concerned that some judges have lost sight of the goal of the judicial branch," Gonzales said. "It is not the role of judicial branch to make policy."

Gonzales said that judges could maintain the judiciary's independence by making decisions based on neutral policies and respecting precedent. He also believes that the Constitution wasn't intended to address every legal and policy issue, and that by making certain issues constitutional, decisions are then taken out of the hands of the people.

"I'm concerned about judges who think they see a constitutional solution to every societal ill," Gonzales said.

During a question-and-answer session, Gonzales spoke extensively about the USA Patriot Act. The Patriot Act, passed after the attacks of Sept. 11, gave law enforcement more authority to fight terrorism.

"Shortly after the attacks of 9/11, we were looking for additional tools to protect the country," Gonzales said. "The Patriot Act has been extremely helpful in allowing the U.S. government [to] collect information about threats to the government."

Although the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (FISA) prescribes the procedures for requesting judicial authorization for electronic surveillance and physical searches of those who are engaged in espionage, the Bush administration decided that FISA wasn't enough.

"I will say that we really believe FISA was not sufficient to get what we needed," Gonzales said. "So we said let's be creative, let's make this happen."

Gonzales also discussed how the Bush administration selects judges.

"The President and I think it's so important to select judges based on their philosophy of the judiciary's role," Gonzales said. "We do not ask about political views, as they're irrelevant."

Gonzales said that he looks for judges with a general philosophy of restraint, "judges who respect the rule of law, respect the right of the legislature to frame the law," he said.

According to Gonzales, the decision to put certain judges on the bench is the most important of the administration's decisions.

"It's the president's most lasting legacy," Gonzales said.

"The decisions the president makes today impact people around the country for years to come," he added.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Proposed SEC Budget Edges Up (AP)

AP, February 6, 2007

SEC Budget Would Rise 3.2 Percent Under Bush Proposal

--The SEC's budget, after nearly doubling in 2003 under anti-fraud legislation enacted amid the wave of corporate scandals early in the decade, is roughly flat for the third straight year under President Bush's 2007 proposal.

In fact, the administration asked for nearly the same amount last year, $904.8 million. But the agency has been operating at an estimated level of $877.1 million for the budget year ending Oct. 1 because, as is the case for most federal agencies, Congress hasn't yet approved 2007 spending levels.

The budget proposal doesn't call for any new programs at the market watchdog agency. But it is "sufficient for the (SEC) to do its job and do it well," agency Executive Director Diego Ruiz told reporters in a conference call Monday.

It is the second budget under Chairman Christopher Cox, who became head of the agency in August 2005 after 16 years in the House as a Republican from California. Reflecting Cox's interest in technology, the spending plan provides $130 million for information technology, up from $118 million, including improvements in the SEC's online corporate disclosure system.

"American taxpayers can be confident that they will receive an excellent return this year on their investment in the agency as we pursue vast improvements to corporate disclosure and vigorous enforcement of our securities laws," Cox said in a statement.

--The budget also includes $321.2 million for investigations and enforcement actions, higher than estimated 2007 spending of $310.1 million but slightly below last year's original request of $328.1 million. The SEC plans to open 925 new investigations, compared with 960 the previous year.

The SEC and the Justice Department are investigating suspicious timing of stock options grants at more than 100 public companies -- with backdating of options awarded to executives having become corporate America's biggest scandal last year. SEC officials say the agency is focusing on cases of serious fraud -- with elements such as deliberately lying, forging documents or deceiving directors or investors.

In backdating, stock options are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price, fattening profits for options recipients when they sell their shares at higher market prices. Backdating options can be legal as long as the practice is disclosed properly to investors and approved by the company's board. In some cases, however, the practice can violate federal accounting and tax laws.

The SEC also plans to continue enforcement efforts against serious accounting fraud, investment scams preying on seniors, market manipulation and insider trading.

--Also included is $45.1 million for mutual fund and hedge fund oversight, up from $43.6 million in estimated spending for 2007 but below last year's original request of $53.5 million. A program to make mutual funds' disclosures more useful to investors is among the priorities.

--The SEC is funded from fees it charges companies to register and issue securities and for stock trading, though its budget still is subject to congressional approval.

In line with a 2002 federal law, the fees are being reduced by $1 billion starting in the 2007 fiscal year that began last Oct. 1. The reductions will not affect the amount of money available to fund the agency, the government says.

Banks Appeal Ruling Allowing Enron Investors To Sue As Class (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Feb. 5 (Bloomberg News) — Two investment banks, Merrill Lynch and Credit Suisse, asked a federal appeals court yesterday to end a class-action lawsuit by Enron investors seeking $40 billion that they lost when the energy trader collapsed in 2001.

The banks argued that a Houston judge was wrong to allow Enron investors to sue as a group and contended that they could not be sued because they did not participate directly in the accounting fraud that led to Enron's bankruptcy.

The investors argued the court could address only whether the plaintiffs could sue as a group. Trial is set for April in Houston.

"This class certification is putting enormous coercive impact on my client, facing a possible $40 billion exposure," a lawyer for Merrill, Stuart Baskin, argued yesterday before the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans.

A ruling that invalidates class status may reduce any liability the banks might face for Enron losses. In June, Judge Melinda Harmon of Federal District in Houston said investors who bought Enron securities could combine their claims. The decision gave investors, who would otherwise be forced to sue individually, the possibility of a much higher recovery and more leverage in negotiating any settlement.

Other former Enron lenders, like Citigroup, JPMorgan Chase and Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, have settled with investors for more than $7 billion.

Merrill and Credit Suisse argued that Judge Harmon's ruling was based on the mistaken theory that the banks were individually responsible for investor losses because they took part in a scheme run by Enron.

That theory, the banks argued, unfairly allows shareholders to hold individual banks liable for the entire fraud, regardless of whether they knew or participated in the entire scheme.

Enron investors said the appeals court was limited to determining whether Judge Harmon properly combined their claims, not whether the claims had merit. They argued that Merrill and Credit Suisse could be sued under federal securities laws because they both knowingly engaged in the scheme.

"The conduct was directed at the Enron shareholders," Patrick Coughlin, a lawyer for the investors, argued. "That's when I say you've stepped over the line. That goes beyond aiding and abetting."

S.E.C. Is Looking At Stock Trading (NYT)

By Jenny Anderson

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128422

The Securities and Exchange Commission has begun a broad examination into whether Wall Street bank employees are leaking information about big trades to favored clients, like hedge funds, in an effort to curry favor with those clients, executives at Wall Street banks said.

The inquiry, these people said, seems aimed at determining how pervasive insider trading, or the illegal use of market-moving nonpublic information, may be on Wall Street. Knowledge about a large trade, like the sale of a big block of stock by the mutual fund giant Fidelity, would tell a trader which way the stock would move.

Trading ahead of client orders, or front-running, has long been an issue on Wall Street. Large mutual fund companies have often complained in the past that Wall Street brokerage firms were front-running their trades, using information about the funds' plans to buy or sell to make a risk-free bet on a stock's direction.

But the latest S.E.C. investigation appears to have a new twist: Rather than examine whether a bank is trading ahead of its own client by using knowledge of the customer's trade, the scope of the investigation will allow regulators to see if banks tip their valued customers who then go trade at another bank, making the paper trail harder to detect.

The commission sent out letters in mid-January to the major Wall Street banks, including Merrill Lynch, Morgan Stanley, UBS and Deutsche Bank. The commission, according to one Wall Street employee, is requesting a wide swath of information: all stock and option trading data, for themselves and their customers, for the last two weeks of September. Those weeks are the close of the third quarter and investigators may be looking to see any pickup in trading activity as money mangers sought to dress up their returns.

Representatives for the Wall Street banks declined to comment on the investigation.

"Mutual fund traders have long complained that their big trades may be being front-run by market participants with inside information about their trades, and they believe the price on those trades suffers as a result," said Lori Richards, the director of the Office of Compliance Inspections and Examinations at the S.E.C. "We are looking into these allegations in a systemic way. It is fact-finding and too early for any conclusions."

The S.E.C. confirmed the existence of the investigation but declined to comment further.

Concerns about insider trading have escalated as mergers and buyouts have boomed and the use of complex derivatives has soared. Studies of various markets — including those for stocks and credit default swaps — have pointed to an unusual amount of trading ahead of announcements for deals.

The growing power of hedge funds — and their opaqueness and the wide range of trading strategies they employ — is feeding those concerns. Hedge funds control an estimated 30 percent to 50 percent of trading on most major markets. They are also Wall Street's best customers. Hedge funds trade, borrow and finance more, on average, than other clients And as more hedge funds enter a crowded field, the premium on information has never been higher.

With data on millions of trades from most major Wall Street banks, the S.E.C. will try to examine whether outside traders like hedge funds or internal traders like those inside the firm who are trading with the bank's money may be getting tips from the bank handling the mutual fund's trade and using the information to place a trade elsewhere.

"If an investment bank is tipping a hedge fund on a trade we are doing on Dell, those people all need to go to jail," said Andrew M. Brooks, vice president and head of equity trading at T. Rowe Price, the mutual fund company. "We are absolutely concerned and worried and paranoid about information leakage, information that would allow someone to know about our trades and run ahead."

If the commission finds any evidence of possible insider trading, it would then commence a formal investigation. The S.E.C. could ultimately bring civil charges against individuals or firms.

Regulators and law enforcement officials have pursued other cases related to the sharing of information about trades. In what became known as the squawk box case, brokers from institutions, including Merrill Lynch, Citigroup and Lehman Brothers, were accused of allowing traders to listen in on the public outcry system — the squawk box on the trading floors — to glean tips about customer orders coming in.

The S.E.C. sued the A. B. Watley Group and 16 people in the case. Next month, the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn will bring to trial a case against seven people. Two have pleaded guilty to insider trading. While the accusations in the squawk box case involve an obvious dissemination of insider information, detecting whether traders were illegally tipped in huge, fast-moving markets is much harder.

When Linda Chatman Thomsen, head of enforcement at the S.E.C., testified before Congress in September about insider trading, she outlined some of the problems inherent in such cases.

"Piecing together an insider trading case can be a complex and painstaking process," she said. "It is rare to find a 'smoking gun'; virtually all insider trading cases hinge on circumstantial evidence. It is quite common for insider traders to come up with alternative rationales for their trading — rationales that the staff must refute with inferences drawn from the timing of the trades, the movement of the funds and other facts and circumstances."

DOJ_NMG_0128423

There are many gray areas. If Mr. Brooks of T. Rowe Price wants to sell stock in the XYZ Company and he hires a bank to do that, the bank has to call clients to gauge interest in the stock. That is not tipping, but legitimate work for the bank to do.

And detecting any trades will be difficult. If a trader received a tip about a stock whose price was set to rise, that trader could enter into trades that are harder for regulators to detect — like derivatives transactions that are not traded on any exchange and whose value may be linked to a change in a stock price rather than the stock itself or an option on the stock.

Here's how a questionable trade might take place: If Fidelity asked brokerage firm X to sell a large part of its stake in I.B.M., and traders at that brokerage firm told its favorite clients to expect a drop in I.B.M.'s price as a result, that favorite client could go to another brokerage firm — or group of banks or trading venues — and sell I.B.M. shares short, betting on a decline and making money when Fidelity's order went through. The trader could pay back the source of the tip by directing more business to his bank.

"The information is going to the bank as an agent, and the bank is only supposed to use the information for the mutual fund's benefit," said Larry E. Ribstein, a professor of law at the University of Illinois. "If it uses it for someone else's benefit, you might have a concern."

The hedge fund business has long argued that it is unfairly tarnished with suggestions of insider trading. Amid increased scrutiny by regulators into hedge funds' use of information in the loan market, the Managed Funds Association said in a statement last year, "We reaffirm our collective commitment to promote fair and competitive markets in which inappropriate use of material nonpublic information is not tolerated."

Some money managers disagree.

"Hedge funds pay a lot in commissions," said Mr. Brooks of T. Rowe Price. "They are smart and work hard, but they can't be that smart and work that hard to get some of the advantages they have gotten."

"There are too many conflicts of interest between those who serve hedge funds and hedge funds themselves."

Hyundai Motor Chief Gets Three Year Jail Term (FT)

By Song Jung-a In Seoul

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

Hyundai Motor was thrown into disarray on Monday when Chung Mong-koo, its chairman, was sentenced to three years in prison for embezzlement and breach of trust, raising the possibility of a management vacuum at South Korea's largest carmaker.

The punishment was harsher than expected and compounded the woes at Hyundai, which was already grappling with the strong local currency, flagging profits and a disruptive labour union.

But the sentence was welcomed by corporate governance campaigners, who said it showed Korea would no longer tolerate chaebol owners using their companies to pursue their personal interest.

The court found Mr Chung guilty of embezzling about $100m of company funds and inflicting about $224m of damage on group affiliates during rights issues.

He was also convicted of using deals to boost his financial gains and those of his son, Eui-sun, who runs affiliate Kia Motors.

"The defendant's act of secretively setting up massive slush funds and using them wilfully, using his status as the Hyundai Motor group's chairman, undermines the soundness and the autonomy of corporate management," said Kim Dong-oh, the Seoul central district court judge.

"The court decided a strict execution of law was necessary to eradicate illegal and anti-market practices in the past and help South Korea build a more advanced economy," he said.

The 68-year-old hairman was freed on bail to "guarantee his defending rights and to minimise its impact on the economy" while he appeals the conviction, the court said.

Hyundai and Kia together make up more than 70 per cent of South Korea's auto exports – and about 7 per cent of the country's total exports – but has been buffeted by the strong Korean won and a series of strikes. It reported a 34 per cent slump in last year's profit.

The court also handed a two-and-half-year jail term to Kim Dong-jin, Hyundai's vice-chairman. Two other Hyundai executives were also given jail terms. The sentences were suspended.

Hyundai Motor shares fell more than 3 per cent after the verdict but ended the day flat at Won69,800.

The company said it was "greatly disappointed" by the ruling but added it would not affect the group's operations.

"Chairman Chung retains full operational control and decision-making authority for long-term strategic issues affecting Hyundai Motor and its affiliates," Hyundai said, adding that Hyundai and Kia operations would continue to function as normal.

But the ruling cast a cloud over the company, analysts said, although they said it was unlikely Mr Chung would spend any time in a prison cell. The appellate court was likely to suspend his sentence, they added. The appeal could take up to a year.

Fannie Mae's Former Chief Wants Earlier Hearing Date (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

Former Fannie Mae chairman and chief executive Franklin D. Raines, accused of manipulating the housing finance company's earnings, is challenging regulators to make their case against him beginning Feb. 16 instead of waiting until the end of the year.

Attorneys for Raines have argued that the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which issued administrative charges in December, is required by law to begin a hearing on the evidence within 60 days of that event.

The agency, however, has proposed a schedule that would have the two sides file pretrial statements in December. The agency's proposal did not say when the hearing should begin.

"It's a fundamental issue of fairness," said Mark Fabiani, a spokesman for Raines. "Frank Raines is ready to disprove OFHEO's allegations starting this month, and OFHEO is seeking to delay the proceedings until 2008."

A spokeswoman for OFHEO declined to explain the agency's reasons.

"We will respond in an appropriate filing as part of our routine communications in the administrative proceeding," spokeswoman Corinne Russell said.

The agency previously expressed concern about being overwhelmed by litigation related to Raines and the accounting scandal. In a lawsuit shareholders brought over Fannie Mae's accounting, the agency stated that complying with Raines's document requests could pose such a burden that it could divert regulators from their mission.

Raines's trial before an administrative law judge would be the culmination of a process regulators set in motion more than two years ago. In fall 2004, after an extended probe, OFHEO issued a report alleging that Fannie Mae used improper accounting. The Securities and Exchange Commission later agreed.

The ensuing storm drove Raines, a former federal budget director, into premature retirement.

District-based Fannie Mae, chartered by the federal government to promote affordable housing, ultimately determined that it overstated past profits by $6.3 billion.

In December, OFHEO issued administrative charges against Raines and two other former executives seeking to recoup more than $115 million of compensation they allegedly received while the earnings were misstated. The agency also is seeking penalties that could exceed $100 million.

All three former executives have denied the charges. The other executives, former chief financial officer J. Timothy Howard and former controller Leanne G. Spencer, back Raines's effort to force an administrative trial this month, their lawyers said.

At the trial's conclusion, an administrative law judge is to make a recommendation to the OFHEO director.

The three former executives say that the OFHEO director has prejudged the matter. An attorney for Raines has argued that the director, James B. Lockhart III, is using Raines as a prop in a campaign to persuade Congress to expand the powers of Fannie Mae's regulators.

As Raines seeks to begin the administrative trial sooner rather than later, he and the other former executives are seeking to move the case to federal court.

Probe Amplifies Conflict-of-Interest Questions For Chamber Of Commerce Chief (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

As president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Thomas J. Donohue has long been obliged to talk tough against federal regulation, especially by the Securities and Exchange Commission. But now, it's personal.

For 12 years, Donohue has been a board member (including serving on the audit committee) of Sunrise Senior Living, a publicly traded company being probed by the SEC.

Sunrise co-founder Paul Klaassen started as Donohue's driver while still in college and later was a Chamber speechwriter. Donohue, 68, believed in Klaassen so strongly that he allowed Klaassen and his wife to live in his house while they started Sunrise more than two decades ago. He then helped finance the firm's prototype facility by taking out a second mortgage and becoming one of the company's first big investors.

Recently, the SEC opened an inquiry into allegations that the Klaassens and other insiders, including Donohue, may have improperly cashed $32 million in stock options before Sunrise in May announced an accounting problem that caused its stock to drop. Donohue calls the allegations meritless and says they were drummed up by labor unions that want to organize the company. He said that he has not been contacted by the SEC and that its inquiry will amount to nothing.

Nonetheless, the controversy adds fuel to complaints that investor activists have leveled at Donohue ever since he took over and revived the Chamber, the nation's largest business lobby, in 1997.

They have questioned how Donohue could serve on boards at all. After all, they point out, an independent director is supposed to represent stockholders, not management, which is Donohue's constituency. They have also worried that Donohue might tilt the Chamber's potent lobbying to favor the companies he serves. Donohue is a director of Union Pacific, the country's biggest railroad, and XM Satellite Radio as well as Sunrise.

And now that Sunrise is being scrutinized by the SEC, critics are adding a new complaint. They say Donohue has diminished the value of his own arguments against certain regulations because he has a personal stake in curtailing them.

"It undercuts his credibility as a critic of SEC enforcement and regulation," said Barbara Roper, director of investor protection for the Consumer Federation of America. "He undermines any claim he might have to objectivity."

Donohue disagrees. He said the Chamber's board encourages him to serve as a director because it allows him to see firsthand the harm that overregulation causes.

"That I serve on corporate boards gives me a better understanding of what goes on in a boardroom," he said. "The better you understand something, the better you can figure out how to deal with it."The Chamber Fights Back

The Chamber faces a far more hostile Congress with Democrats in charge. But it is not retreating.

"We refuse to wring our hands and say, 'Oh, we have new chairmen, we have a president who's not as strong as we'd like. Oh, woe is me, what are we going to do?' " Donohue said. "We're going to saddle up the horse and get going."

The Chamber will soon launch its third anti-trial-lawyer newspaper. It already owns two legal periodicals, the Madison County Record in Illinois and the West Virginia Record in Charleston, which publish stories that highlight what it considers trial lawyers' abuse of lawsuits against businesses. It will shortly open a yet-unnamed newspaper in southeastern Texas, which it calls a hotbed of anti-business legal actions.

In addition, the Chamber plans a huge new effort to "manage" government's reaction to global warming. The tentatively named Institute for Energy Security, Competitiveness and American Jobs will raise about $20 million from oil companies, electric utilities and automakers to try to temper Washington's regulation of greenhouse gas emissions.Donohue vs. Airlines

A travel industry coalition called the Discover America Partnership unveiled a proposal last week to ease the entry of foreign visitors into this country and to promote tourism in the United States abroad. To pay the plan's $300 million tab, the group suggested that a modest fee could be imposed on airplane travelers leaving this country -- an option that the Air Transport Association opposed.

Donohue ridiculed the airlines' position. Nobody cares "about a $2 fee on the ticket or something, they just don't want to get in another line to pay it," he said. "Would your El Salvadoran maid, legitimately in the United States, who is going home to see her family, care about a $2 fee? If she does, she shouldn't go."

People will be miffed at that statement, he added, "but I don't care."Winners and Losers

Low-income people and small-business owners were the big winners in legislation the Senate passed last week that would boost the minimum wage and expand tax breaks for small businesses that would be hurt most by the change.

Yet buried in the bill were write-offs not just for small firms but also for restaurants and retailers of any size. Score victories for the National Restaurant Association and the National Retail Federation, which lobbied hard for the measure.

The legislation's losers include the Chamber and the National Association of Manufacturers, which tried and failed to block the bill's elimination of tax-free deferred compensation for highly paid executives.

A major thumbs down also goes to the AFL-CIO, which called the Senate's action "disgraceful" because of the business benefits, even though it has fought for a minimum-wage increase for years.Hires of the Week

African Americans are vastly underrepresented among lobbyists. The Washington Government Relations Group, a trade association of black lobbyists, has about 100 members and a database of black federal lobbyists that tops 200 names. That compares with 31,000 registered lobbyists overall.

But the Democratic takeover on Capitol Hill has thickened the ranks of black lobbyists quickly, thanks in part to the new prominence of the Congressional Black Caucus. African American staffers who have recently joined the lobbying ranks include: Paul Brathwaite, former executive director of the caucus, now with Podesta Group; Joyce Brayboy, former chief of staff to Rep. Melvin Watt (D-N.C.), now with Glover Park Group; Richard R. Boykin, former chief of staff to Rep. Danny K. Davis (D-Ill.), now with Barnes & Thornburg; Jennifer Fisher, ex-aide to Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.), now at the American Dental Association; and ex-caucus aide Myra Dandridge, now at the National Association of Broadcasters.

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Acknowledges Gaps In Notes On Libby (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — An FBI agent acknowledged today that investigators' notes from an October 2003 interview with Lewis "Scooter" Libby differed from the agent's testimony last week.

FBI agent Deborah Bond testified on Friday that Libby "adamantly denied" that he discussed the identity of a covert CIA officer with other administration officials before July 10 or July 11, 2003. That's when Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, said he learned the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame from NBC reporter Tim Russert.

Plame is the wife of former State Department official Joseph Wilson. Wilson accused Cheney and the White House of exaggerating claims that Iraq was trying to buy uranium from the African nation of Niger.

Libby made the denial during an October 2003 interview with Bond and other agents, she said. The agents were investigating whether administration officials had violated the law prohibiting the disclosure of a covert officer's identity.

This morning, however, defense lawyer Theodore Wells pointed out that the FBI agents' notes of their interview with Libby don't use the words "adamant" or "denial."

Wells read from agents' notes that "Libby probably talked about the Wilson matter but does not recall talking about Wilson's wife" during a July 7, 2003, lunch with then-White House press secretary Ari Fleischer.

"He says he does not recall having discussions; he does not deny them, correct?" Wells asked.

"That's true," Bond replied. But she qualified her answer by saying that in other answers during the interview, Libby had effectively "denied" the allegation, even if he never used the precise word.

Wells was attempting to buttress the defense's argument that Libby never deliberately misled investigators or grand jurors about how and when he learned the CIA employee's identity. At worst, Wells has argued, Libby was a victim of poor memory.

Libby faces federal charges of perjury, obstruction of justice and lying to investigators about when he learned Plame's identity and with whom he discussed her. Since testimony in the trial began last month, eight government witnesses, including two reporters, have contradicted Libby's account of learning Plame's identity from Russert.

The government contends that Plame's identity was leaked as part of a plan by Cheney's office to undermine Wilson. On July 6, 2003, in two newspaper stories and on Meet the Press, Wilson had accused Cheney's office of ignoring Wilson's report that Iraq was not seeking uranium in Niger.

Before Bond's testimony, U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton ruled that audiotapes of Libby's grand jury appearances in 2004 will be made public after the tapes have been played in court.

Another Libby lawyer, William Jeffress, had opposed releasing the tapes, arguing that the airplay and commentary that "sound bites" are likely to produce could prejudice jurors against his client.

"This is great stuff" from the media's standpoint, Jeffress argued.

Nathan Siegel, representing several media organizations including USA TODAY, argued for making the tapes public. He said that because jurors already will have heard the tapes in court, they are unlikely to be tainted by any sound bites or commentary they accidentally hear.

Walton, who instructs jurors every day to avoid coverage of the case, reluctantly agreed. He said case law in the District of Columbia supports the "right to access" and "gives me no choice."

Walton warned media organizations not to "cause mischief" by quoting segments of Libby's testimony out of context.

Libby's Grand Jury Tapes Are Heard In Court (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5 — Prosecutors in the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. on Monday played audio tapes in which Mr. Libby was heard testifying under oath before a grand jury that he had not discussed the identity of a Central Intelligence Agency operative with fellow administration officials in the summer of 2003.

The sound of Mr. Libby's disembodied voice coursing through the courtroom vividly underlined the contrast between his sworn account and the testimony of the parade of prosecution witnesses presented to the jury in the last two weeks.

Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is charged with lying to that grand jury and to F.B.I. agents who were investigating the leak to reporters of the identity of the C.I.A. officer, Valerie Wilson.

DOJ_NMG_0128427

The jury on Monday listened to 90 minutes of Mr. Libby's grand jury testimony from March 5, 2004, in which he was questioned in a straightforward, almost friendly manner by the chief prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald. Mr. Libby was heard responding in earnest tones.

On the tape, Mr. Libby was heard saying repeatedly that he could not recall any conversation he ever had with Marc Grossman, a State Department official, about Ms. Wilson.

Mr. Grossman, who was then the under secretary of state, has already testified about two such conversations. Mr. Grossman told the jury that Mr. Libby anxiously asked him that summer about news that a former ambassador had traveled to Africa to investigate reports that Saddam Hussein was trying to buy uranium there for his nuclear weapons program.

Mr. Grossman recounted his conversations with Mr. Libby, even noting that one occurred just outside the White House situation room after a meeting of senior officials.

Mr. Grossman told the jury that he had reported back to Mr. Libby at their second meeting that the former ambassador was Joseph C. Wilson IV, and that he had been sent to Africa by the C.I.A. He also told Mr. Libby that Mr. Wilson's wife worked at the agency and appeared to have had a major role in choosing him for the assignment.

The audio tapes, which were played with a synchronized running transcript on television screens in the courtroom, seemed to hold the attention of the jurors, who also followed the dialogue printed in loose-leaf binders.

Monday's tapes were only the first part of what is to be a total of eight hours that the jury will hear. Judge Reggie B. Walton warned jurors to ask for a break if their attention was flagging.

As the tapes were played, Mr. Libby sat mostly motionless and expressionless.

Judge Walton denied a defense motion arguing that the tapes should not be given to the news media to play to the public. The entire eight hours will be released after the jury has heard all the tapes.

The remaining grand jury testimony, which will include Mr. Libby's second appearance on March 24, 2004, is certain to include denials from Mr. Libby about conversations with other officials who have already testified that they spoke with him about Ms. Wilson.

Ms. Wilson's name was first disclosed in a July 14, 2003, column by Robert Novak, only days after The New York Times published an Op-Ed article written by Mr. Wilson asserting that the Bush White House had willfully distorted intelligence about Iraq's efforts to obtain uranium in Niger.

To demonstrate that Mr. Libby lied to the F.B.I. as well, which is charged in the indictment, prosecutors put Deborah S. Bond, an agent, on the stand. Ms. Bond, who was present at the two interviews of Mr. Libby in his office in October and November of 2003 completed her testimony on Monday but acknowledged she may have testified incorrectly last Thursday.

Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's chief defense lawyer, was magnanimous with a purpose when he pointed out her error over a conversation between Mr. Libby and Karl Rove, the deputy White House chief of staff.

"I can't believe I said it," Ms. Bond said when shown last week's testimony. Mr. Wells then prodded her to say that she must have answered in good faith but simply forgot, a proposition to which she readily agreed.

It was a reminder to the jury that one of the pillars of Mr. Libby's defense was that if he spoke inaccurately to the grand jury and investigators, it was only a case of faulty memory.

Jurors Listen To Libby's Grand Jury Tapes (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby told a grand jury in 2004 that Vice President Cheney did not encourage him to provide information about an undercover CIA officer to the media, but Libby also said he did not believe that the information was secret and had to be safeguarded, according to audiotapes of Libby's testimony played in court yesterday.

Testifying to the grand jury in the probe that eventually led to criminal charges against him, Libby, Cheney's then-chief of staff, said he remembered Cheney telling him in June 2003 that the wife of a prominent war critic worked at the CIA. Libby said it was the first time he had heard that, but that Cheney said it in "sort of an offhand manner, as a curiosity."

Libby also testified that he "could not recall" details of events and conversations he had that summer with Cheney and other administration officials regarding the war critic, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV. Wilson that summer accused the administration of twisting intelligence he had gathered about Iraq's efforts to develop a nuclear weapons program as the White House launched the invasion of Iraq and sold it to the public.

The eight hours of audiotapes, most of which are to be played today, are intended to back up the government's claim that Libby lied to investigators about his role in disclosing the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame, Wilson's wife. Prosecutors have alleged that Plame's name was leaked as part of a campaign to discredit Wilson by spreading the idea that his CIA-sponsored trip was the result of nepotism.

Libby is charged not with the leak but with five felony counts of perjury, making false statements and obstruction of justice. He has pleaded not guilty, contending that he inaccurately remembered events when he said he learned of Plame from NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert and forgot he first heard of her from Cheney.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton agreed yesterday that the audiotapes should be released to the media after they are played for the jury, despite strenuous arguments by Libby's defense attorneys that they not be released during trial. Defense lawyer William Jeffress Jr. said the news generated by the tapes -- and the public buzz about them -- could be so widespread that there was a risk jurors could accidentally encounter it, perhaps while riding buses or the Metro.

A consortium of news organizations, including The Washington Post, sought the tapes, arguing that they were no different from other evidence in the trial, which is being released publicly the day it is introduced. They successfully argued that Libby's testimony is far less sensational than other tapes that have been released in court, such as 911 emergency phone calls from inside the World Trade Center after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and FBI tapes from the Abscam investigation.

Inside the courtroom, the idea of listening to eight hours of Libby testimony had some jurors' mouths dropping open. But they listened keenly late into the afternoon.

On the tapes, Libby's voice became noticeably softer and trailed off on some questions. He paused often, never rushing his answers. Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald, who posed the questions, warned Libby he could face perjury charges if he did not tell the grand jury the truth.

On the tapes, Libby said that Cheney did not tell him Plame's CIA identity was "super-super-secret" and that he used a "curious" tone unlike his regular voice, which "was much more matter-of-fact and straight." Libby said he did not remember Cheney speaking harshly of Wilson or suggesting nepotism was the reason for his mission. He said Cheney made the reference to Wilson's wife in the middle of advising Libby on how to respond to claims that Wilson had been sent on the mission because of questions from the vice president's office.

Libby said a column by the New York Times's Nicholas Kristof in May 2003, which suggested Cheney's role, "caught my eye." But Libby said he did not "have any recollection" of Cheney or President Bush taking note of the article.

Libby also said he could not recall ever asking then-Undersecretary of State Marc Grossman in late May 2003 about Wilson's trip to Niger. Grossman testified two weeks ago that he directed some of his staff to produce a report about Wilson's CIA mission after Libby called him urgently trying to learn more about how and why Wilson was sent to investigate whether Iraq was trying to purchase uranium from the African nation.

Late last night, Libby's defense began laying the groundwork to keep Libby from having to testify. Walton had warned that Libby would have to take the stand in order for the court to allow his lawyers to claim his misstatements to investigators were caused by a faulty or overtaxed memory.

In court papers filed last night, though, Libby's attorneys argued that he should be allowed to present evidence of the "crush of his duties," including by having Cheney describe them on the witness stand, without being forced to testify on his own behalf.

Court Hears Grand Jury Testimony (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby told a federal grand jury three years ago that he did not believe he had discussed the wife of an administration critic with officials from the CIA and the State Department, contradicting sworn testimony by the officials at Libby's perjury trial here.

The revelation came Monday as prosecutors began playing audiotapes of Libby's eight hours of testimony before a grand jury investigating how the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame became public.

The transcript of Libby's two grand jury appearances in March 2004 also shows that special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald explored early on whether President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney were involved in the circumstances leading to the disclosure of Plame's identity as a CIA employee.

Libby told the grand jury that Cheney was the first to tell him, in June 2003, that the wife of former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV worked in the arms-proliferation division of the CIA. But the vice president's former chief of staff denied that his boss had instructed him to pass on information about Wilson's wife to anyone else.

Fitzgerald then asked Libby whether he or Cheney had ever discussed with Bush the criticism from Wilson that was beginning to surface in media reports. He said he had not.

Plame's identity was revealed in a syndicated column by Robert Novak on July 14, 2003, eight days after an opinion article by Wilson in the New York Times charged that the Bush administration had twisted intelligence reports about then-Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's interest in obtaining uranium yellowcake from the African nation of Niger.

At the CIA's request, Wilson had investigated those claims the previous year. Although he found them to be without merit, a 16-word section of Bush's 2003 State of the Union address asserted that Iraq was seeking nuclear material in Africa.

In May 2003, a New York Times op-ed columnist disputed the accuracy of that section. He wrote that "the vice president's office had asked for an investigation of the uranium deal" more than a year earlier, and that an unnamed ambassador had traveled to Africa and reported that the allegations were baseless.

Prosecutors contend that Plame's identity was disclosed as part of an effort to discredit her husband by suggesting that the trip to Africa came only because his wife worked at the CIA.

Under federal law, it can be a crime to intentionally disclose the status of a covert CIA employee, and Fitzgerald was asked by the Justice Department to determine whether that law had been broken. No one has been charged with that crime. The only charges filed have been against Libby, on perjury and obstruction of justice counts.

The audiotape of the grand jury proceedings is the first time that the jury in Libby's trial has heard from the defendant in any form. His words directly contradict the testimony last month of former CIA official Robert Grenier and former State Department Undersecretary Marc Grossman. Both said they had told Libby that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA.

On the audiotape, Libby told the grand jury that he could not recall discussing Wilson's wife with either official.

"I, I don't recall," he said, asked specifically by Fitzgerald whether Grossman had told him about Wilson's wife.

"You have no memory of that whatsoever?" Fitzgerald said.

"Sorry, sir, I don't," Libby replied.

Fitzgerald also quizzed Libby about a series of notes he took while talking on the phone with Cheney on or about June 12, 2003.

Libby said that Cheney was giving him a series of talking points on rebutting Wilson's contentions, including a suggestion that the vice president had authorized the trip and should have known what was learned.

Cheney did mention that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA, Libby told the grand jury, adding that he did not attach much significance to the disclosure.

The vice president "said to me in sort of an offhand manner, as a curiosity, that his wife worked at the CIA," Libby testified.

"Was he curious about it in a sort of negative way?" Fitzgerald asked. "Did he think that was sort of odd that a former ambassador's wife worked … at the CIA?"

"I wouldn't say negative, but I would say it was a fact … not everybody's wife works there," Libby responded. "So it was a new fact, that's all."

Libby said he did not believe that Cheney wanted him to leak word about Wilson's wife to the press.

"Was there a reason?" Fitzgerald asked.

"No. It just wasn't a particularly powerful point compared to the other points. I didn't understand it to be a point worth mentioning in that context," Libby replied.

Fitzgerald has said that Libby lied to the grand jury and to federal investigators to cover up his concern that he had leaked classified information about Plame to reporters.

Libby has said that he first learned about Plame from Tim Russert, the moderator of "Meet the Press" and the Washington bureau chief of NBC News. Russert, who is expected to testify on Wednesday, has said he did not give Libby that information. Libby has said that at the time he spoke with Russert he had forgotten that Cheney had told him about Plame.

Fitzgerald said he would play the rest of the grand jury tapes today and complete his case Wednesday, at which time Libby's lawyers will begin their defense.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton ruled Monday morning that the tapes, along with the transcripts, would be made available to the public after Fitzgerald introduces them into evidence.

Libby's lawyers had fought to keep them secret because of concerns that the jury might hear them out of court and because the tapes included prejudicial statements.

Fitzgerald agreed to delete a portion of the transcript in which Libby recorded notes from a conversation with a Cheney media aide who described Wilson as "a snake."

Walton also ruled that the government could introduce two newspaper articles found in Libby's files discussing Plame's "clandestine" status at the CIA.

News Media Cheer Ruling On Libby Tapes (AP)

AP, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - News organizations praised a judge's decision Monday to release tapes of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's grand jury testimony, saying it would open a window into court proceedings.

DOJ_NMG_0128430

U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton said he would make the eight-hour recordings public even though he was worried that jurors could be influenced by outside media buzz.

Federal law supports the public release of evidence presented to a jury. But judges in high-profile cases occasionally have released only written transcripts or have delayed public disclosure until the trial's end.

"This is a victory for the public's right to know," said Karen Magnuson, president of the Associated Press Managing Editors and editor of the Democrat and Chronicle newspaper in Rochester, N.Y.

"Audio adds a layer of information that citizens can use to become more informed about the way government operates," she said.

Walton's ruling is a bit of a rarity in a federal court system that generally bans tape recorders and cameras in the courtroom. In the Libby trial, the impact also could be magnified due to the growing influence of Internet news.

The tapes took up part of Monday and are expected to run through Tuesday, as well, with public release afterward.

"This is a blogger's dream," said Jim Angle, chief Washington correspondent for Fox News, who has been covering the trial and plans to use at least some audio snippets in his reports. "What was previously secret grand jury testimony, you now get a public window into the process."

"You get to hear over and over remarks on which he was indicted and you get to make your own judgment," he said.

Other major networks, including ABC, CBS, CNN and NBC, said they would go through the audiotapes and determine how much to broadcast.

"Federal courts are difficult and tricky things to cover. It's one area where the electronic media is really not as able to cover as well as print media," said David Bohrman, CNN's Washington bureau chief. "To be able to have some access to these electronic recordings will make our coverage more realistic."

C-SPAN will also review the recordings and anticipates they may be used on television, radio and its Internet site, said spokeswoman Jennifer Moire.

Libby is charged with perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI in an indictment that focuses in part on his statements to a federal grand jury investigating the leak of the CIA identity of Valerie Plame.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald successfully fought to enter the tapes into evidence and planned to play about eight hours of Libby's closed-door testimony.

Although quotes from Libby's testimony would be widely distributed anyway by reporters who are covering the trial, his lawyers had argued that the audio was too sensitive to be released until the trial ended.

Nathan Siegel, an attorney representing The Associated Press and more than a dozen other news organizations, contended that Libby's own words were far less prejudicial than evidence released in other cases, including 911 calls from inside the World Trade Center, FBI tapes in the Abscam investigation and mob wiretap tapes.

In a telephone interview, Siegel said Walton's ruling could have significant impact for future cases at a time when audio and videotaping of statements for trial are becoming more common.

"It certainly helps the broadcast media," he said. "But it helps other outlets, too, now that you've got newspaper Web sites, with opportunities for greater use of audio and video."

In the tapes, Libby discusses conversations he had regarding Plame, whose identity was leaked to reporters in 2003.

Jane Kirtley, a media ethics professor at the University of Minnesota, said Walton's decision pointed to a "new generation of judges more comfortable" with removing roadblocks to public access to trial evidence.

As an example, Kirtley noted that the Supreme Court under Chief Justice John Roberts has shown some flexibility by releasing audio recordings of its own arguments in high-profile cases.

While there could be distortion of news accounts of the grand jury tapes, the same could be said of transcripts of grand jury proceedings that are routinely released during trials, she said.

Mr. Cheney, Tear Down This Wall (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

At the Republican National Convention in 2000 that nominated him for vice president, Dick Cheney told a rapturous crowd that Democrats “will offer more lectures, and legalisms, and carefully worded denials. We offer another way, a better way, and a stiff dose of truth.”

So, Mr. Cheney, now that the Scooter Libby trial is raising doubts about your own integrity, you owe the nation an explanation. Here are a few questions to help frame your explanation of your activities:

DOJ_NMG_0128431

Mr. Vice President, did you push Mr. Libby to dig into Joe Wilson's background and discredit him? Mr. Libby made such a major effort to gather materials from the C.I.A. and State Department about Mr. Wilson — both before and after you told him on June 12, 2003, that his wife worked at the C.I.A. — that it seems likely that you commanded the effort. True?

What did you mean when you wrote, in a note to Scott McClellan that has been entered into evidence, "not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy the Pres. that was asked to stick his head in the meat grinder because of incompetence of others."

First, you wrote that it was "the Pres." who had asked Mr. Libby to do this, and then you crossed out those two words. Did President Bush indeed ask that Mr. Libby take charge of the effort to discredit Ambassador Wilson? And is it true, as was hinted at in the trial, that the White House tried to block the release of this document?

When you discussed Joe Wilson with Mr. Libby on Air Force Two on July 12, 2003, what instructions did you give him?

Trial testimony indicates that on that flight, Mr. Libby looked over some questions a reporter had sent in about Mr. Wilson and then said: "Let me go talk to the boss and I'll be back." After consulting with you, Mr. Libby later called reporters to feed them a skewed version of Mr. Wilson's trip.

Mr. Cheney, on that plane, did you specifically tell Mr. Libby to leak to reporters the fact that Mr. Wilson's wife worked at the C.I.A.?

Deborah Bond of the F.B.I. has testified that Mr. Libby acknowledged in one of his interviews that on that flight, he might have talked to you about whether to tell the news media about Valerie Wilson. So did he?

Since Mr. Libby is renowned for his caution, it seems highly unlikely that he would have leaked classified information twice to reporters right after talking to you, unless you had sanctioned the leak.

During the leak investigation, were you aware that Mr. Libby was telling the F.B.I. apparently false information?

You rode to work with him nearly every day in your limousine, and the issue never came up? Or did you ask Mr. Libby to protect you because you didn't want it known that in fact you were the one who had told him about Ms. Wilson? Was there some other information you wanted kept secret?

Were you trying to cover up your own reliance on misinformation about Iraqi W.M.D. by blaming the C.I.A. and anybody else within range, like Mr. Wilson?

More than anybody, Mr. Vice President, you made the argument in the run-up to the war that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction. And one senses, in the indictment and the trial testimony, that by the early summer of 2003, there was panic in your office that the W.M.D. had failed to materialize.

So when Ambassador Wilson came forward, you seem to have been infuriated. You tried to blame the C.I.A., and then your office tried to discredit Mr. Wilson by arguing that he had simply enjoyed a junket arranged by his wife.

Robert Grenier, a C.I.A. official, told the court that he thought the White House was "trying to avoid responsibility for positions that they took with regard to the truth about whether or not Iraq had attempted to acquire uranium from Niger." So did this all arise from an attempted cover-up?

So when are you going to come clean?

When Richard Nixon was accused of misusing campaign contributions in 1952, he gave his famous Checkers speech. When questions rose about Spiro Agnew's conduct in 1973, he repeatedly addressed them in public. (Look, you know you're in trouble when the press tries to hold you to the same standards of transparency and integrity as Nixon and Agnew.)

I'm not accusing you of committing a crime. But there are serious questions here, and you owe the nation not legalisms, but that "stiff dose of truth." If you continue to stonewall, then you don't belong in office and you should resign.

Difference Between Classified And Secret At Heart Of Libby Trial (ABC)

By Pam Coulter

ABC News, February 5, 2007

CIA Leak Case Focuses on Govt's Non Disclosure Agreements

WASHINGTON - Feb. 5, 2007— - In government, there's often a conflict between what can be aired publicly and what should be kept under wraps. There is no doubt about the value of keeping secret the movement of military forces in wartime. There is plenty of information that should be released, yet is jealously guarded by government officials. Sunshine laws and the Freedom of Information Act are designed to counter too much secrecy.

Secrecy and the lack of it are at the heart of the perjury and obstruction trial of former White House aide Lewis 'Scooter' Libby. The case has its origins in allegations that the Bush Administration twisted intelligence data to justify a pre-emptive war with Iraq. The prosecution believes there was a concerted effort to discredit the war critic by unmasking his CIA wife.

There is no dispute at the Libby trial that Valerie Plame's CIA identity was CLASSIFIED information. It was the CIA that officially requested a Justice Department investigation of who leaked her name to reporters, a possible violation of the Intelligence Identities Protection Act of 1982. But no one has been charged with violating that law, which carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and a 50-thousand dollar fine.

Documents in the case and testimony at the trial show a number of top administration officials discussed Valerie Plame with reporters. Former State Department official Richard Armitage, former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer, Karl Rove, and Scooter Libby, among them. An FBI agent also testified that Libby said it's possible he and Vice President Dick Cheney discussed leaking Plame's name to journalists. It was such an incendiary topic, former Time Magazine reporter Matthew Cooper told his bureau chief the information should be considered "double super secret background."

Simply discussing an undercover operative is not enough to violate the law. You have to know the agent in question is covert and the government is taking steps to conceal the person's identity, and the disclosure must be intentional. So after a more than three year long investigation, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald has only charged Scooter Libby with lying and trying to obstruct his leak investigation. When he announced the indictment, Fitzgerald compared the offense to someone kicking sand into an umpire's eyes.

It is possible that Libby and other officials violated an agreement all federal employees are required to sign before they are given access to sensitive national security data. It's the standard classified information nondisclosure agreement. That document recognizes that "special confidence and trust shall be placed in me by the United States Government."

The signatory (employee who signs the agreement) must acknowledge receiving a briefing on the nature and protection of classified information and a warning that any unauthorized disclosure or "negligent handling of classified information" could cause "irreparable injury to the United States." The agreement also says if the employee is uncertain about the classification status of information, he or she is required to confirm the information is unclassified before disclosing it. Any violation of the nondisclosure agreement can result in termination of security clearances, removal from a particular position, or firing.

The prosecution suggests this may be one reason why Libby lied to the FBI and a grand jury about his discussions with reporters. He may have feared loss of his clearance, which could have cost him his job of National Security Adviser to the Vice President.

And when the scandal was breaking, President Bush said anyone in his administration who leaked classified information would no longer work for his administration.

Miller Tied To '92 Conflict-of-interest Fine (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, February 6, 2007

Rep. Gary Miller (R-Calif.) last week blamed an FBI review of his land deals on a media smear campaign. But this is not the first time government agencies have scrutinized his real estate transactions.

In 1992, the California Fair Political Practices Commission (FPPC), a state government entity that regulates political activity and investigates conflict-of-interest allegations, levied a $1,750 fine against Covina City Councilman Christopher Lancaster for accepting $8,000 from Miller before voting in favor of a resolution Miller sponsored.

The payment occurred when Lancaster was mayor of Covina and Miller was a member of the Diamond Bar City Council and running for state Senate.

According to an FPPC summary of the case, Miller's campaign committee paid Lancaster the money for "his work as a political campaign consultant." On Sept. 17, 1990, Lancaster voted in favor of Miller's resolution, which created a formula for the exchange and division of property tax revenue between Los Angeles County and the City of Covina.

"The resolution was initiated by Gary Miller to enable him to annex 52 acres of undeveloped land into the City of Covina," the case summary states. "Miller held an option to buy this acreage."

City councils regularly negotiate exchanges of the property tax for annexed land based on the expenses the city and the county have incurred regarding the land, usually in the form of government services. In many cases, these agreements must take place, and the city must pass a resolution laying out the exchange rate before the land can be transferred to the city.

An FPPC stipulation, decision and order signed by Lancaster and Wayne Ordos, executive director of the commission, in late 1992 pinpoints a critical matter in the case.

"Although the resolution had no impact on the amount of taxes on this property, passage of such a resolution was one of the steps necessary for the annexation process to move forward," it states. "Annexation into the City of Covina would have had a financial effect on the fifty-two acres on which Miller held an option agreement."

Annexing land from counties to cities immediately increases the value of the property because the city provides services such as sewer maintenance, according to an initial review of the case summary by the Center for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW).

Shaun Martin, a law and ethics professor at the University of San Diego, said annexation of the land benefited Miller.

"The lingering question is whether the $8,000 he gave to the mayor had anything to do with the mayor's vote in favor" of the annexation tax deal, Martin said. "To a neutral observer, the whole reason you're not allowed to vote on things when someone has paid you $8,000 is because it looks like a payoff."

Martin also said the case suggests a "pattern and a practice" in Miller's land dealings.

The 1992 FPPC case provides "a keen insight into how [Miller] was doing business," Martin said.

"For all I know, maybe [Lancaster] walked around and spent six straight months putting up yard signs [for Miller's campaign], but I highly doubt it."

Miller and Lancaster did not return calls for comment.

The San Gabriel Valley Tribune last week reported that the FBI had contacted officials and former officials from several cities in Southern California about Miller's land deals. A spokesman for the city of Monrovia also confirmed that the FBI had contacted several officials.

Miller has consistently denied any wrongdoing, and last week he lashed out at the press for conducting what he called a "smear" campaign against him.

Among various questionable land deals, The Hill first reported late last year that Monrovia city officials had tried to secure a federal earmark to help purchase a large swath of land to create a wilderness preserve in the nearby foothills, 165 acres of which Miller owned. The city's efforts were unsuccessful and it instead passed a tax increase and secured California state grant money to pay for the land. Miller ended up making nearly $10 million on the deal.

In August, CREW filed a complaint with the IRS following a Los Angeles Times report alleging that Miller failed to pay capital gains tax on the sale of the land to Monrovia, claiming that the city had exercised eminent domain, which lightened his tax load. The city denied doing so.

Fumo Strikes First (PHI)

By Mario F. Cattabiani And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 6, 2007

HARRISBURG - In a preemptive strike on the eve of his likely indictment, a defiant State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo took the fight to federal prosecutors yesterday, vowing to contest charges he called "falsities and half-truths."

"I know in my heart that I have not done anything illegal," the Philadelphia Democrat said during a 12-minute speech on the Senate floor, his voice at times somber, at times bitter.

"Sometimes in life the only choice we have when we face blatant injustice is to have the courage to stand up and fight. That is what I will do."

Fumo made the extraordinary remarks as lawyers close to the case said fraud, conspiracy, and obstruction-of-justice charges appeared imminent. An indictment could come as early as today.

Fumo stepped down from a powerful committee post yesterday - a day before the presentation of the annual state budget - but will remain in the Senate.

It was "a stunning development for the preeminent politico," said Fumo's longtime friend and fellow Democrat, House Majority Leader Bill DeWeese.

"There certainly has been only one Vince Fumo, and the long arm of the senator has exhibited unparalleled muscularity," he said.

After four years of near-silence on the investigation, Fumo, 63, a Philadelphia political baron and a Harrisburg fixture for three decades, said he expected the indictment to be voluminous - and misguided.

He predicted the indictment would focus on two basic allegations: that he exploited a South Philadelphia charity and misused his Senate staff for personal and political purposes.

It will not allege, Fumo said, that he ever cast a vote in his own interest or extorted money from businesses.

"The indictment will not allege that I ever accepted a bribe," Fumo said. "And, as the government knows, I never did."

Federal prosecutors John J. Pease and Robert A. Zauzmer declined to comment.

For nearly four years, the FBI and IRS have been investigating the finances of the multimillion-dollar charity Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods.

The organization, founded and run by Fumo allies, is funded mainly with public money and donations from Peco Energy Co. and the Delaware River Port Authority - money obtained through Fumo's influence or help.

The Inquirer has reported that the charity paid for political polls and secretly funded a lawsuit against a Fumo political rival. It is illegal for charities to participate in political activities and the IRS has been scrutinizing Citizens' Alliance tax returns to determine whether they were falsified.

DOJ_NMG_0128434

Sources say the FBI is also investigating whether the charity bought Fumo household items and provided its SUVs - a Ford Expedition and a Lincoln Navigator - for Fumo to use on vacation.

Fumo defended his relationship with the charity.

"Make no mistake, I am proud of Citizens' Alliance," he said, ticking off a list of the nonprofit's accomplishments, from funding a charter school to cleaning up blighted neighborhoods.

The charity's lawyer, William J. Winning, declined last night to comment on the speech or the investigation.

In his speech, Fumo also defended his relationship with Harrisburg and Philadelphia staff. He said they work long hours serving constituents well.

"The suggestion that my staff members are political operatives or personal assistants reflects an amazing ignorance of both the legislative process and the facts," he said with a group of aides standing behind him on the Senate floor.

Fumo made no reference to possible obstruction-of-justice charges. Last year, two of his Senate computer technicians were accused of purging e-mails from government computers. In court papers, prosecutors said they believed the aides - Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister - deleted computer documents at Fumo's direction to thwart the federal probe. They have pleaded not guilty.

Several lawyers involved in the case said they expected the current charges against Luchko and Eister to be merged with the Fumo indictment.

Luchko's lawyer, James C. Schwartzman, said yesterday the government was overreaching.

"I'm looking forward to reading the novel the government is going to come out with," Schwartzman said. "If I were a betting man, I think we're looking at a couple of hundred pages."

Another person who may face charges is Ruth Arnao, a former Fumo Senate aide and Citizens' Alliance executive director. Sources say prosecutors have also sent her a so-called target letter, warning that charges were likely. Her lawyer did not return a call yesterday.

Fumo has been indicted twice before - in 1973 over vote fraud, and in 1980 over putting ghost employees on the state payroll. Charges in the first case were quickly dropped; he was convicted in the second, but a judge later threw out the conviction.

This time, he is represented by the firm of Sprague & Sprague, among the most prominent in Philadelphia. One of his lawyers, Mark Sheppard, declined to comment yesterday.

Fumo or members of his inner circle serve on a web of government and quasi-government agencies - from the Delaware River Port Authority to the Pennsylvania Higher Education Assistance Agency - that control much of the city and state infrastructure, cultural institutions, and political innards.

Fumo will remain on the DRPA, higher education and other boards, spokesman Gary Tuma said.

Fumo took to the floor about 2 p.m. He called it "the most difficult speech I have ever had to deliver."

He ripped federal prosecutors for what he called a "years-long, one-sided campaign of scurrilous leaks to the media designed to undermine my office and attack my reputation."

"I am not happy about this, but in one sense I am relieved," Fumo said. "These years have not been easy on me or my family, my staff and my friends... . I will be able to meet the allegations head-on, instead of trying to answer the countless rumors that have attended this process."

In a move that caused a buzz in Harrisburg, both for its timing and its political impact, Fumo also announced he was stepping aside as the ranking Democrat on the Appropriations Committee, a powerful post he has held since 1985. State Sen. Gerald LaValle (D., Beaver) will take his place.

The news comes on the eve of Gov. Rendell's budget presentation - the traditional start of the busy season for the committee as it crafts the state's spending blueprint for the coming fiscal year.

Through a spokeswoman, Rendell called Fumo's decision to step down a "blow to Philadelphia and the surrounding region."

"Sen. Fumo has sharp knowledge of the budget process and the inner workings of the budget documents. His expertise will be missed," said Kate Philips, the governor's spokeswoman.

Under Senate rules, members indicted for a crime related to their office must temporarily relinquish leadership posts pending the outcome of the case.

Fumo presumably would also lose all the perks of the leadership post, including his large staff and huge discretionary account, which he has spent liberally on, among other things, a stable of consultants.

If acquitted, Fumo would get the position back. If convicted, he could be removed from office.

Pa. Senator Says He'll Be Indicted (NSDY/AP)

By Peter Jackson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 6, 2007

HARRISBURG, Pa. -- One of Pennsylvania's most powerful politicians announced on the state Senate floor Monday that he expects to be indicted soon in an extortion case and that he was temporarily giving up a key committee post.

Sen. Vincent J. Fumo, a Philadelphia Democrat, said he would likely be charged this week with using a neighborhood nonprofit group for his own personal and political gain.

"I know in my heart that I have not done anything illegal," said Fumo, 63.

A federal grand jury has been investigating whether Fumo extorted tens of millions of dollars in corporate donations for the Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods. Two of his former Senate staffers are scheduled to stand trial on obstruction charges May 21 on suspicion of deleting e-mail about Fumo's ties to the charity from office and other computers.

Fumo would have been required to give up his leadership post as soon as he was indicted. He portrayed his resignation as minority party chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee as a temporary measure "until I am vindicated."

Fumo charged that the investigation "has been marked by threats, intimidations and frequent leaks to the media intended to embarrass me" and vowed to fight the allegations.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Zauzmer declined to comment on Fumo's remarks.

The Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods is run by Fumo's aides and does economic development and beautification projects in his district.

Peco Energy Co. gave the nonprofit group $17 million as it sought to win state deregulation of the electricity markets. Fumo initially opposed the effort but later threw his support behind the utility.

A lawyer, Fumo is an architect of the 2004 law that legalized slot-machine gambling in the state.

Fumo's Defense: A Strong Offense (PHI)

By Craig R. Mccoy And Emilie Lounsberry

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 6, 2007

It was vintage Senator Fumo - smart, heartfelt, combative, eloquent and shrewd.

Without waiting for a massive federal indictment that may shred his image, legal experts and public-relations people noted yesterday, State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo struck first. He offered a counter-narrative: Fumo, the people's champion, fighting the good fight in the face of threats, leaks and intimidation.

"A terrific public-relations maneuver to get ahead of the indictment," said lawyer John P. Pucci, a former federal prosecutor.

Or, as veteran Philadelphia ad man Elliott Curson put it: "It's a preemptive attack.... He's trying to get his side of the story out before the other side."

In his speech from the Senate floor, Fumo, 63, provided his own summary of the charges he is likely to face and then ripped into them.

He said the government was about to accuse him of misusing a South Philadelphia charity. To rebut that, he extolled the nonprofit's work on "countless" community projects, from supporting charter schools to cleaning up "trash-strewn, rat-infested, vacant lots.... It is truly about better neighborhoods."

With members of his Senate staff standing behind him, he said prosecutors were about to paint them as his taxpayer-paid campaign workers and personal servants. To the contrary, he said, they work tirelessly for the public, without bonuses or overtime.

And, lest anyone miss the news, Fumo's office circulated copies of his speech to the Capitol press corps.

A special case

An officeholder announcing his own indictment ahead of time is a rarity. While many defense lawyers say the only good client is a silent one, others say an indicted politician is a special case.

Dan Richman, a former federal prosecutor who now teaches law at Fordham University in New York City, noted that politicians must protect not only their liberty, but also their viability - and thus must play to both potential jurors and potential voters.

Neil Oxman, a veteran political strategist, said silent was not a smart option.

"The only other strategy is, you don't say a word, and the next time someone sees you is when you walk into court and somebody sticks a microphone in your face," said Oxman, who is based in Philadelphia. "This is a much better strategy."

Art Patterson, a jury expert in State College, Pa., said it was good strategy to send messages to the vast jury pool: "It's laying the groundwork of a vigorous defense."

If Fumo is indicted, a federal jury would likely be chosen from a wide swath of eastern Pennsylvania. Though jurors are not supposed to be influenced by what they see or read about a case, trial experts say it is hard to totally screen out such influences.

DOJ_NMG_0128436

Jurors generally expect someone accused of a crime to mount a strong defense, Patterson said, and wonder about those who say, "No comment."

"Going on the offensive is always good," he said.

Patterson said big companies about to be sued often launch an ad campaign "in hopes that this will have a positive influence on jurors" in civil trials.

Not unprecedented

A few other Philadelphia figures have chosen a similar strategy when a federal indictment loomed.

In 1991, City Councilman James J. Tayoun, delivered a speech on the Council floor denouncing federal investigators' "malicious" attempt to destroy his career. He later pleaded guilty to crimes in office and went to prison. Now he publishes a weekly newspaper, the Public Record.

And in 1988, when six former members of the elite Philadelphia police "Five Squad" drug unit were indicted for corruption, two defendants crashed the news conference at FBI headquarters to attempt to rebut the charges.

Pucci, who prosecuted the Five Squad case and who now practices law in Massachusetts, recalled that move as a "startling event."

So, he noted that Fumo's bold statement on the House floor was "not unprecedented."

Pucci said Fumo's statement was not only a shrewd public-relations move, but also foreshadowed what any Fumo trial might be like - "a bare-knuckled battle."

FUMO'S COATTAILS ARE LONG (PHI)

By Dave Davies

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 6, 2007

WHEN SOMETHING as earth-shattering as a federal corruption indictment hits a politician as influential as Vince Fumo, his friends and allies feel the shock waves, too.

And this spring, some of them are running for office.

What will become of Fumo's political family?

Fumo worked hard to get U.S. Rep. Bob Brady into the mayor's race, and longtime Fumocrats Jim Kenney and Frank DiCicco are running for re-election to their seats on City Council.

Kenney and DiCicco, by now multi-term incumbents with their own legislative records, political relationships and fundraising capacity seem well-positioned to thrive on their own.

It's harder to predict the impact on Brady, a longtime friend and associate of Fumo's who must fight the notion that he's a machine politician.

Opponents may produce pictures of Fumo with Brady, a Democratic ward leader and 20-year party chairman, hoping to taint Brady with Fumo's legal problems.

Political analyst Larry Ceisler said it's a tactic that's likely to fail or backfire.

"In this city, I just don't think guilt by association works," he said. "Brady has his own persona, his own identity."

St. Joseph's University historian and analyst Randall Miller said the Fumo scandal could raise the profile of the issue of public corruption and help mayoral candidates Michael Nutter and Tom Knox, who are fighting "pay-to-play" politics.

"The Fumo charges would be another example, another layer in the growing public perception that corruption is a big problem," Miller said.

Even if Brady isn't tainted by his friendship with Fumo, he's likely to miss Fumo's potent fundraising capacity.

Brady yesterday said he would not hide from Fumo.

"It's not in my nature to turn my back on a friend," Brady said. "I wish him and his family well."

Brady said he believes voters will judge him on his own merit and message, and he wasn't counting on Fumo to fund his campaign.

"It's not like I just got here," Brady said. "I've been around a long time, and there are plenty of people I can rely on."

Kenney and DiCicco said that they regard Fumo a friend but that they have their own records to run on.

"At some point, this 48-year-old, four-term incumbent has to be viewed as an individual, " Kenney said. "I've got a body of work I'm proud to take to the voters."

Kenney has been a focal point of controversy lately for his proposal to lift the campaign-contribution limit in a mayor's race in which millionaire Knox has given his campaign more than $2 million.

Although Kenney was among the first in Council to propose contribution limits and supported ethics reforms in the last term, his recent proposal has drawn fire from several civic and business groups.

DiCicco, who won his seat with Fumo's help in 1995, said he's stood on his own for a long time, opposing Fumo on some policy issues and getting little money from him in his last campaign.

DiCicco said he understands that an opponent of his or Brady's may try to make an issue of their friendship with Fumo.

"People aspiring to elected office will take any shot they can and see if it sticks," DiCicco said. "People will look at it and make reasonable judgments about it. You know, Vince touched a lot of lives in this city, and not just in the political arena."

Corruption Trial Begins Today (MH)

By Cammy Clark

The Miami Herald, February 6, 2007

KEY WEST - A decade after the late Monroe County Mayor John L. "Jack" London was paid $29,000 as part of an alleged development bribery scheme, a former county attorney goes on trial today for his suspected role in the public corruption case.

James Hendrick, who served as Monroe County attorney from 1995-2002, faces federal charges of conspiracy to obstruct justice, witness tampering and obstruction of justice. A 12-member jury was seated Monday.

If convicted, the maximum penalty is 10 years imprisonment for witness tampering and obstruction of justice and five years for conspiracy.

The case stems from a lengthy FBI investigation into alleged public corruption in the Keys. Prosecutors say Hendrick was the center of a "secret deal" in which he, London and Miami-Dade political consultant Randy Hilliard conspired to get Marathon businessman Marvin Rappaport to pay $75,000 in exchange for building and zoning approval of his stymied redevelopment project.

The payments were made between April and August 1996, prosecutors say. On June 19, 1996, the County Commission approved Rappaport's project, called Halls Resort.

In December 1997, Hilliard used some of the money to send three cashier checks totaling $29,000 to pay off a lien on London's second home in Ireland, prosecutors say.

London pleaded guilty in July 2005 for tax evasion stemming from the $29,000 payment. Prosecutors dropped his three counts of lying to federal investigators in exchange for London testifying against Hendrick, once a close friend.

Hendrick was arrested two months earlier at his Whitehead Street office and flown to Miami, where he pleaded not guilty.

The prosecution lost a key witness when London died Nov. 21 from an aneurysm while awaiting sentencing in his plea deal.

Prosecutors are expected to call Hilliard, Rappaport and others as witnesses; they are cooperating and are not charged in the corruption case.

In addition to their testimony, the case against Hendrick hinges on 11 taped conservations between him and Hilliard that began in 2003. Eight were by phone and three were in person, with Hilliard wearing a wire for the FBI.

According to the indictment, transcripts of those tapes indicate Hendrick devised a false explanation of the $29,000 payment, saying it was a consulting fee. He then instructed Hilliard and London to tell the concocted story to the grand jury. Prosecutors also allege that Hendrick told London to leave South Florida to avoid appearing before the grand jury.

Prosecutors also say they plan to introduce evidence that Hilliard, London and Hendrick discussed using a Bahamian company and a bank account in Luxembourg to pay additional bribes to London.

The prosecutors said the use of the Luxembourg account would allow London to use an ATM card to make cash withdrawals in the United States.

The company's name was the Resources Conservancy, with an address in the United States that was the same as Hendrick's law firm in Key West.

Hendrick's attorney, Ed Shohat, filed a motion to exclude the "prior bad acts evidence." Senior U.S. District Judge Shelby Highsmith denied the motion, Assistant U.S. Attorney Christopher Clark said Monday.

"It's part and parcel of the same crime," Clark said after the jury -- 11 women and one man -- was selected for the trial, which is expected to last two weeks.

Hendrick declined to comment, saying anything he said would be misconstrued by the public.

Belleville Woman To Be Sentenced In Hurricane Katrina Fraud (AP)

By Ann Sanner

AP, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - A 59-year-old man was sentenced Monday to 8 1/2 years in prison on charges stemming from his use of stolen identities in an attempt to acquire more than $100,000 in payments intended for victims of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

DOJ_NMG_0128438

Jeffrey Alan Rothschild, who's also known as Jeffrey Zahler, pleaded guilty in August to bank fraud, mail fraud and money laundering in late 2005. He was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly in Washington.

U.S. Attorney Jeffrey A. Taylor said Rothschild abused a system set up by the Federal Emergency Management Agency to allow hurricane victims to receive $2,000 in emergency funds after providing their names, Social Security numbers and other information.

Between about Sept. 13, 2005, and Dec. 31, 2005, Rothschild used personal information and addresses that he found on the Internet or material he made up to get money from FEMA, Taylor said.

As a result, FEMA issued 38 checks to people whose names Rothschild had provided. He then forged the checks and deposited them in accounts he controlled. He submitted 14 applications for which he did not receive checks, Taylor said.

Rothschild has no fixed address.

Gulfport Woman Pleads Guilty To Katrina Fraud (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, February 6, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - A Gulfport woman pleaded guilty to hurricane disaster-relief fraud and faces five years in prison, the U.S. attorney's office said Monday.

Amanda Rettig will be sentenced April 25 and could also be fined up to $250,000.

She pleaded guilty to filing a false claim with the Federal Emergency Management Agency saying her property was damaged by Hurricane Katrina. She submitted a false address in Saucier.

She received $22,253.23, a statement from U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said.

Suspect In 2 Boys' Abduction Charged With Molestation (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, February 6, 2007

CLAYTON, Mo. — Michael Devlin, who has been accused of kidnapping two Missouri boys who were found last month, was charged Monday with molesting the teenagers.

St. Louis County prosecutor Robert McCulloch charged Devlin, 41, with 71 counts: two kidnapping charges and the rest for forcible sodomy. Each charge is a felony punishable by up to life in prison. He said Devlin was charged with 17 counts of forcible sodomy relating to an abduction last month and 52 more in a 2002 kidnapping. "Devlin acknowledged committing these acts," McCulloch said.

Following his department's policy of not naming victims of sexual abuse, McCulloch did not name the teens. He noted that their identities "are not a national secret."

Ben Ownby, 13, of Beaufort, Mo., was kidnapped on Jan. 8. Shawn Hornbeck, 15, disappeared in 2002 in Richwoods, Mo. Both were found inside Devlin's apartment in Kirkwood, Mo., on Jan. 12. Devlin was charged last month with kidnapping in each boy's home county and pleaded not guilty. Monday's charges were filed in the county where Devlin lived.

USA TODAY does not usually identify victims of alleged sex crimes. In this case, however, the names have been widely used in the media. Hornbeck's stepfather, Craig Akers, told USA TODAY that it was "a logical assumption" that Shawn had been sexually abused. Devlin's lawyers, Ethan Corlija and Michael Kielty, said in a statement they have "received no evidence" on the charges. Scott Sherman, a lawyer for Shawn and his family, told the Associated Press that the family "is relieved that the speculation" about what happened is over.

The Police Lineup Is Becoming Suspect Practice (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, February 6, 2007

ATLANTA

More than two decades ago, a sexual-assault victim from Sandy Springs, Ga., pointed to a picture of her attacker in a photo lineup.

"From zero to 100 percent, how sure are you?" a detective asked.

"I'm 120 percent sure," the woman said, as stated in court testimony.

It now appears that she was 100 percent wrong, according to the Fulton County district attorney. The result of DNA testing led to the release of Willie "Pete" Williams on Jan. 23 after nearly 22 years in a south Georgia prison for a crime he did not commit. Her mistake and his exoneration have revived a debate about the accuracy of eyewitness identifications – and their central role in persuading juries to convict.

DOJ_NMG_0128439

But even as a handful of police departments from Boston to Minneapolis have voluntarily changed lineup procedures to help reduce such tragic errors, resistance to top-down reform from the majority of American police chiefs and prosecutors is pushing the debate into the legislative chamber. Last week, Georgia introduced a bill that would scrap the side-by-side police lineup, and would instead require police departments to present suspects one by one – either in person or by photo. Georgia joins Texas, New Mexico, West Virginia, and Vermont, which have similar bills pending.

Some experts argue that the new procedure limits inaccurate "relative judgments" that victims can make during a lineup. But police counter that they do not want to be forced to use a specific procedure that they say would undermine proven techniques detectives use.

"You can start to see a move now in policymaking and the decisions that prosecutors are making about how they elicit evidence," says Professor Christian Meissner, director of the Investigative Interviewing Research Laboratory at the University of Texas at El Paso. "The involvement of legislatures is an attempt to get prosecutors to realize that these are real issues that need to be addressed."

Since 1992, 194 people have been exonerated on the basis of DNA evidence, and some 75 percent of the convictions involved at least one faulty eyewitness identification, according to the Innocence Project, which works to clear those who are falsely imprisoned. A separate study published by the University of Michigan in 2004 found that 90 percent of mistakes that led to false convictions in rape cases were caused by eyewitness errors.

"The way the [procedure] is now, it's easy to pick somebody out that's not involved," says Michael Moore, a private investigator in Cairo, Ga.

How new bills change lineups

To minimize errors, the new bills in the five states propose that police must employ a "blind" lineup administrator, who in a small town could be a retired police officer or even a barber. This person would not know anything about the case, and therefore would be unable to influence the witness, for example, to "take another look at No. 5." Also the measures would replace the lineup in which people or photos are shown side by side with a procedure where suspects are shown one at a time. This "blind sequential lineup" strategy reduces "relative discrimination" in which witnesses identify somebody who looks most like the perpetrator out of a group, researchers say.

"Let's learn the lessons not only about the fallibility of eyewitness identification, but also of the ... research that shows how to eliminate the inadvertent suggestiveness of traditional police lineup procedures," says Stephen Saloom, policy director at the Innocence Project in New York.

In recent years, research has showed that blind sequential photo lineups produce half as many mistakes as the traditional "parade" of suspects, but they also result in 3 percent fewer total identifications.

But the blind sequential photo lineup resulted in more false identifications when it was employed in Illinois in the squad rooms of Chicago, Joliet, and Evanston in 2005. Using this method, witnesses made positive identifications 62 percent of the time; the sequential method yielded identifications 53 percent of the time, according to a study by the Illinois attorney general.

With this study in mind, some criticize states' efforts to mandate a specific procedure that would replace the experience detectives have from "thousands of years of court with 25 years of studies on human memory," says Rick Malone, director of the Prosecuting Attorneys' Council of Georgia. "A clinical study in a research laboratory versus someone walking out of a liquor store who shoots the fellow across the street – those aren't the same conditions."

The change could also trigger a flood of appeals from convicts who say they were mistakenly identified, says Terence Campbell, a forensic psychologist in Sterling Heights, Mich., offering a reason prosecutors are against the legislation.

The exoneration of 'Pete' Williams

During his trial, Mr. Williams said he was playing cards with friends at the time of the rape, but his testimony could not overcome the jury's perception of the victim's "120 percent" certain identification. Williams wrote a letter from prison to the Georgia Innocence Project saying he was "a poor black man with a criminal record" who was convicted of a crime he did not commit. The group then used DNA technology to test the evidence again. "We are all human," Williams said after his release, as he forgave the witness for the mistake.

The story of Williams, an aspiring gospel singer who broke into a bar of "Amazing Grace" after his release, is likely to influence whether Georgia lawmakers vote to pass the bill, experts say.

"When you have someone just released from prison who was unjustly put in there, [the success of a reform bill] comes down to how much sympathy defense attorneys can garner in [the house judiciary] committee, and they could garner a lot," says Frank Rotondo, of the Georgia Association of Chiefs of Police.

Jail Record Near For Videographer Who Resisted Grand Jury (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 5 — A freelance videographer who refused to cooperate with a grand jury investigation will become the longest incarcerated journalist in modern American history on Tuesday. The freelancer, Josh Wolf, will pass Vanessa Leggett, an investigator and a journalist who served 168 days in 2001 and 2002 for refusing to surrender information in a murder case.

Mr. Wolf, 24, has been in prison since August, with a brief break in September related to his appeal, after refusing to cooperate with a grand jury investigation of an anticapitalist protest in 2005 in which a police officer here was injured and a squad car was slightly damaged by a small explosive device.

Prosecutors have demanded that Mr. Wolf give them his raw video, some of which he has posted on his Web site, www.joshwolf.net, as well as testify about the protesters seen on the tape for an investigation into possible charges, including arson.

"Wolf videotaped a public demonstration where there may have been an attempt to set a police car ablaze and where a San Francisco police officer's skull was fractured when he was hit from behind by a demonstrator," said Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the United States attorney for the Northern District of California.

Mr. Macaulay cited six federal decisions in the government's favor, including one last week that denied a request for a new hearing.

"This office has issued a lawful subpoena for legitimate investigative purposes," he said.

Mr. Wolf says he is protecting his sources. He remains behind bars even as the United States attorney who had him held, Kevin V. Ryan, has said he is stepping down and the San Francisco district attorney has dismissed the lone remaining criminal case involving the protest.

Mr. Wolf could stay jailed until the term of the grand jury ends in July.

The jailing has prompted outcries by advocates for freedom of the press who say it seems out of proportion to the scale of the investigation.

"This is one more example of the increasing attacks on confidentiality of sources in the United States, one more blow to investigative journalism and, eventually, to the right for American people to be informed," Lucie Morillon, a spokeswoman for Reporters Without Borders in Washington, wrote in an e-mail message. "This is a bad signal sent to the rest of the world."

The case has also raised the question of whether Mr. Wolf is truly a reporter or simply a citizen who shot videotape. His lawyer, Martin Garbus, said Mr. Wolf established his journalistic status in part by selling videotape of the protest to local television stations.

The protest was timed to coincide with a Group of 8 meeting of world economic leaders in Scotland.

Judge William Alsup of Federal District Court here disagreed, referring to Mr. Wolf as an "alleged journalist" in court papers. Judge Alsup has also repeatedly cited Branzburg v. Hayes, a Supreme Court decision in 1972 that found that the First Amendment does not exempt any newsmen from testifying to a grand jury.

Supporters of Mr. Wolf intend to rally on the steps of San Francisco City Hall on Tuesday.

Mr. Garbus said he would be return to court next month with a psychiatrist's affidavits, as well as statements from former co-workers and teachers that Mr. Wolf is unlikely to be persuaded to talk.

"The more acclimated he gets," Mr. Garbus said of the detention, "the more determined he gets."

Child Pornography Suspect Pleads Guilty (TRENT)

By Kevin Shea

Trenton Times, February 6, 2007

A former West Windsor man pleaded guilty in federal court yesterday to one count of receiving and distributing child pornography on the Internet.

Mark Wasco, 46, was charged in March 2006 with possessing child pornography after an FBI agent and a New Jersey State Police investigator searched his home and computers and found numerous images of children engaged in sex.

The investigation of Wasco eventually led to him pleading guilty yesterday to receipt and distribution of child pornography be fore U.S. District Chief Judge Gar rett E. Brown Jr.

Wasco was not indicted and pleaded guilty to a one-count alle gation against him. He is scheduled to be sentenced May 14.

The U.S. Attorney's office yesterday declined to comment further on the Wasco case.

Court papers and the criminal complaint against Wasco allege that when authorities searched his West Windsor home on South Post Road, they found numerous images of child pornography after searching two laptop computers, one ex ternal hard drive and some compact discs.

The complaint also alleges that Wasco, at one point, posed as a teenage boy to solicit images of children using the Web site MySpa ce.com, and admitted to the ploy.

Wasco also admitted to using more than one file-sharing site to trade child pornography images over the Internet.

Wasco, according to court documents, is free pending sentencing and living with a relative in Hamil ton.

Fifth Worker At Frontier Accused Of Sex Crime (BUFFNEWS)

By DAN HERBECK And MARY B. PASCIAK, NEWS STAFF REPORTERS

Buffalo News, February 6, 2007

Elementary teacher arrested in Internet child sex sting

An elementary school teacher from Frontier School District is accused of using the Internet to arrange a sexual liaison with a 14-year-old boy.

Kollin Roy King, arrested Thursday night, is at least the fifth Frontier Schools employee to be charged with improper conduct with youngsters or Internet child pornography since the latter part of 2004.

King, 26, is also a longtime Boy Scout volunteer who was scheduled to become director of Camp Scouthaven this summer, overseeing a program for boys in first to fifth grades who attend camp with their parents.

The "boy" who led to King's arrest was actually an undercover FBI agent, who arranged a meeting at a Cheektowaga restaurant. A team of agents arrested King when he showed up.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Allison P. Gioia identified King as a fifth-grade teacher at Blasdell Elementary School and a Cub Scout leader in the Southtowns area. She said King faces a felony charge of attempting to entice a minor into engaging in sexual activity.

"It's a concern to the district and to board members," said Thomas J. DeBoy, the school district's attorney. "I've been in touch with the FBI and the U.S. Attorney, and the district is cooperating fully with the investigation."

When local scouting officials learned Friday of King's arrest, they notified him that he has been removed from the program pending resolution of the case, in keeping with Boy Scouts of America's policy.

"He's been involved in scouting for many years, and he was always held in high regard, both in his volunteer and paid positions," said Patrick Coviello, executive director of the Greater Niagara Frontier Council of the Boy Scouts of America. "Everyone here has been shocked by this news. Certainly he always seemed to be a very professional, polite, well-intentioned young man."

According to Gioia, King's arrest followed a series of "explicit" Internet conversations with an undercover agent, during which King said he wanted to have sex with the purported teenager and a 12-year-old friend. FBI agents said King admitted after his arrest to past sexual activities with a 16-year-old he met on the Internet. But agents said he told them he has never molested any of his students or youths he met as a Cub Scout leader.

King, who lives on Southwestern Boulevard in Hamburg, has been a Frontier teacher for less than three years and does not yet have tenure, DeBoy said, adding that the district was unaware of any alleged wrongdoing by King before the arrest.

King taught sixth grade at Orchard Park Middle School for two years before going to Frontier. Orchard Park officials said they never received any complaints about him; he resigned because his job was in jeopardy from pending budget cuts.

A transcript of King's alleged Internet chats with the undercover agent indicates that King repeatedly made graphic requests for sex, strongly urging the agent to include a 12-year-old friend in the planned meeting.

In one excerpt, King asked the agent how old his friend was.

Agent: 12.

King: YES!!!!! lets threesome.

Agent: i dont know if he would be into it.

King: please please please.

But after his arrest, King was less enthusiastic when asked by FBI agents what he would have done if two minor boys had shown up instead of a team of federal agents.

"I hope nothing would have happened," the FBI quoted King as saying.

"We see these sting operations on television all the time. The public is well aware that we have undercover agents on the Internet," FBI spokesman Paul M. Moskal said on Friday. "And yet, people keep doing it. This kind of criminal activity seems to get more and more prevalent."

Moskal said it is difficult to understand why men continue to use the Internet to arrange sexual meetings with minors. "The men we've arrested are driven. They have a fire in their belly to do this, and they won't stop until they get caught," Moskal said. "And they will eventually get caught."

After a brief appearance Friday before U.S. Magistrate Judge H. Kenneth Schroeder Jr., King was ordered jailed until at least Tuesday. A federal public defender, Kimberly Schechter, represented King at the proceeding and declined to comment afterward.

DeBoy said the FBI told him that there are no allegations of King molesting students from the Frontier district. He said the district plans to arrange a meeting with King's students and their parents to discuss the arrest.

DeBoy said it was too soon to disclose whether King would be suspended from work, either with or without pay.

Teacher, Scout Leader Accused Of Soliciting Sex With Minor (NSDY/AP)

By Carolyn Thompson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 6, 2007

BUFFALO, N.Y. -- An elementary school teacher and Boy Scout leader was charged Friday with arranging to meet teenage boys for sex.

Kollin King, 26, of Hamburg was arrested about 9 p.m. Thursday at a suburban restaurant, where he had arranged to meet an Internet acquaintance he thought was a 14-year-old boy.

The acquaintance, who had agreed to bring along a friend, was actually an undercover FBI agent.

When authorities asked King what he would have done had two boys arrived at the restaurant, King replied, "I hope nothing would have happened," Assistant U.S. Attorney Allison Gioia said.

But King later acknowledged that it was not the first such meeting he had arranged, and that he had engaged in sexual activity with a 16-year-old boy he met on the Internet in a park and in his apartment, Gioia said. Other scheduled meetings never came to fruition, King told authorities, because the minors did not show up or the meeting location was fictitious.

He was charged with one count of attempted enticement of a minor to engage in criminal sexual activity.

King denied having inappropriate contact with any of his students at Blasdell Elementary School, where he taught fourth grade, or members of a Cub Scout den _ a group of young Boy Scouts _ he led.

He was suspended from the Boy Scout program pending resolution of the charge, said Pat Coviello, executive director for the Greater Niagara Frontier Council of the Boy Scouts.

In addition to being a den leader, King was a paid staff member at the Boy Scout's Scouthaven camp for Scouts in grades one through five, Coviello said.

King, who passed a criminal background check and "youth protection training" required of all staff members, appeared to be "a professional, well-intentioned person," Coviello said.

"That's the shocking thing, is that there had been, over the years, no issues, no concerns, nothing that we were aware of or anything like this brought forward," Coviello said.

A woman who answered the phone at Blasdell Elementary School said officials would have no comment and hung up.

At an initial appearance Friday in U.S. District Court, King was ordered held pending an appearance Feb. 6. Gioia requested that King be detained as a danger to the community and a flight risk.

If convicted, he could be sentenced to between five and 30 years in prison.

Identity Fraud Has Dropped Since 2003, Survey Shows (NYT)

By John Leland

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

The number of Americans who are victims of identity fraud has declined steadily since 2003, according to a new survey sponsored by credit-card and financial services companies. Last year, 3.7 percent of people surveyed said someone had stolen their identity in the previous 12 months, down from 4.7 percent in 2003, according to the report.

The study found that the total losses from the crime fell last year to $49 billion from the 2005 level of $56 billion. The thieves either used the victims' existing bank or credit card accounts or opened new ones.

The survey, based on telephone interviews with 5,000 adults, was conducted by Javelin Strategy & Research, a data research firm, and was sponsored by Visa, Wells Fargo and CheckFree. The margin of sampling error is below plus or minus one percentage point for the crimes' prevalence.

The findings contradict public perceptions that identity fraud is proliferating out of control, said James Van Dyke, president and founder of Javelin. "For years identity fraud has been reported as the nation's fastest growing crime, with the assumption that the numbers would keep going up," Mr. Van Dyke said. "We find it's not the case. The trend is going down."

Because the survey relied on people's accounts of whether they had been victims, it does not measure "synthetic identity theft," in which criminals fabricate identities using names, addresses, Social Security numbers and other information that may or may or may not correspond to real people. A 2005 analysis by ID Analytics, a financial industry security firm, found that synthetic identity theft was more common than “true-name” identity theft.

As in past years, the Javelin survey found that individuals whose identities were stolen bore less than 10 percent of the loss from the crimes.

Young adults, ages 18 to 24, were the most likely to say they were victims, and the least likely to take precautions to prevent identity fraud like shredding documents and using computer firewall protections, the study found. People with high incomes were more likely to say they had been victims than were people with low incomes.

The survey did not study why the numbers were dropping, but Mr. Van Dyke attributed the declines to both greater consumer awareness and better prevention efforts by banks and credit card companies.

Edmund Mierzwinski, consumer program director at the United States Public Interest Research Group, a nonprofit group, said the report underplayed the effects of recent state legislation, which the financial services industry has largely resisted. The protections include requirements that companies notify people whose personal information has been compromised, and laws enabling people to freeze their credit reports.

“Financial companies don’t want new regulations,” Mr. Mierzwinski said. “We think we need new regulations. The reason consumers are paying more attention to identity theft is that many are getting breach notices.”

He added, “From our perspective the decline is a good thing, but it’s still affecting many millions of Americans. The cost to victims remains very high in terms of lost time and frustration.”

Homicides Weigh On Confirmation For Chief Lanier (WT)

By Daniel Taylor

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

A recent series of homicides will provide an early test for acting Metropolitan Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier as she faces D.C. Council confirmation hearings scheduled for next month, say some residents and council members.

"I certainly think the way a city responds to a spike in homicides is an important indicator," said council member Phil Mendelson, at-large Democrat and chairman of the Committee on Public Safety and the Judiciary, which will hold the hearing. "It gives important insight into how the new administration will deal with violent crimes."

The number of homicides this year in the District as of yesterday was 17, the same as last year at this time. Among them was the series of four killings in less than five hours the weekend of Jan. 27-28. Police have made an arrest in one of the cases, and Chief Lanier announced initiatives to aggressively canvass neighborhoods in the 48 hours after a homicide and to target violent criminals wanted on fugitive warrants.

Mayor Adrian M. Fenty, a Democrat, replaced Chief Charles H. Ramsey shortly after being elected in November, in part to implement more community policing in the department, which has 3,800 officers and a budget of about $430 million. Chief Lanier officially took over Jan. 2.

Mary Cheh, Ward 3 Democrat, said she was "excited" about Chief Lanier's appointment, but added she has some issues that need to be addressed.

"I expressed some concerns [to her] that I had about the department," Mrs. Cheh said. "So when she comes up for confirmation, there's a number of things I want to talk to her about."

Mrs. Cheh said she doesn't think violent crimes such as assaults and robberies get enough attention. She said if they did, the death last year of journalist David E. Rosenbaum -- killed by two men suspected of committing a violent robbery and assault two months before -- might have been prevented.

"I'm just not happy now with how the department is run," Mrs. Cheh said. "and I'm hoping she's going to change some things."

She plans to ask Chief Lanier, a 16-year veteran and former commander of the department's Special Operations Division, about her role in handling mass demonstrations. During protests in September 2002, hundreds of demonstrators and several bystanders were swept up in mass arrests, cuffed hand to ankle and detained at the department's training academy for several hours.

Since her nomination on Nov. 20, Chief Lanier has attended community meetings in every quadrant of the city and has pledged to improve the relationship between police and the neighborhoods they patrol, assign investigations to field teams and improve communication in the department.

However, Leroy Thorpe, a former advisory neighborhood commissioner in Ward 2, thinks the new chief has not done enough.

"She hasn't gone out in the community to meet with the players in the community," said Mr. Thorpe, who plans to testify at the hearings. "Ramsey was a people person. I don't think this woman is going to be a people person."

DOJ_NMG_0128444

Despite the criticism, Chief Lanier appears to have the support of most of the D.C. Council members.

Ward 1 Democrat Jim Graham called her a "superb selection."

"Here's someone who came right up the ranks, totally engaged from Day One," he said. "She's been through the fire, and she's come out on top."

If the judiciary panel votes to recommend Chief Lanier, her nomination will go before the full council. If the committee votes against her, the mayor must either send down another nominee or seek to dislodge her nomination from the committee.

Council member Marion Barry, Ward 8 Democrat, said he also supports the nomination.

"I'm very impressed," Mr. Barry said. "I think she's going to make a good chief."

Nominees for police chief typically face little opposition in the council. Only serious questions about the candidate's character or ability to do the job tend to derail an appointment.

"Unless I have very strong objections to individual appointees, I tend to let the captain pick his crew," said council member Carol Schwartz, at-large Republican.

Marion Barry Faces Possible Prison Time (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

D.C. Council member Marion Barry (D-Ward 8) is back in trouble with federal authorities over his income taxes.

Nearly a year after he agreed to follow the law and pay overdue taxes dating back several years, the former four-term mayor has not only flouted a plea agreement but has failed to file tax returns for 2005, prosecutors say.

Now, the U.S. attorney's office, which did not oppose probation for Barry when he was sentenced in March, wants the federal judge in the case to put him in prison.

"The Court's patience should be at an end," Assistant U.S. Attorneys James W. Cooper and Thomas E. Zeno wrote in a motion to Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson, adding that Barry "continues to flout" city and federal tax laws.

Under sentencing guidelines, Barry could have faced 12 to 18 months in prison for failure to file a federal income tax return and failure to make a District of Columbia return. Now that prison time could be back on the table if the judge decides that Barry isn't living up to his agreement with prosecutors and his promises to the court.

And that may only be the beginning of his problems in the case. In November, the Internal Revenue Service began garnishing Barry's city council salary because he failed to follow through with a payment plan for the taxes he owed for years 1999 through 2004.

Barry, 70, did not return calls seeking comment.

Frederick D. Cooke Jr., Barry's attorney, said that he has not talked to his client about the problem with his 2005 taxes. But Cooke said he expects to file court papers challenging the prosecutors' bid to revoke Barry's probation. Cooke said he expected a hearing in the next month.

The filings make clear that prosecutors are tired of Barry's promises. He paid $1,000 toward his tax debts in July, and his accountant expressed a willingness to establish a payment plan, an IRS agent said in an affidavit filed by prosecutors in U.S. District Court. But at another meeting in September, Barry's accountant talked about submitting amended returns along with the payment schedule.

Barry has yet to act, the agent, Don M. Sender, said in his affidavit.

Details about the latest tax dispute were first reported by CNN.

Why Barry failed to file federal or local income tax returns for 2005 is unclear. The prosecutors do not allege that he failed to pay taxes for 2005 -- without returns, it would be difficult if not impossible to determine if he paid enough to cover whatever would be owed for that year through payroll deductions. Prosecutors said Barry sought an extension in filing the federal income tax return that was due last April 15; the IRS gave him until Oct. 15, to no avail.

Barry now is facing hearings in two courthouses. Just last week, he was in D. C. Superior Court dealing with other legal entanglements.

Stopped by police twice last year in the District, he faces several charges, including driving under the influence in connection with the first stop, in September in Northwest Washington. At a court hearing, a judge set a June 12 date for a trial on the traffic charges after Cooke made it clear that Barry does not believe he did anything wrong and is not prepared to plead guilty to any of the charges.

It is in federal court, though, where Barry faces the most serious potential consequences.

Even before these latest revelations, Barry had stumbled in the tax case. Soon after pleading guilty to the misdemeanor tax charges in October 2005, he tested positive in a court-required drug screening for cocaine and marijuana. Then he waited until just before sentencing to contact the IRS about repayment, upsetting the judge as well as the prosecution. But prosecutors stuck to terms of the plea agreement, and the judge sentenced Barry to three years' probation.

Paying the back taxes was a key condition. How much he owes has not been publicly disclosed. Barry earned more than $530,000 in the period from 1999 through 2004.

D.C. Council members earn $92,500 a year.

In its filing, the government notes Barry's stature as a public figure in the District. "A longtime elected official who has been responsible for spending public funds collected from District of Columbia taxpayers, the defendant chose not to file his own tax returns for six years," Cooper and Zeno write.

With Probation At Risk, Barry To Meet Attorney (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

The defense attorney for D.C. Council member Marion Barry said yesterday that he is meeting with the former mayor this week to decide how best to respond to a recent request by federal prosecutors to revoke Mr. Barry's probation in a criminal tax case.

If the motion is granted, the revocation could put Mr. Barry back behind bars more than 15 years after he served six months on drug charges.

"Just because they write it doesn't mean it's true," attorney Frederick D. Cooke Jr. said of the court filing last week in which prosecutors stated that Mr. Barry had failed to pay his 2005 taxes.

Mr. Barry received three years of probation last year after pleading guilty to failing to file returns on more than $500,000 in income from 1999 to 2004.

"I haven't had a chance to draft a response because I have to talk to my client and gather information," Mr. Cooke said.

In exchange for the guilty plea, prosecutors last year agreed to take no position on Mr. Barry's request for probation at his sentencing last year.

Now, prosecutors say, Mr. Barry hasn't lived up to his end of the deal.

In addition to failing to pay D.C. or federal income taxes in 2005, Mr. Barry also hasn't made plans to pay off prior years' tax debt stemming from the criminal tax case, the government memo states.

Mr. Barry's office did not return phone calls yesterday.

Former U.S. Attorney Joseph diGenova said yesterday that Mr. Barry almost certainly will be called to testify about whether he failed to pay his taxes.

Mr. diGenova said the government's latest request isn't out of the ordinary.

"It would be standard practice for the government to file such a pleading when someone had failed to comply with the terms of their probation," he said. "The courts expect the government to do this when they come into possession of knowledge that a court order, which is what probation is, has been violated."

It will be up to U.S. Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson to decide whether to revoke Mr. Barry's probation.

"This is an elected public official, who has a higher duty of compliance than an ordinary citizen," Mr. diGenova said.

Prosecutors argued in their memo last week that Mr. Barry has shown "unworthiness to reap the benefits of a lenient sanction."

The prosecutors also called his failure to pay his taxes the latest in a series of "willful acts in defiance of the tax laws." They said Mr. Barry's actions violate his probation.

Mr. Barry had asked the Internal Revenue Service for an extension to allow him to file his return by Oct. 15, according to court records. However, no return had been filed as of last week, according to an affidavit submitted by an IRS special agent.

"The court's patience should be at an end," the prosecutors wrote. "A longtime elected official who has been responsible for spending public funds collected from District of Columbia taxpayers, the defendant chose not to file his own return for six years."

The IRS began garnishing Mr. Barry's paycheck in November.

CIVIL LAW:

Jury Finds FBI Retaliated Against Agent, Awards Her $565,000 (AP)

AP, February 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128446

MINNEAPOLIS - A jury awarded $565,000 in damages on Monday to a former FBI agent, agreeing that Jane Turner's superiors retaliated against her for filing a sex-discrimination complaint against her supervisor.

"Today is a true vindication for whistleblowers in the FBI," Turner said after the jury returned its verdict in federal court.

Turner retired in 2003, amid the pressure of both her discrimination case and a separate dispute that arose after she accused colleagues of stealing a Tiffany crystal globe from the World Trade Center ruins.

The jury awarded her $60,000 in damages for lost wages and $505,000 for emotional distress. One of her attorneys, Robert Hill, said the judge will have to reduce the $505,000 to $300,000 because of a statutory cap on nonmonetary damages, so she'll get $360,000.

Still, Hill said, it's believed to be the largest jury verdict for retaliation in the history of the FBI.

Members of the six-woman, four-man jury expressed strong admiration for Turner afterward. Several gathered around and embraced her. Some had tears in their eyes.

"I just want to tell you I have nothing but the utmost respect for you," juror Renee Anderle said.

Deliberations took a half-day Thursday, all day Friday and half the day Monday.

The defense team's jury consultant, Nikki Carlson, said it was clear that the jury didn't buy the government's defense, which attacked Turner's credibility and job performance. She said one juror told her that the two jurors seated either side of her wrote "LIAR" on their notepads and stopped taking notes when one of Turner's superiors was testifying.

Spokespeople for the FBI and U.S. attorney's office did not immediately return phone calls seeking comment.

Over her 25-year FBI career, Turner was credited with solving some horrifying child-sex abuse and murder cases on North Dakota Indian reservations. She also helped capture Christopher Boyce, a Soviet spy portrayed in the 1985 movie "The Falcon and the Snowman."

Records show Turner was rated superior or exceptional in her job reviews until she filed a sex discrimination complaint against her supervisor, Craig Welken.

Turner said Monday that her initial Equal Employment Opportunity complaint was relatively minor. She recalled that it alleged female agents in the FBI's Minneapolis division, which covers Minnesota and the Dakotas, were being given lower ratings that male agents, and that she herself was not getting equal respect, among other things.

That case was separate from one still pending before the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General. She noticed a Tiffany globe paperweight on a secretary's desk in the Minneapolis FBI office and, after learning it came from Ground Zero, reported it to the inspector general. The FBI then began moves to fire her.

That case had been on hold pending a resolution of this case, Turner said, and she hopes the inspector general takes note that her jury didn't believe the government's claims.

Turner said the FBI's treatment of her had had a "chilling effect" on other agents, and that she'd received several congratulatory calls Monday from current FBI employees, after eight years of getting little support from her colleagues.

"I guess they maybe had a sense that it was OK to poke their heads up and say they did support me," she said.

Ex-agent Wins Lawsuit Against FBI (MINNST)

By Dan Browning

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 6, 2007

Jurors said the FBI retaliated against the female agent, who filed a discrimination complaint in 1998.

Federal jurors hugged former FBI agent Jane Turner on Monday after awarding her $565,000 in damages and finding that the agency had retaliated against her for filing a 1998 sex-discrimination complaint.

"I think you were the very best FBI agent," juror Mashima Dickens told Turner, who investigated child sex-abuse crimes. "Looking at the way you were treated, I just said you were screwed left and right," Dickens said, tears rolling down her cheeks.

"I just want to tell you I have nothing but the utmost respect for you," juror Renee Anderle said as she hugged Turner in the hallway outside Chief U.S. District Judge James Rosenbaum's courtroom in Minneapolis.

"This is vindication," said Turner, 55, of St. Paul. "We spoke truth to power, and we won."

But Turner said she could never repair the damage done to her by her colleagues in the FBI, an organization she had dreamed of joining since she read Nancy Drew detective novels at age 12.

"I'm dead in their eyes because I betrayed them. And that's what's so sad," Turner said.

The government's attorneys declined to comment on the verdict in the trial, which began Jan. 24.

Stephen Kohn, one of Turner's attorneys and president of the National Whistleblower Center in Washington, called it historic. "I think it's the largest jury verdict in a civil rights case against the FBI for an individual plaintiff," he said.

The jury of six women and four men awarded Turner damages of $60,000 in lost wages and $505,000 for emotional distress, loss of reputation and similar injuries.

Rosenbaum will reduce the non-wage damages to the statutory limit of $300,000, said Robert Hill, of Eden Prairie, another of Turner's attorneys.

Turner had a noteworthy career. After joining the FBI in 1978, she helped capture Christopher Boyce, a Soviet spy, and solved some horrendous child-sex abuse and murder cases on North Dakota Indian reservations.

Records show that she received superior or exceptional job ratings until after her supervisor, Craig Welken, was interviewed in 1999 about a sex-discrimination complaint she had filed the previous year. Her ratings plummeted, which led to a transfer from Minot, N.D., to a desk job in Minneapolis.

Jurors decided that the negative job reviews were retaliation for filing the internal discrimination complaint, but that the transfer was not.

About a month after Turner filed the complaint against Welken, a task force was being formed to investigate a child pornographer who had confessed in an Internet chat room to murdering his 7-year-old daughter. The killer, Larry Froistad, recanted his confession, and the U.S. attorney in North Dakota at the time, the late John Schneider, wanted Turner's help. Welken resisted initially, but said he gave in because Schneider was "unrelenting."

Schneider later credited Turner in an e-mail with solving the Froistad case.

Martha Fagg, one of two assistant U.S. attorneys from Iowa who represented the FBI, argued that Turner had basically stopped working after the Froistad case, and that the transfer to Minneapolis was designed to help her get back on track.

"In my opinion, she was using the EEO [Equal Employment Opportunity] process not as a shield, but as a sword," Fagg said.

However, Turner's attorneys introduced evidence that she kept up her casework and solved some especially tough cases while she was being downgraded on her reviews. Two assistant U.S. attorneys testified that they never saw Turner slack off.

Turner's attorneys plan to file for compensation. Kohn said the final bill will be "well over $1 million to taxpayers in a case that should have been resolved at a fraction of the cost years ago."

Turner still has a complaint pending against the FBI with the U.S. inspector general's office. She reported that a fellow agent had brought back memorabilia from the World Trade Center in Manhattan after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Turner said she was being run out of the FBI after that, so she retired in 2003.

Trial Starts In Collins' Air Crash (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 6, 2007

Nearly seven years to the day after a midair collision killed WGN radio personality Bob Collins and two others, a trial opened in federal court Monday to decide who was at fault for the crash of the two small aircraft.

Government lawyers laid the blame on Collins, while attorneys for the three victims said the collision was caused by an air traffic controller and was ultimately the responsibility of the Federal Aviation Administration.

Collins, 57, had been Chicago's top-ranked morning-radio personality for 14 years when his Moravan Z242L struck a Cessna 172P as the two aircraft approached the Waukegan Regional Airport on the hazy afternoon of Feb. 8, 2000.

Collins' plane crashed onto the roof of the Midwestern Regional Medical Center, killing him and passenger Herman Luscher, 58. The Cessna's pilot, Sharon Hock, 31, a flight attendant who was on her second solo flight, died when her plane crashed on a Zion street.

No one on the ground was injured, but the hospital sustained $28 million in property damage and lost business.

The bench trial before U.S. District Judge John Darrah, expected to last about two weeks, opened with the federal government as the lone defendant after Midwest Air Traffic Control Inc., which operates the Waukegan airport's tower, admitted liability Monday.

But lawyers for survivors of the three victims, including Collins' widow, Christine, contend the FAA controlled the Waukegan airport's operations and bears the responsibility for the collision.

In opening remarks, attorney Kevin Durkin, who represents Collins' estate, said air traffic controller Gregory Fowler failed to properly sequence the planes on their approach to the airfield and made other errors.

For years, Durkin said, the Waukegan airfield was mistakenly left off an FAA list of airports that qualified for radar.

The FAA had radar installed in the Waukegan tower after the collision because of political pressure following Collins' death, Durkin said. Another factor, he said: After the crash, Bulls great Michael Jordan wouldn't fly into Waukegan in his personal jet without the airfield equipped with radar.

Robert Clifford, another Collins attorney, said an economic expert hired by the plaintiffs estimates Collins would have earned more than $20 million if he hadn't perished in the crash. He disputed that Collins had planned to retire when his five-year contract was to expire 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0128448

"Next to the Cubs, Bob personified WGN and was the heart and soul of WGN," Clifford said.

WGN is owned by Tribune Co., which also owns the Chicago Tribune.

Jill Dahlmann Rosa, a Justice Department lawyer, said Collins set up the collision by misreporting his location to the tower, misleading Hock and the air traffic controller.

Collins' conduct "fell below the standard of care of a reasonable pilot," she said.

Rosa also maintained that Collins failed to report his diabetes to the FAA and that it "impaired his ability to see and evaluate the threat and react accordingly."

Rosa scoffed at the lack of radar playing a part in the collision, saying the Waukegan airfield has low levels of activity and that thousands of small airports operate even without air traffic controllers and have no problems.

Voting Rights Expert Won't Testify In Noxubee County Election Dispute Case (JCL)

By Jimmie E. Gates

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, February 6, 2007

The Noxubee County case has apparently ended without court resuming after the defense decided against calling an expert witness to testify.

An out-of-state voting rights expert had been scheduled to testify Feb. 15.

The lawsuit, the first of its kind in the United States filed by the U.S. Department of Justice, accuses black political leaders in Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters.

The three-week trial in U.S. District Court concluded last Wednesday, with the exception of the expert coming to Jackson to testify.

The Justice Department's lawsuit mostly accuses Noxubee County Democratic Committee Chairman Ike Brown and people working in concert with him of discriminating against white voters.

U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee set March 26 as the deadline for both sides to submit final written briefs in the case. He will then make a ruling after that time.

FBI To Share Progress On Race Crimes, Including Moore's Ford (ATHBH)

By Rebecca Quigley

Athens Banner-Herald, February 6, 2007

FBI officials will announce this month how they will proceed with more than 50 unsolved, racially motivated murders - including the 1946 lynchings of two couples in Walton County.

A mob of more than a dozen white men killed Roger and Dorothy Malcom and George and Mae Murray Dorsey near Moore's Ford Bridge on July 25, 1946, days after Roger Malcom fought with a white man.

Since 1997, a committee of locals, with the support of the Georgia Association of Black Elected Officials, have called for state and federal investigators to reopen the 60-year-old case while some of the suspects still are alive.

FBI officials will hold a news conference later this month to give an update on the bureau's so-called "cold case initiative" in the Moore's Ford lynching and 51 other unsolved race-related murders, said Nancy Nelson, section chief of the public corruption/civil rights section of the FBI's Criminal Investigation Division.

The bureau has been reviewing the cold cases to see if new technology, such as DNA testing, and a new willingness by witnesses to come forward, will allow federal and state agents to give some conclusion to the decades-old and often forgotten murders, Nelson said.

"If we can get prosecutions out of it, terrific," but agents mostly are seeking resolution for the victims' families, she said.

FBI officials have not yet set a date for the announcement, Nelson said.

In 2005, the Moore's Ford Memorial Committee sent letters to several members of Congress, including Sen. Arlen Specter, member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, urging them to ask the FBI to "assign two agents to (the Moore's Ford) case to review existing evidence and actively pursue new leads."

The letter helped spur the FBI to review nearly 40 unsolved race-related cases.

Last year, the U.S. Senate established a new division in the Department of Justice that was tasked with investigating those decades-old, unsolved racial murders.

DOJ_NMG_0128449

While members of the Moore's Ford group aren't sure if media attention on the case or recent re-enactments of the crime prompted legislation, the advocacy committee's letter likely influenced the FBI to re-evaluate the Moore's Ford case and other unsolved cases, said Rich Rusk, the committee's secretary.

The committee also sent a letter to FBI officials asking agents to reopen the case.

"The letter certainly proved useful in bringing the case to the forefront," said Stephen Emmett, spokesman for the FBI office in Atlanta.

When the FBI originally investigated the murders, there were as many as 55 suspects, but no one was arrested or charged in connection with the case.

White Supremacist Activity In US Flourishes, Fueled By Anti-immigrant Sentiments (FINDLAW/AP)

By Erin Texeira, Ap National Writer

AP, February 6, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-Huge street protests against tougher immigration laws made millions of immigrants more visible and powerful in the United States last year, but, according to some rights groups, they seem to have revived a hateful counter force: white supremacists.

Groups linked to the Ku Klux Klan, skinheads and neo-Nazis grew significantly more active, holding more rallies, distributing leaflets and increasing their presence on the Internet - much of it focused on stirring anti-immigrant sentiment, a new report released by the Anti-Defamation League says.

"Extremist groups are good at seizing on whatever the hot button is of the day and twisting the message to get new members," Deborah M. Lauter, ADL Civil Rights director, said Monday. "This one seems to be taking hold with more of mainstream America than we'd like to see."

Old Klan chapters have been revived and new ones started throughout the South, historically the heart of the group, and in other places such as Michigan, Iowa and New Jersey, says the report, which was scheduled for official release Tuesday.

Last May in Alabama, an anti-immigration rally included slogans such as, "Let's get rid of the Mexicans!" according to the document, titled "Ku Klux Klan Rebounds."

"The Klan is increasingly cooperating with other extremist groups and Neo-Nazi groups," Lauter said. "That's a new phenomenon."

Between 2000 and 2005, hate groups mushroomed 33 percent and Klan chapters by 63 percent, according to Mark Potok, director of the Southern Poverty Law Center, which tracks hate crimes.

Precise data are difficult to pin down, but Potok's group counts as many as 150 Klan chapters with up to 8,000 members across the United States, still well below a peak of 4 million in the 1920s. More than 800 hate groups exist around the country, Southern Poverty research shows.

In the late 1990s, memberships in such groups was crumbling as they lost leaders and struggled to organize, said Brian Levin, director of the Center for the Study of Hate and Extremism at California State University, San Bernardino. Many hit bottom around 2000.

"Whenever you think the Klan is down and out, they find another way to reinvent themselves," he said of the recent resurgence.

Historically, the Klan's focus had been to terrorize African-Americans - through race riots, lynchings and other killings - but it reached its highest membership in the 1920s by focusing on immigration.

Newcomers from Ireland and Germany were portrayed as Catholic usurpers invading the United States, taking jobs from native-born Americans and undermining national fabric, Levin said.

Said Potok: "It's remarkable to look back at the nativist sentiments toward Catholics - it's very similar to what we're seeing with Mexicans now."

Today, many white supremacists blame immigrants, particularly Hispanics, for crime, struggling schools or unemployment, for instance. With many Americans already divided on how to revamp laws and practices to address the nation's swelling immigrant communities, immigration "is an issue that works for hate groups," Potok said.

Some Latinos are feeling the effects firsthand. Last September, a Kentucky family originally from El Salvador found a wooden cross burning on their front lawn just weeks after they moved in. Earlier last year, a Latino teenager in Houston was brutally beaten and sodomized while one attacker screamed "White Power!" The victim barely survived, and one attacker was sentenced to life in prison.

"I've been doing (Hispanic advocacy work) for a long, long time and the atmosphere has never been as poisonous as it has been in the last few years," said Lisa Navarrete, a vice president at the National Council of La Raza. "The level of vitriol is new."

U.S. Civil Rights Group Calls For Warrant Limits After Police Kill Elderly Woman (FINDLAW/AP)

By Doug Gross, Associated Press Writer
AP, February 6, 2007

(AP) - ATLANTA-A local chapter of a U.S. civil rights group on Monday called on police and politicians to limit the use of "no-knock" warrants in the wake of the death of an elderly woman shot by police during such a search.

The Rev. R.L. White, Jr., chapter president for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, unveiled a list of recommendations the group compiled after a December community forum prompted by the shooting.

"This is of utmost urgency," said White, speaking at the chapter's Atlanta headquarters. "The situation that happened last year was only the tip of the iceberg."

The NAACP chapter also called on police to require officers to receive sensitivity training, for the Atlanta Police Department to launch a goodwill initiative in the city's low-income, high-crime neighborhoods and for a citizens review board to be created to review incidents like the Nov. 21 shooting.

Kathryn Johnston died and three officers were wounded in the shootout during a no-knock search for drugs in Johnston's northwest Atlanta home. Family members say Johnston was 92 years old; authorities said she was 88.

When officers raided her home without first announcing their presence, police say Johnston fired a handgun before officers returned fire, killing her.

Narcotics officers said they were told by a paid informant that cocaine was being sold from Johnston's home.

No cocaine was found in the home, and a man who claims he was the paid informant later said he was told by officers to lie about buying drugs at the home.

The FBI and Georgia Bureau of investigation are investigating the incident at the request of Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington.

The NAACP recommendations call for police to conduct advance surveillance of homes where they plan to use no-knock warrants. They also suggest that judges reserve the warrants for extreme cases.

"I commend the NAACP for their input and involvement on how the Atlanta Police Department conducts business," Pennington said in a statement. "Even though we are currently reviewing our internal policies and procedures, I do not oppose any measure that will strengthen our relationship with the community. I look forward to working together to reclaim the public's trust in our hard-working men and women."

White said the suggestions will be delivered to Mayor Shirley Franklin, Atlanta's city council and Georgia Supreme Court Chief Justice Leah Ward Sears.

Cheapening A Fight Against Hatred (WP)

By Richard Cohen
The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

I started writing a column for The Post in 1976. It was about local affairs, and so it took me about a year to write my first column about anti-Semitism. Since then, I have written about 90 more, most of them full-throated condemnations of the hatred that killed fully one-third of all Jews during my own lifetime. So it comes as a surprise that has the force of a mugging to be accused of aiding the very people I so hate -- of being an abettor of something called "The New Anti-Semitism."

The accusation comes from the pen of Indiana University's Alvin H. Rosenfeld, whose report " 'Progressive' Jewish Thought and the New Anti-Semitism" was published by the prestigious American Jewish Committee and given great play in the New York Times. Certain prominent American Jews -- the historian Tony Judt, the playwright Tony Kushner, the poet Adrienne Rich and I, among others -- were charged with aiding anti-Semitism with our writings. We were, in other words, enablers. As if that was not bad enough, Shulamit Reinharz, a Brandeis University professor and a columnist for a Jewish weekly, dispensed totally with Rosenfeld's qualification. She told the Boston Globe that all of us mentioned in the AJC report are just plain anti-Semites.

Among the first to call me after the Times piece appeared was the AJC itself. It apologized. It did not mean to include me with the others, and it would, its representative told me, soon set matters straight. It issued a news release saying that Rosenfeld's characterization of me does "not reflect the totality of [my] occasional writings on the Middle East." My "occasional writings" include at least 30 datelined columns from the region and a near-obsessive attention to the subject. The diligent can find the AJC statement on the Internet and the reference to me in paragraph 10, a parenthetical phrase of near-microscopic prominence. Oddly, it has not had the same impact as the Times story.

Let me take some responsibility. At times, I have written coldly and provocatively about Israel, maybe once or twice in anger. This, in turn, has angered some readers who knew what I was thinking but not what I was feeling -- that, at bottom, I had a strong emotional attachment to Israel. It is a country whose survival is not only important for the Jewish people but for the rest of mankind as well. I can enumerate many reasons why I support Israel -- it's a legitimate state, a real democracy, etc. But it is also where Jews went to escape the killers; to ignore that is to extinguish the twin lights of morality and memory and leave the world even darker than it now is.

But having said that, let me wonder about those American Jews who interpret criticism of Israel as anti-Semitism or something that abets it. The charge has been leveled at Jimmy Carter over his recent book, "Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid." I, too, didn't like the book. I, too, found the book hostile, oddly unbalanced and chillingly lacking in historical context -- not just a near-total neglect of the Holocaust but also no mention of pre-1948 Arab pogroms, such as the 1929 murder of 67 Jews in Hebron. Still, Carter's overall point about Israeli occupation of the West Bank is apt, and calling him all sorts of names does not change that. The former president has in effect embraced the current, ahistorical context for Israel. For many, it is no longer the orphaned waif of the Holocaust but the bastard child of Western colonialism.

Rosenfeld is surely right about one thing: It's astonishing that in the 60 years since the Nazi extermination camps were liberated, anti-Semitism has revived and thrived. Still, it hardly makes sense to fight it by promiscuously throwing around the word "anti-Semite" so that it loses its punch or to flay Jewish critics of Israel. I strongly disagree with some of these critics and find some of their views obnoxious, but if somehow an anti-Semite finds common ground with them, that is hardly their fault -- and certainly not their intent. After all, anti-Semites do not concern themselves merely with Israel. They hate all Jews no matter where they may be.

It's sad that the American Jewish Committee commissioned and published Rosenfeld's report. I can't imagine what good will come out of it. Instead, it has given license to the most intolerant and narrow-minded of Israel's defenders so that, as the AJC concedes in my case, any veering from orthodoxy is met with censure or, from someone like Reinharz, the most powerful of all post-Holocaust condemnations -- anti-Semite -- is diluted beyond recognition. The offense here is not just to a handful of relatively unimportant writers, but to memory itself.

Smithfield Foods Says It Complied With Justice Department Information Request on Acquisition

SMITHFIELD, Va. (AP) -- Smithfield Foods Inc. said Monday it has complied with a Department of Justice antitrust division request for information related to the pork processor's acquisition of rival Premium Standard Farms Inc.

Smithfield said it plans to acquire the pork producer for $674 million in cash and stock and assume $117 million in debt.

Smithfield said it hopes the antitrust division can complete its review in enough time for the deal to close in the first quarter of 2007.

A Premium Standard Farms shareholders meeting has been scheduled for Feb. 23 to vote on the deal.

Smithfield Foods shares fell 25 cents to close at $26.13 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Companies Are Trying To Beat The Antitrust Clock (DEAL)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell, The Deal

The Deal, February 6, 2007

Companies trying to hasten the antitrust reviews of their deals are increasingly deciding to hit the reset button on the regulatory clock, a maneuver aimed at saving time and money on government reviews.

Although the strategy is becoming increasingly popular, it's not a sure thing.

Two recent deals indicate that refiling produces mixed results.

Express Scripts Inc. Wednesday announced it was pulling and refiling its premerger notification, in the hope of evading a second request from the Federal Trade Commission regarding its hostile bid for rival pharmacy benefit manager Caremark Inc. But Genentech Inc., which earlier pulled and refiled its paperwork regarding its purchase of Tanox Inc., announced Monday it will have to comply with a longer, costly review.

While the government hasn't historically kept track of corporate decisions to pull and refile merger notices, it is starting to, and on Wednesday a Department of Justice official said those corporate moves to pull and refile seem be increasing. About two-thirds of those cases have successfully skirted a government demand for documents and data, known as a second request for information.

The process of notifying the government's antitrust agency of merger plans and getting approval to proceed despite competitive issues has become an increasingly elaborate dance under the rubric of the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antirust Improvements Act of 1976.

Tom Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the antirust division at DOJ, and FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras have both repeatedly said they are trying to minimize the cost and time burden of the merger review process, and that as a part of that effort, both agencies are aggressively examining deals during the initial 30 days they are permitted to look over a deal before having to issue a second request.

But sometimes, one month just isn't enough for antitrust lawyers to collect, review, deliver and explain the data fast enough. During that same time, staff lawyers at the agencies also need to review information that may include sophisticated economic data, consider the implications and evaluate the merger's competitive impact in industries that may be new, arcane or rapidly evolving.

As a result, the staff decision to issue a second request for information can prolong the review, and dramatically increase the price tag on the merger review process.

But a second request may not mean the government is really interested in blocking the deal. During the past seven years, 265 cases at DOJ received second requests, according to Bob Kramer, a senior staff official, but only 104 of those cases saw enforcement actions, such as consent decrees involving divestitures or licensing agreements. And only four of those cases actually proceeded to trial.

The cost of the review isn't chicken feed. Merging parties pay $1 million to $20 million for antitrust scrutiny, which varies based on the size of a deal, the nature of the markets involved, the scope of the overlapping product markets and the speed at which the parties submit the data, but on average runs about $10 million per party, according to antitrust lawyers.

Armed with the knowledge that the government is more likely to resolve the matter without action, and in an effort to hasten the process cost-effectively, private-firm antitrust lawyers have sought to increase the time of a review without forcing the government to issue a second request -- hence, the increase in the pull and refile maneuver.

In addition to pulling and refiling -- which can be done once without repaying fees and is sometimes done twice, doubling the fee cost but still avoiding the need to respond to a second request -- lawyers are trying to get ahead of the game.

Antitrust lawyers may enter discussions with agency staff to discuss issues or parse data about a deal even before the official merger notification paperwork is filed, and antitrust lawyers in Washington say it's often a good tactic to help staff narrow the focus to the critical competitive issues of a merger.

The FTC did not immediately provide any statistics on how often the process is successfully used.

F.T.C. Reaffirms Rambus Antitrust Ruling (AP)

AP, February 6, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 5 (AP) — The Federal Trade Commission made final its ruling that the memory chip designer Rambus violated antitrust laws, imposing limits on the royalties the company can charge.

Wall Street was bracing for a potentially harsher order than the one the commission released Monday, and Rambus stock rose sharply.

Still, the final opinion provides the sharpest criticism to date of Rambus, and legal experts said it would set an important precedent for the broader technology industry.

The order said Rambus violated federal antitrust laws “by deliberately engaging in a pattern of anticompetitive acts to deceive an industrywide standard-setting organization.”

Thomas R. Lavelle, senior vice president and general counsel for Rambus, said the company was disappointed with the opinion and would appeal.

The case hinges on whether Rambus illegally obtained a monopoly in the 1990s when it secured patents for two popular types of memory used in personal computers. Rambus was accused of failing to disclose to an engineering council that its patents had been incorporated into an industry standard regarding memory technology.

An administrative law judge dismissed the complaint in 2004, but the F.T.C. overturned that ruling in July 2006.

Rambus, which is based in Los Altos, Calif., insisted for years that it disclosed the patents to the memory makers, Micron Technology and Hitachi, before the standards-setting discussions began. Rambus lawyers also argued that disclosure policies of the council, the JEDEC Solid State Technology Association, failed to specify what Rambus should have revealed to the committee.

DOJ_NMG_0128453

On Monday, the commission required the company to hire an agency-approved compliance officer to ensure that its patents and patent applications "are disclosed to industry standard-setting bodies in which it participates."

The nearly five-year-old case has battered Rambus's shares for several years. News of the ruling sent the shares surging 24 percent, up $4.58, to $23.50 on Nasdaq.

Daniel I. Prywes, a lawyer at Bryan Cave in Washington, said the ruling set a precedent for the commission's handling of cases involving standards-setting organizations and would help Rambus and dozens of other companies understand the legal framework of such organizations.

"Now that the F.T.C. has laid the legal groundwork," Mr. Prywes wrote in an e-mail message, "future cases attacking 'patent ambushes' at standards organizations should be able to move more quickly and obtain powerful remedies before the technologies at issue are superseded in the marketplace by next-generation devices."

Rambus Shares Surge After FTC's Antitrust Order (MRKTWTCH)

By Matt Andrejczak

Market Watch, February 6, 2007

FTC's remedy less harsh than feared

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- The Federal Trade Commission ordered Rambus Inc. on Monday to license some of its older computer memory-chip technology and set maximum royalty rates it can collect for licensing.

Rambus, of Los Altos, Calif., said it plans to appeal the ruling that stems from government antitrust charges filed more than four years ago.

However, shares of Rambus (NasdaqGS:RMBS - News) surged 24% to $23.50 as the FTC remedy was deemed less severe than investors had expected.

In its final order, the FTC said Rambus can charge a maximum rate of 0.5% for DDR SDRAM and a rate of 0.25% for SDRAM -- memory chips widely used in personal computers, servers, printers, and cameras. Those rates would apply over three years and then go to zero.

The government's remedy also bars Rambus from attempting to collect more than the maximum royalty rates from companies that may already incorporate its DRAM technology.

The FTC issued its order on a 3-2 vote. Commissioners Pamela Jones Harbour and J. Thomas Rosch disagreed with parts of the remedy.

Importantly, one analyst said, the FTC order doesn't affect second-generation DDR and SDRAM memory-chip designs that Rambus has developed or other memory technologies that it's engineered. The order also didn't invalidate any Rambus patent.

"The remedy issued by the FTC could have been much worse and investors were expecting the decision to be harsher than it was," wrote BWS Financial analyst Hamed Khorsand, who rates Rambus shares as a buy, in a note to investors. "In three years, we would not expect RMBS to be making much, if anything, from the products the FTC is capping."

However, the legal significance of the government's action is enormous and should pave the way for quicker remedies in future legal cases, said antitrust attorney Daniel Prywes, a partner at Bryan Cave LLP.

"For the first time, the FTC has laid out in tremendous detail how it will impose remedies on companies that conduct patent ambushes at standards organizations," he said.

The FTC charged Rambus in June 2002 with violating antitrust laws by engaging in anticompetitive acts to deceive, the Joint Electron Device Engineering Council, an organization formed to incorporate patented technologies into its published standards that companies could license on a royalty-free basis or on favorable terms.

Rambus was a participant, but the FTC charged that the company failed to disclose that it was working on technologies later adopted into the standards.

In February 2004, an FTC administrative judge ruled in favor of Rambus. The FTC overturned that decision last July.

Rambus said it plans to appeal the order, set to go in effect within 60 days. The order also barred the company from making misrepresentations or omissions to technology standard-setting groups.

"We believe the commission got it wrong," Rambus General Counsel Tom Lavelle said in a conference call.

He added the company was "disappointed the commission adopted rates below what we argued were reasonable rates and were the result of arm's-length negotiations."

Lavelle said if the FTC refuses to hear its appeal it will seek a federal appellate court hearing.

Rambus Stock Soars 24% After Antitrust Ruling By FTC (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, February 6, 2007

In a long-running antitrust case, Silicon Valley company Rambus dodged harsher penalties when the Federal Trade Commission issued an order Monday capping royalties — rather than eliminating them — on some of its memory chip technology.

Wall Street seemed relieved: Rambus' stock price soared 24%, or $4.58 a share, to close at $23.50 in regular trading on Nasdaq.

The FTC charged in 2002 that Rambus illegally monopolized the market for some computer memory technologies by failing to disclose its patents to the Joint Electron Device Engineering Council (JEDEC), an engineering standards body. An FTC administrative law judge tossed the complaint in 2004, but the FTC overturned the ruling last year.

Under the FTC order, Rambus cannot charge royalty rates higher than 0.25% to 0.5% for four of its older memory chip products for three years. After that, the royalty rates on those chips drop to zero. It had been charging an average of 1% to 2%, according to the FTC.

The order also bars Rambus from misrepresenting its patents to any standards-setting group or its members. Rambus also must hire a compliance officer and allow the FTC to monitor its bookkeeping.

In a statement, Rambus general counsel Tom Lavelle said the company will appeal the decision "because we strongly disagree with a number of the commission's determinations." Lavelle said that the FTC commission "continues to ignore the extensive findings of fact" made earlier by FTC chief administrative law judge Stephen McGuire.

Daniel Prywes, an attorney for JEDEC, hailed the order. "This is a turning point that puts the industry on notice," he said. "This sends a strong message that deceptive conduct at standards-setting organizations will be met by strong remedies."

But others thought the FTC, which voted 3-2 for the order, should have been tougher and imposed penalties in which Rambus would collect no royalties at all.

In her dissenting opinion, Commissioner Pamela Jones Harbour wrote: "I believe the commission should have imposed a royalty-free remedy in this case. … I do not believe the remedy adopted by the majority goes far enough to restore competition."

Commissioner Thomas Rosch also wrote in dissent that without "zero-royalty rates," Rambus will "continue to reap the fruits of its ongoing violation of Section 2 (federal antitrust Wagner Act)."

The Rambus case and the FTC's remedy raise the question of whether rapidly changing technology is outpacing the enforcement efforts of regulators.

In her opinion, Jones Harbour wrote that the FTC also should have imposed a royalty cap on the newest DDR2 generation of Rambus memory devices that are gaining popularity in the market.

Prywes said the commission laid out a detailed road map that should enable it to enforce similar antitrust violations more quickly.

Rambus is entangled in major antitrust and patent lawsuits with Samsung, Micron Technology and other semiconductor makers in federal and state civil courts. The FTC order could affect those cases.

Rambus, based in Los Altos, Calif., designs so-called DRAM chips, or "dynamic random access memory chips," used in computers, printers and other devices.

Beatles End Trademark Dispute With Apple (FT)

By Richard Waters In San Francisco And Nikki Tait And Emiko Terazono In London

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

The Beatles on Monday buried their latest trademark dispute with US technology company Apple, removing one of the obstacles to a potential deal that could bring the Fab Four's songs to the iTunes music store.

The two sides did not comment on whether a digital music deal, which has been widely anticipated, would follow.

However, Neil Aspinall, manager of Apple Corps, The Beatles' record company, appeared to hint at the possibility of a future commercial relationship.

"We wish Apple Inc every success and look forward to many years of peaceful co-operation with them," he said.

A deal to put The Beatles on iTunes was already under discussion before Monday's settlement, according to a person familiar with the matter, although it is unclear how far the negotiations have got.

Bringing The Beatles to iTunes would open up a highly valued catalogue of songs and could represent a significant breakthrough for the entire digital music business, according to analysts.

There was already huge pent-up demand to buy Beatles music in digital form and many people over the age of 40 would be likely to turn to online purchases for the first time, said Richard Doherty, a digital media analyst at Envisioneering.

However, others cautioned that personal and legal complications could still stand in the way of a deal.

"The problem for Neil is he has four shareholders who have to approve every single thing, which doesn't always happen," one person familiar with the issue said.

DOJ_NMG_0128455

The Beatles' representatives have also been in a legal dispute with EMI, which owns the recording rights to the band's music and would have to agree to an online deal.

The legal settlement came shortly before Apple Corps and Apple Inc were set to reopen their legal battle at an appeals court hearing in London.

Apple Corps had sued the US company, arguing that its use of the Apple brand for its digital music service broke a 1991 agreement between the two sides.

Last year, a High Court judge ruled in favour of Apple Inc. Under Monday's settlement, the US company will own all the trademarks relating to the Apple name, and license "certain trademarks" back to Apple Corp. Each side will bear its own legal costs.

Mike Lynd, partner at intellectual property specialists Marks & Clerk, said it was "highly unusual" to see the original owner of a trademark relinquish ownership and control of its identifying mark.

"It seems fair to deduce that Apple Inc has paid a substantial sum for the record companies' rights," he said, pointing out that decades of goodwill had built up.

"We love The Beatles, and it has been painful being at odds with them over these trademarks," Steve Jobs, chief executive officer of Apple, said in a statement.

"It feels great to resolve this in a positive manner, and in a way that should remove the potential for further disagreements in the future."

Apple, Beatles Make Some Peace (WSJ)

By Don Clark And Ethan Smith

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

Apple Inc. appears to have reached a final resolution of a trademark battle with the company that represents the Beatles. But today's iTunes users won't be able to download "Yesterday" tomorrow.

The companies have long squabbled over the word Apple, with the Beatles' Apple Corps Ltd. objecting to the use of its trademarks by the Silicon Valley company. Under a new agreement announced yesterday, Apple Inc. will take over those trademarks, and license some of them back to Apple Corps, which agreed to drop its trademark-infringement litigation. Financial terms weren't disclosed.

Neither company answered the biggest question for music fans -- whether they will finally be able to buy Beatles recordings from Apple's iTunes music store and transfer those purchases to an iPod music player. The Beatles are the most prominent holdout from iTunes, and the companies have privately discussed licensing deals in the past, but nothing has materialized.

Michael McGuire, an analyst at Gartner, said the trademark pact was probably a prerequisite for the companies to reach any music licensing arrangement. But the deal doesn't necessarily clear away all impediments to a broader partnership. "Is it now a fait accompli? I'm not so sure," Mr. McGuire said.

Steve Jobs, Apple's chief executive, is known to be interested in selling recordings by the Beatles. At the company's Macworld trade show in January, he cued the band's "Lovely Rita" as part of a demonstration of his company's new iPhone device. But any agreement also requires the cooperation of surviving members of the band as well as EMI Group PLC, which distributes their music throughout the world. An EMI spokeswoman said it "has been in ongoing discussions with Apple Corps to get the Beatles to make their music available in a digital music format."

Publishing rights to the Beatles' music is controlled by Sony/ATV Music Publishing, which is jointly owned by Sony Corp. and Michael Jackson and would be expected to receive a cut of revenue from online sales. A spokeswoman for the Beatles said there is no implication about a music-licensing deal from the trademark settlement, which simply preserves the legal status quo.

An Apple Inc. spokeswoman, Natalie Kerris, sounded a bit more optimistic that the trademark deal could hasten a music-licensing pact. "Clearly it paves the way," she said. "We are certainly hopeful." But she added, "we don't have anything to announce at this time."

The companies' battles began after the 1976 founding of what was until recently called Apple Computer Inc. The Beatles' company, founded in 1968, complained about the use of the trademark; the companies reached a then-secret settlement in 1981 under which Apple Computer agreed that the Beatles' company would have exclusive use of the trademark in the field of music.

The Beatles' company sued for trademark infringement in 1989, after Apple's Macintosh began being widely used by musicians. They reached a settlement in 1991, but another flap arose in 2003 over Apple's iTunes music store. Last May, Britain's High Court dismissed Apple Corps suit; the settlement avoids the possibility of appeal.

Expect Beatles Downloads Soon, Media Watchers Say (USAT)

By Jefferson Graham

DOJ_NMG_0128456

USA Today, February 6, 2007

The Apples have decided to give peace a chance.

Apple Corps. — the Beatles' business entity — and Apple Inc. (AAPL)— home of iTunes and the iconic iPod — on Monday said they have settled their longstanding trademark dispute.

The move clears the way to get the Beatles music available as digital downloads on Apple's popular iTunes Store, say Wall Street analysts.

The Beatles are the "most notable iTunes holdout," says Gene Munster, an analyst at equity firm Piper Jaffray. "Once the Beatles are in, this will lead to a chain reaction among other bands and movie studios. No one will want to be left out anymore."

Besides the Beatles, Led Zeppelin, Radiohead, AC/DC, Kid Rock and Garth Brooks have declined to offer their music as digital downloads. Last year, Apple added movies to iTunes with films from Walt Disney and, more recently, Paramount Pictures. Studio holdouts include 20th Century Fox, NBC Universal, Sony Pictures, MGM and Warner Bros.

Munster predicts that Apple Inc. will officially announce the Beatles availability on iTunes within the next three months.

The Beatles on iTunes "would be a boon for both sides," says Geoff Mayfield, director of charts for Billboard magazine. "It would give the baby-boomer-age consumer another reason to consider making the jump to an iPod, if they haven't already."

Mayfield expects Apple to do a major marketing campaign for the Beatles, and notes that Bob Dylan profited handsomely from such an alliance in 2006, with the release of his Modern Times album. "It was Dylan's first No. 1 album in more than 20 years, and directly attributable to iTunes," he says.

Apple Inc. declined to comment.

Love, a soundtrack remix of older songs for a Beatles-themed Las Vegas show, has sold 1.2 million copies since November, Mayfield says. A 2000 compilation of their No. 1 hits, 1, has sold more than 10 million copies.

Apple has an 80% market share of digital downloads, according to Paul Resnikoff, editor of the Digital Music News newsletter. A Beatles alliance would only "help Apple, and hurt competitors," he says.

Still, he notes, by now, "People have figured out how to get the Beatles music onto their iPods." Consumers transfer music from a CD into iTunes, then to an iPod.

The Beatles formed Apple Corps. in 1968. Apple Computer made its debut in 1976. Lawsuits about trademark issues have been ongoing since. A court showdown in England last year ended with a victory for Apple Inc. (See copy of the two firms' 1991 agreement.)

Under the new settlement, Apple Inc. owns trademark rights to the name and has agreed to license certain of the trademarks to Apple Corps. Both parties declined to address financial settlement terms.

After Long Dispute, Two Apples Work It Out (NYT)

By Laurie J. Flynn

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

The long and winding road has come to an end for the Beatles, at least as far as the dispute over their Apple logo is concerned.

Apple Inc., the maker of the iPod, and Apple Corps, the guardian of the Beatles' music interests, announced yesterday that they had settled their dispute over the technology company's name and its use of an apple logo.

Under the new agreement, Apple Inc. now owns all the trademarks related to "Apple" and will license certain trademarks back to Apple Corps Ltd., the London company founded by the Beatles in the late 1960s.

The agreement immediately raised speculation that the Beatles' music, which has been unavailable on legitimate digital music services, might soon be licensed for downloads from the Apple iTunes service.

Neither company would comment directly on that prospect, though both sides said they were happy to have worked things out.

"We love the Beatles, and it has been painful being at odds with them over these trademarks," said Steven P. Jobs, chief executive of Apple Inc., who is widely known as a huge fan of the Beatles' music. The companies declined to provide further details of the settlement.

The new agreement replaces one signed by the companies in 1991, when Apple Corps, which represents Paul McCartney; Ringo Starr; the estate of George Harrison; and Yoko Ono, the widow of John Lennon, moved to ensure that the computer company did not use the apple logo in the music business. The Apple Corps logo is a Granny Smith apple. The logo for Apple Inc. is an apple with a bite taken out of it.

But things changed in 2003 when Apple Computer, as it was known until it dropped "Computer" from its name last month, began signing deals with record labels to distribute music online through iTunes.

DOJ_NMG_0128457

Apple Computer had approached the British company in hopes of distributing the Beatles' music on iTunes, but Apple Corps instead accused the technology company of breaching the 1991 contract, arguing that Apple was essentially entering the music business with its service.

Last May, a judge in London ruled in favor of Apple Computer, agreeing that the company's use of the logo was fair and reasonable. Apple Corps's appeal of that ruling was scheduled for this month.

"It is great to put this dispute behind us and move on," Neil Aspinall, manager of Apple Corps, said in a statement. "The years ahead are going to be very exciting times for us."

The Beatles are considered the last major holdout from online downloading services like iTunes. Today, Beatles fans can play Beatles music on an iPod only by transferring the songs from a CD.

But the latest settlement does nothing to resolve that issue, and Mr. Jobs said nothing about it yesterday. Speculation about a deal to sell Beatles songs on iTunes reached fever pitch on fan Web sites and blogs after Mr. Jobs appeared to give the band a highly public nod last month. In introducing the Apple iPhone, he demonstrated the device's music-playing capabilities by displaying Beatles album covers and playing the song "Lovely Rita" for the audience.

Elizabeth Freund, a spokeswoman for Apple Corps, said the settlement had no bearing on any move to make Beatles music available on iTunes, saying that was a separate matter for the Beatles to discuss with EMI, which holds the rights to the Beatles' recordings.

A spokeswoman at EMI, where digital sales of Beatles songs could be a lucrative source of income, declined to comment on whether or when that might happen.

The iTunes service is by far the largest legal music downloading site, having sold more than two billion music downloads accounting for more than 70 percent of the market, according to the NPD Group, a market research company.

With the Beatles dispute behind it, Apple Inc. faces still another trademark battle: a lawsuit filed by Cisco Systems, the networking company, over the use of the iPhone brand. Cisco has said the two companies have been unable to reach an agreement over the name after several years of discussion.

Mark Chandler, Cisco's general counsel, said at the time the suit was filed in January that Cisco would have been willing to share the trademark if Apple had agreed to its terms. These included an agreement by Apple to differentiate its coming iPhone product — a combination iPod and cellphone — from Cisco's iPhone, a business phone that uses the Internet to transmit calls.

Warning of Vista-iTunes Problem

Apple Inc. recommended yesterday that users hold off upgrading their computers to Microsoft's new operating system, Windows Vista, because of compatibility problems with Apple's iTunes music software.

Users should wait to upgrade to Vista until a new version of iTunes becomes available in the next few weeks, said Derick Mains, a spokesman for Apple.

Apple And The Beatles Make Peace Over Their Logos (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

The maker of the iPod and the guardian of the Beatles' music resolved their long-simmering dispute yesterday over who has the right to the Apple trademark.

The settlement between Apple Inc. and Apple Corps, which holds the rights to the band's music, offered greater hope to fans that the two sides could now focus on permitting downloads of Beatles songs through the computer company's iTunes Store. The catalogue of Beatles songs is a holdout from iTunes and other online services.

The two Apples have been exchanging legal salvos for 20 years over their names and logos. The last skirmish came in May after a British judge ruled that iTunes did not violate a 1991 agreement stipulating that the computer maker could keep using its logo if it did not enter the music business. An appeal had been scheduled for this month.

The new settlement replaces that agreement and gives Apple Inc. ownership of all the trademarks related to Apple, meaning it can continue using its name and logos in iTunes. Apple Inc. would license some of those trademarks back to Apple Corps for its continued use.

Each side agreed to pay its own legal costs to end the trademark lawsuit. Further terms were not disclosed.

"We love the Beatles, and it has been painful being at odds with them over these trademarks," said Steve Jobs, Apple Inc.'s chief executive. "It feels great to resolve this in a positive manner and in a way that should remove the potential of further disagreements."

Neil Aspinall, manager of Apple Corps, said the company was glad to resolve the dispute.

"The years ahead are going to be very exciting times for us," he said. "We wish Apple Inc. every success and look forward to many years of peaceful cooperation with them."

DOJ_NMG_0128458

The joint announcement did not mention the prospects of Beatles downloads. The Beatles have not allowed any online service to sell their music. The only Beatles songs for sale on iTunes are cover versions and tributes, and the only legal way of getting the band's tunes onto iPods is to buy a CD and make a digital copy from that.

Seeking Heft, State Street To Add Investors Financial (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

BOSTON -- Bulking up in a bid to stay independent, securities-processing company State Street Corp. said it plans to buy Investors Financial Services Corp. for $4.5 billion in stock to become a big player in the hedge-fund realm.

For years, State Street has prospered here as a leader in the unglamorous business of offering back-office custody work, such as portfolio accounting and issuing monthly statements to institutional investors such as mutual funds.

CONFERENCE CALL

See a transcript of State Street's conference call1, provided by Thomson StreetEvents (www.streetevents.com2). (Adobe Acrobat Required3.)

But the company, which has in the past faced unwanted takeover interest, now grapples with intensified competition in a rapidly consolidating industry in which big players hope to achieve economies of scale through acquisitions.

To shore up its position, State Street is buying fast-growing Investors Financial, a smaller Boston neighbor that provides similar investment services to customers, including hedge funds -- lightly regulated private investment partnerships that cater largely to institutions and wealthy people. Financial-services companies are eager to cater to these sophisticated and fast-moving clients that have exploded in popularity. The two companies say the deal will create the No. 1 administrator of hedge-fund assets, in terms of assets under custody.

Investors Financial, a 17-year-old firm, has $2.2 trillion in assets under custody. The deal, expected to close in the third quarter, would give State Street more than $14 trillion in assets of all kinds under custody, ranking it No. 2. (The No. 1 player emerged last month, when Bank of New York Co. agreed to buy Mellon Financial Corp. in a deal then valued at $16.5 billion.)

"We are very determined to remain independent, because we think that's the best strategy for our shareholders," Jay Hooley, vice chairman of State Street, of Boston, said in an interview. State Street's "plan and our strategy is to be a growth company -- acquiring companies and building business."

In the transaction, Investors Financial shareholders will receive 0.906 share of State Street common stock for each share of Investors Financial common stock, based upon the $71.75 closing price of State Street stock on Feb. 2. That values Investors Financial at $65.01 a share, a 38% premium to Friday's closing price of $46.95.

State Street's stock was off 6.5%, or $4.67, at $67.08 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Investors Financial stock soared, rising $12.85, or 27% to $59.80 as of 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading.

Gerard Cassidy, a banking analyst with RCB Capital Markets in Portland, Maine, said State Street's stock declined sharply because "the deal is expensive for State Street -- they paid Neiman Marcus prices rather than Filene's Basement prices." The company said it had other bidders.

Mills Receives Another Buyout Offer (WP)

By Dana Hedgpeth

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

The nation's largest mall owner and a hedge fund yesterday offered to buy the financially troubled Mills Corp. for $1.6 billion, exceeding the $1.35 billion offered by a Canadian company in January.

The latest offer for Mills of Chevy Chase, which owns about 40 malls nationwide, including Potomac Mills and Arundel Mills, was made by Simon Property Group and the hedge fund Farallon Capital Management. Simon is the country's largest real estate investment trust, by market value, and Farallon is Mills's largest shareholder.

Brookfield Asset Management, a Canadian investment company and owner of the World Financial Center in New York, made the earlier offer, which Mills accepted.

Simon, of Indianapolis, owns 285 properties across the country, including Bowie Town Center and Leesburg Corner Premium Outlet. Farallon of San Francisco manages $26 billion of equity capital.

Simon, which presented its offer in a letter yesterday, would pay $24 per share and assume Mills's debt. Brookfield would pay $21 per share. Mills closed yesterday at $25.87, up $3.72 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Simon said its cash tender offer would allow Mills shareholders to get their cash as much as six months earlier than they would under Brookfield's deal.

DOJ_NMG_0128459

Executives at Mills declined to comment on the offers. In a statement, Mills said that it would "promptly consider the proposal" from Simon but that the "current merger agreement with Brookfield remains in effect."

The offers came as Mills is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission for possible misconduct by management and for accounting errors totaling up to $352 million. Mills is best known for popularizing the notion of shopping mall as entertainment destinations. One of its projects, Madrid Xanadu, featured a bowling alley and indoor ski resort.

But some analysts said the company had trouble keeping up with its ambitious plans. Mills has not released an earnings report since the third quarter of 2005. It plans to restate its financial results from 2001 to 2004 and for the first three quarters of 2005. Its chief executive, Laurence C. Siegel, retired in 2006.

And in January, the company warned that it may be forced to seek bankruptcy protection. It has given up its role in the Xanadu project in New Jersey and sold off other assets.

Analysts said the Simon and Brookfield offers show the eagerness of large companies to pay high prices for commercial real estate.

"It is a little surprising that Simon made an offer for more, especially given the fact that there is no new information to show that Mills is worth $24 a share," said Benjamin Yang, an analyst at Green Street Advisors. "They still have not restated their financials, and coming up with a value for them is exceedingly difficult.

Still, he said "the mall industry has gone through a period of consolidation. Simon has the opportunity to acquire 30-odd properties in one fell swoop."

Paul Morgan, managing director at Friedman, Billings, Ramsey Group, said Simon has an opportunity to "create a synergy in its leasing with tenants."

"Mills has been in turmoil for the last 18 months," he said. "A lot of talent has left Mills. Assets are not being managed as well as they could be by someone like Simon."

$1.56 Billion Offered For Mills Corp. Sale (WT)

By Jen Haberkorn

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

The battle over troubled local mall developer Mills Corp. continued yesterday as the largest shopping mall owner in the country offered to buy the company.

Simon Property Group Inc. and Farallon Capital Management LLC, Mill's largest shareholder, offered $1.56 billion, or $24 per share, to buy Mills, the companies announced yesterday. That figure beats an agreement Mills made last month to be bought by Brookfield Asset Management Inc. for $1.35 billion or $21 per share.

Mills Corp., a Chevy Chase developer, said the agreement with Brookfield is still in effect, but that it will "promptly consider the proposal."

What makes Mills so valuable, despite recent revelations that executives may have mismanaged funds and that it was running out of money, is its 38 shopping centers across the country.

Locally, it owns Lakeforest Mall in Gaithersburg, Potomac Mills and Potomac Town Center in Prince William County, Marley Station in Glen Burnie, Md., and Arundel Mills in Hanover, Md.

Simon's offer is cash, meaning shareholders could receive payment six months before they would under a Brookfield deal, the company said.

Simon Property Group is an Indianapolis real estate investment trust that owns the Fashion Centre at Pentagon City, Bowie Town Center, Leesburg (Va.) Corner Premium Outlets and St. Charles (Md.) Towne Center.

Simon said its experience would make it most qualified to run the Mills properties.

A Brookfield spokeswoman declined to comment on the competing bid.

Wall Street analysts yesterday were hesitant to issue opinions on the proposal because Mills' financial situation is unknown. Amid its financial troubles, Mills still hasn't filed its 2005 financial statement.

"Without current financial statements it is impossible to assess the impact on [Simon's] bottom line from this transaction and the real question is whether it is worth the 'brain damage' to acquire a troubled company and invest the next several years trying to turn it around," Merrill Lynch analyst Steve Sakwa said in a note to investors.

Merrill Lynch is acting as Simon's financial adviser in its proposed acquisition.

Mr. Sakwa pointed out that Mills' assets are a mixed bag, from desirable properties such as shopping centers in Northern New Jersey and Northern California to less desirable centers such as the Mills malls in Cincinnati and Colorado.

Wachovia Capital Markets LLC analyst Jeffrey J. Donnelly said he is skeptical without a financial picture but said Simon is a "logical buyer" for Mills.

DOJ_NMG_0128460

Farallon Capital Management, which owns nearly 11 percent of Mills' shares, had been furiously looking for someone to save the embattled Mills.

The San Francisco hedge fund originally offered $20 per share in a recapitalization plan. Then it submitted a bid with fellow shareholder Gazit-Globe Ltd., an Israeli real estate company, for $22 per share. Now, it is working with Simon.

Mills' stock rose nearly 17 percent to close at $25.87 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Icahn Launches Takeover For Lear (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News

The Washington Post/Bloomberg, February 6, 2007

Carl C. Icahn, the billionaire activist investor, offered to pay $2.31 billion for the 84 percent of auto-parts maker Lear Corp. that he does not already own.

Lear and Icahn's American Real Estate Partners discussed the proposal over the weekend. Lear said in a regulatory filing yesterday that it was trying to reach an agreement. The cash offer of $36 a share from Icahn, the company's biggest shareholder, was criticized by its third-largest investor as too low.

Richard Pzena, whose New York investment group Pzena Investment Management owned 7.48 million, or 11 percent, of Lear's shares in November, sent a letter to the non-management directors expressing "alarm" about the offer. "To claim today that $36 is a fair price is quite disingenuous," Pzena said in the letter. "It is our fear that the company's management may have lost sight of the long-term value inherent in the company and that their personal interest in the transaction may create an inherent conflict."

Pzena said that his staff and Icahn's staff met in November to talk about Icahn's increased stake in Lear and that analysts from both groups agreed on a valuation of $60 a share.

"Icahn knows $36 is a steal," Pzena said in an interview. He said he would prefer that the company not be sold now, when its shares are undervalued.

Icahn did not respond to calls for comment.

The offer steps up the transformation of Lear as private-equity firms and investors bet that they can buy troubled operations cheaply, improve operations and boost profit. Such suppliers as Lear, of Southfield, Mich., have been hurt by production cuts by U.S. automakers General Motors and Ford.

Icahn's offer is 3.8 percent higher than the $34.67 closing price on Feb. 2. The stock closed yesterday at $38.64, up $3.97. The bid is for about 64.3 million shares of Lear. Icahn owns 12 million.

EU Microsoft Judge: Ruling By September (AP)

AP, February 6, 2007

The judge due to rule on Microsoft Corp.'s appeal against the European Commission's antitrust order said Monday he hoped to publish his decision before he leaves office in September.

Bo Vesterdorf, the president of the Court of First Instance, refused to give a precise deadline for his ruling.

"Obviously we would do our very best to get the case out as soon as at all possible," he told reporters at an Informa legal conference in Brussels. "It's a very big case."

Microsoft is challenging the European Union's 2004 antitrust order, which found the software maker broke competition law and fined it a record 497 million euros ($613 million).

To remedy market harms, the EU ordered the company to offer a version of its Windows computer operating system without Microsoft's media player software. The EU also ordered Microsoft to share communications code and information with rivals to help them develop server software that worked smoothly with the ubiquitous Windows platform.

In July, EU regulators fined Microsoft another 280.5 million euros ($357 million) for failing to supply the "complete and accurate" interoperability required.

Both Microsoft and the Commission can appeal the ruling to one more authority, the European Court of Justice, which is the EU's highest court.

Pelosi, Dingell Reach Deal (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, February 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128461

Ending a three-week long turf war, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) have reached an agreement on the parameters of the select committee on global warming.

In a new letter to Pelosi, Dingell wrote that the select committee has no legislative authority and that the panel will expire on Oct. 30, 2008. Dingell also wrote that he has "assurances" from Pelosi that his committee will get first dibs to call witnesses where there could be potential conflict and that Pelosi will be consulted "before the exercise of any compulsory powers by the select committee to ensure the appropriate coordination of efforts."

The letter, which was also signed by Energy and Commerce Committee member Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), does not state whether the panel will have subpoena power. The chairman and Speaker discussed the issue during the Democratic issues conference in Williamsburg, Va., said Democratic aides.

The negotiations between Pelosi and Dingell to establish the panel have overshadowed difficulties Democrats face drafting a comprehensive energy bill. While they have overcome one turf battle, they probably will face many more regional and ideological disputes.

"The Democratic Caucus has had a tough time [on energy policy] when you get down in the details," said Dave Hamilton, the Sierra Club's director of global warming and energy policy.

Signaling that global warming has reached the top of the new policy agenda, former vice president and Oscar nominee Al Gore will testify next month before the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

"I don't know if the science is out there any more than it was, but the politics [have changed because] the majority has changed," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), who is working with Rep. Eliot Engel (D-N.Y.) to pass a bill to encourage consumers to buy fuel-efficient cars.

Climate change has also consumed hours of lawmakers' and aides' time. Energy and Commerce staffers have been told to block two hours on Fridays for briefings with the Congressional Research Service.

Dingell invited lawmakers to hear from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change on Friday. The group issued a report last week that humans are causing the earth to warm at a dangerous rate.

Former Rep. Philip Sharp (D-Ind.), now president of Resources for the Future, said the arrival of global warming at the top of the policy agenda is due to several causes, including high gas prices and public recognition that gasoline demand distorts U.S. foreign policy.

"The basic price of oil and natural gas certainly gets people's attention in marketplace and politics," he said. "That is undoubtedly seared in people's minds in the last two years."

Despite the political consensus that a new energy policy could make for good politics, Pelosi's goal of drafting an energy bill by July 4 remains in doubt.

But the agreement between Pelosi and Dingell means that House Democrats will avoid a contentious vote on the House floor. They could avoid a vote altogether if the Speaker creates the committee in what is known as the committee funding resolution, legislation that sets biennial budgets for committees. The bill is usually voted on in late March in the first year of a Congress.

Regional disputes between lawmakers from coal-producing states and those who represent districts on the east and west coasts and in the upper Midwest could be bigger hurdles. Those lawmakers and state governments, such as New York and California, have proposed much more aggressive environmental policies to reduce carbon dioxide emissions than their southern and western counterparts, said Democratic aides and energy policy lobbyists.

Dingell, an ally of the auto industry, is at odds with many of his congressional colleagues and President Bush, who support increasing corporate average fuel economy standards for cars and trucks.

Lawmakers and staffers have discussed a "grand bargain" on energy policy in past years, which would include drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR) and more investment in alternative fuels. Now, with Democrats in control of both chambers, Democratic aides said legislation allowing ANWR drilling is not going to happen.

Still, the prospect of passing legislation to address climate change has created a temporary spirit of bipartisanship. President Bush and congressional Democrats have said they want to cooperate and compromise on policies to reduce U.S. dependence on foreign oil or cut carbon dioxide emissions.

Bush acknowledged climate change for the first time in his State of the Union address and he told House Democrats on Saturday at their issues conference that climate change was one area where they could cooperate.

The partnership between Engel and Kingston is the most prominent example of bipartisanship. Their bill has 89 cosponsors.

At the State of the Union address and at the Democrats' conference in Williamsburg, Va., Engel asked Bush to support his bill.

"I hope you'll be bold," Engel told him at last month's speech, "We need your help."

DOJ_NMG_0128462

Engel said he also spoke to Pelosi and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) about his measure.

China And UN Plan Carbon Trading Exchange (FT)

By Mure Dickie And Fiona Harvey

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

China and the United Nations are working to set up a carbon trading exchange in Beijing – a move that could establish the Chinese capital as an important centre for the multibillion-dollar global trade in carbon credits, according to the UN's top official in China.

If successful, the exchange – which would be the first in the developing world – would compete with private sector carbon exchanges established in Europe and the US, and would help to open up further the lucrative Chinese market in carbon credits.

Carbon credits are issued by the UN under a provision of the Kyoto protocol known as the clean development mechanism, by which developed countries invest in projects, such as wind farms or hydroelectric projects, that reduce greenhouse gas emissions in poor countries. The credits can fetch $15-$18 on the international market.

About $3bn in carbon credits from developing countries were traded in the first nine months of last year, according to the World Bank. The UN's climate change secretariat said China was expected to account for 41 per cent of all carbon credits issued by the UN by 2012.

Although there are several exchanges dealing in carbon in Europe, and one in Chicago in the US, the market is fragmented, with many trades carried on outside exchanges through brokers or between companies.

The Beijing exchange is to be set up as part of a carbon finance initiative agreed by the United Nations Development Programme with the Chinese Ministry of Science and Technology and the powerful National Development and Reform Commission, said Khalid Malik, the UN resident co-ordinator in China.

"I hope we can launch it this year – the sooner the better," he said. Mr Malik said he hoped the exchange would also trade in special carbon credits that would be tied to the UN's eight "millennium development goals", which range from halving extreme poverty to universal primary education by 2015. While mixing the climate change goals with efforts to fight poverty, Aids and the loss of biodiversity will make the certification of the credits much more complicated, they may appeal to companies keen to polish their reputation for social responsibility.

However, UN officials said it could be difficult to design such credits before 2012, when the present provisions of the Kyoto protocol expire, although they could form part of an expanded carbon trading system if a successor to the treaty is agreed.

The UNDP said most existing emission reduction projects in China offered "little or no impact on sustainable development".

"Companies want very green credits," said Kishan Khoday, UNDP Energy and Environment team leader.

Many of the credits issued in China so far have come from the installation of equipment to curb emissions of HFC-23, a much more potent greenhouse gas than carbon dioxide, generating large profits for a small outlay.

Legal Hot Air (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

The U.N.'s latest global warming report is being spun as a wake-up call. But whether or not you agree on the need for urgent action, it ought to be obvious that the absolute last branch of government that should set climate policy is the courts. As usual, California Attorney General Jerry Brown has his own ideas.

At issue is a federal lawsuit filed last September by Mr. Brown's predecessor, Bill Lockyer, asking for billions of dollars worth of damages to be levied against six automakers -- General Motors, Toyota, Ford, Honda, Nissan and Chrysler -- because their products allegedly create a common-law "nuisance" by contributing to global warming.

At the time most observers, Mr. Brown included, appeared to regard the move as an election-year stunt. But now that he's in office, Mr. Brown has decided to pursue the case, which he says rests on "sound legal doctrine." Because "no federal statute speaks directly to the particular problem of global warming," says California's recent response to the carmakers' motion for dismissal, ". . . federal common law applies."

Uh-huh. We don't want to give Governor Brown any ideas, but if making a legal product that might contribute to global warming is an actionable offense, why stop with the automakers? How about the publisher of the Los Angeles Times, which deprives the world of a "carbon sink" (aka a tree) to create its daily product? Or how about cattle ranchers, whose flatulent herds emit massive amounts of methane before they become steaks on your dinner table? Methane is a far more potent greenhouse gas than CO2.

In short, there's scarcely any economic activity imaginable that doesn't somehow affect the balance of greenhouse gases, which is why a "nuisance" complaint against any single industry doesn't make sense. It's also why the judiciary has so far wisely refused to get drawn into this kind of blame game. A New York federal district court has already rejected an attempt by Mr.

Lockyer and others to hold the utility industry responsible for global warming, saying it would be wrong "to impose by judicial fiat" CO2 regulations that "Congress and the Executive" have considered and declined to impose.

In any case, as global warming alarmists never tire of reminding us, any serious attempt to control greenhouse gas levels would have to be an international one. That means the primary Constitutional responsibility for the issue lies with the President, who negotiates treaties. Congress, which regulates automobile mileage and other tailpipe emissions, is also free to pass unilateral CO2 caps if it wishes. That it has so far decided not to do so may be a source of angst to some people. But it's hardly an excuse for an end-run by an ambitious state attorney general around the country's system of environmental regulation.

Given the existence of the Clean Air Act and many other environmental rules, it's preposterous for California to invoke the common law as if Congress had never considered the issue. Or as the Environmental Protection Agency has written by way of explaining why we'd need a national approach to the alleged problem: "[I]t is hard to imagine any issue in the environmental arena having greater 'economic and political significance' than regulation of activities that might lead to global climate change."

If environmentalists want the U.S. political system to do something about CO2 emissions, a good place to start would be convincing a majority of Americans that they are serious people with serious concerns. California's attempt to single out automakers -- which gives a whole new meaning to the term "junk lawsuit" -- is not helping their case.

Global Warming's Simple Remedy (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

Washington Post, February 6, 2007

"Worse than we thought." The headline in the British Guardian newspaper on Saturday was almost gloating about the bad news. The tone of the article that followed was no different: In Paris, a U.N.-sponsored panel, consisting of hundreds of scientists from all over the world, had just declared that average global temperatures will probably rise 4 degrees Celsius over the next century. If so, catastrophic flooding, famine and water shortages may follow, along with the extinction of up to half of existing animal species. Malaria and other tropical diseases may spread. Among the coastal cities threatened by the higher ocean levels caused by melting ice caps, the paper noted -- not without a degree of satisfaction -- are London, New York, Tokyo and Hong Kong.

Since the Guardian was not the only European paper to feature this story -- Germany's Der Spiegel cautioned " A Tropical Germany by 2100?" -- perhaps it's not surprising that the U.N. report inspired politicians of various hues, across Europe and the world, to seek controls on carbon emissions and the fossil fuels that create them. The British environment minister called for an "international political commitment to take action." The head of the German environment agency said, "We must all change our environmental behavior considerably." So much was said about the need for "action" and "change," in fact, that it's a wonder the resultant hot air didn't make temperatures rise higher.

But don't get me wrong: I was convinced by the reigning consensus on global warming a long time ago, have accepted that human use of fossil fuels has caused it and am very glad so many European politicians take the scientists' words seriously. The question now is whether these same Europeans will start taking the solutions seriously. If so, they must begin by abandoning the bankrupt Kyoto treaty on climate change and encouraging the United States to do so, too.

The much-vaunted treaty creates a complicated and unenforceable system of international targets for carbon emissions reduction, based on measurements taken in 1990. Critics of the American president have condemned him for failing to sign it, conveniently forgetting that the Senate rejected it 95 to 0 in 1997, a margin that reflects broad bipartisan opposition. At the same time, few of the Asian and European signatories are actually on track to meet their goals; those that will meet the targets, such as Britain, can do so because their economies rely less on industry than they once did. Canada and Japan aren't even close to compliance; China and India, whose emissions rates are growing most rapidly, are exempt altogether as "developing" countries -- which, given their economic strength, is absurd.

None of which is to say that reduction of carbon emissions is impossible. But the limiting of fossil fuels cannot be carried out with an unenforceable international regime, using complicated regulations that the United Nations does not have the staff or the mandate to supervise, with the help of a treaty that effectively penalizes those who bother to abide by it. I no longer believe that a complicated carbon trading regime -- in which industries trade emissions "credits" -- would work within the United States either: So much is at stake for so many industries that the legislative process to create it would be easily distorted by their various lobbies.

Any lasting solutions will have to be extremely simple, and -- because of the cost implicit in reducing the use and emissions of fossil fuels -- will also have to benefit those countries that impose them in other ways. Fortunately, there is such a solution, one that is grippingly unoriginal, requires no special knowledge of economics and is easy for any country to implement. It's called a carbon tax, and it should be applied across the board to every industry that uses fossil fuels, every home or building with a heating system, every motorist, and every public transportation system. Immediately, it would produce a wealth of innovations to save fuel, as well as new incentives to conserve. More to the point, it would produce a big chunk of money that could be used for other things. Anyone for balancing the budget? Fixing Social Security for future generations? As a foreign policy side benefit, users of the tax would suddenly find themselves less dependent on Persian Gulf oil or Russian natural gas, too.

Most of all, though, the successful use of carbon taxes does not require "American leadership," or a U.N. committee, or a complicated international effort of any kind. It can be done country by country: If the British environment minister or the German chancellor wants to go ahead with it tomorrow, nothing is preventing them. If a future American president wants to rally the nation around a patriotic and noble cause, then he or she has the perfect opportunity. If the Chinese see that such a tax has produced unexpected benefits in America and Europe, they'll follow. And when that happens, we'll know that the apocalyptic climate change rhetoric has finally been taken seriously.

U.S. Officials Mull Ethanol Reserve Amid Bush Plans To Increase SPR (WSJ)

By Maya Jackson Randall And Beth Heinsohn

Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As the U.S. Energy Department looks to expand the nation's emergency oil stockpile, officials are also considering whether it would be beneficial to create an ethanol reserve.

"Perhaps we should be thinking about having an ethanol reserve," Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman told reporters Monday during a press briefing to discuss DOE's fiscal year 2008 budget proposal. "There are a number things we are looking at."

Mr. Bodman said there are several ideas being discussed as the Bush administration moves to expand the strategic petroleum reserve. The plan is to double the size of the oil stockpile, increasing it from its current capacity of 727 million barrels to 1.5 billion barrels in the next two decades.

Administration officials are also considering whether there should be storage sites built in areas outside of the Gulf Coast, Mr. Bodman said. For the first time, reserve sites could be built west of the Rockies or on the West or East coasts, a DOE official said last week.

Aside from considering new locations for SPR sites, another question on the table is "should we have an expansion in the type of fuel," Mr. Bodman said, noting that the idea might have merit given the administration's newly announced goal of reducing gasoline use 20% in the next 10 years. To meet that goal, the administration is proposing to increase use of ethanol and other alternative fuels.

Still, a congressional and regulatory affairs director at the Renewable Fuels Association, a trade association for the U.S. ethanol industry, said she doesn't see a need for an ethanol reserve anytime soon. "I can't image them doing that in the near-term," said Samantha Slater, noting that an ethanol reserve is certainly not on the industry's agenda. "We're using every drop."

"Having a reserve would generally imply we have some we could put in reserve," she said, adding that that isn't the case. "At this stage of the game, that's probably not something that would be particularly effective."

At the same time, experts have noted infrastructural challenges inherent in the creation of an ethanol stockpile, noting in particular storage and transportation capacity. Ethanol has a corrosive effect on pipelines so it must be shipped by rail, truck or ship to fuel terminals where it is blended with gasoline before going to service stations.

Just last spring, concerns about marketers' ability to move and store adequate amounts of ethanol for blending with gasoline accompanied a large-scale phase-in of the fuel additive and spurred higher prices for months.

The addition of a reserve might require the construction of new storage tanks, said Rick Kment, an ethanol analyst with Omaha-based DTN, a commodities news service. Storage tanks for other fuels can be used to hold ethanol but whether there are enough existing tanks in a given location is another issue, he said.

The Price Of Corn (NYT)

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

The current price of corn is $3.23 a bushel, more than half again what it was a year ago, and beginning to bring to mind the record $5.545 a bushel set in July 1996.

There are many reasons for this price spurt. The ethanol boom has created a sharp new demand for corn. The Department of Agriculture revised its estimate of the 2006 corn harvest downward by some 200 million bushels because of weather and other factors. There is also a smaller corn reserve on hand than usual — the smallest in a decade — which parallels shortages around the world.

Add to this the growing weight of commodities funds investing in agricultural markets, and you have daydreams — or nightmares — of that $5 mark.

Yet all this has taken place against the backdrop of three record harvests in a row, a sure sign of how strong the ethanol appetite for corn production is turning out to be. It's tempting to assume that the effect of sharply higher prices is confined primarily to the agricultural sector. But where corn is concerned, we are all part of the agricultural sector. The historical cheapness of corn has driven it into nearly every aspect of our economy, in the form, most familiarly, of corn syrup. The low price of corn over the past half-century lies at the very foundation of America's historically (and unrealistically) low food prices.

Gratifying our two major appetites — cheap food and cheap gas — used to seem easy because both corn and oil were abundant. Cheap oil helped keep corn prices low because it cost farmers less to run their tractors and combines.

But we are entering a new dynamic now. While there has been talk recently about refining ethanol from sources other than corn, that could take a while. So at the moment what we are trying to do is gratify those appetites from the same resource: agricultural land. No matter how high prices go, what will need to change isn't the amount of corn acreage available or even the size of the enormous harvests we are already getting. What will need to change is the size of our appetites.

Asarco asks judge to void transfer of two copper mines in Peru

WASHINGTON - One-time mining giant Asarco, charging that its Mexican owner stole its most valuable asset and left it to face $7 billion worth of environmental and asbestos-related claims, is asking a federal bankruptcy judge to void the transfer of two Peruvian copper mines to Grupo Mexico, S.A. de C.V.

The stakes are high for U.S. taxpayers, who would be stuck with the tab for cleaning up nearly 100 contaminated sites nationwide where Asarco once operated. If the court agrees that the mines were "fraudulently transferred," Asarco could recover several billion dollars, by some estimates.

In a 23-page complaint filed late Friday in a Texas bankruptcy court, Asarco alleged that Grupo Mexico plotted to gain control of Asarco's 54.2 percent interest in the Peruvian mines. The complaint, which one lawyer in the case said reads like a "legal potboiler," charges that Grupo Mexico took control of the mines with the "actual intent to hinder, delay and or defraud" Asarco's creditors.

"Grupo Mexico's goal was to take Asarco's most valuable asset, the majority ownership of SPCC (the Peruvian mines), and remove it from the reach of creditors," the complaint said.

Lawyers and officials of Grupo Mexico and the subsidiary named in the complaint, Americas Mining Corp., didn't return phone calls seeking comment.

Grupo Mexico is owned by one of Mexico's richest families, the Larreas. The complaint alleges that another of Mexico's super rich, Carlos Slim, who owns and controls Inbursa, a Mexican bank, may have benefited from the deal. The complaint describes Slim as a "close associate" of the Larrea family.

Asarco is assembling a reorganization plan and trying to emerge from bankruptcy. It is still wholly owned by a Grupo Mexico subsidiary, but under federal bankruptcy laws it's now responsible to its creditors rather than to its stockholders.

Asarco, a century-old mining, smelting and refining company that once was listed on the Fortune 500, filed for bankruptcy protection in 2005. It faces about $6 billion in environmental claims filed by the federal government and more than a dozen states. It also faces 95,000 asbestos-related claims that could be worth between $500 million and $1 billion.

The federal Environmental Protection Agency filed a $1.3 billion claim for cleanup of Superfund sites across the country. The federal departments of Agriculture and Interior, along with local governments, several Indian tribes and private parties, have also filed environmental claims.

Asarco has talked with state and federal lawyers about the possibility of settling the environmental claims, though there are no offers in the table.

Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Justice Department, which is representing the EPA, declined comment.

Asarco officials had little to say.

"The complaint speaks for itself," said Joseph Lapinsky, president and chief executive of the Tucson, Ariz.-based company.

Lapinsky said it would be up to the bankruptcy court judge to decide how much the Peruvian mines are worth, if the court ultimately rules that they were illegally taken from Asarco. And even though Grupo Mexico is a foreign company, Lapinsky said it has U.S.-based subsidiaries that could make it possible to recover any judgment without having to seek redress in Mexican courts.

Asarco's independent directors had been looking at filing such a complaint for months at the urging of some of the company's creditors, Lapinsky said.

The complaint details Grupo Mexico's actions since it bought Asarco in 1999:

DOJ_NMG_0128466

After the takeover, top Grupo Mexico officials took over Asarco's board of directors and filled many of the company's executive positions. "Grupo Mexico structured the leveraged buyout so that Asarco assumed huge amounts of debt," the complaint said. "Asarco was left inadequately capitalized to conduct its business."

At the direction of its Grupo Mexico-dominated board, the complaint says, Asarco began selling its subsidiaries, cashing in insurance policies that had been purchased to cover environmental and asbestos claims and stripping its remaining mines of high-quality ore. The revenue was used to cover day-to-day expenses as Asarco slipped toward insolvency. Grupo Mexico also forced Asarco to pay off bonds that had been bought at deep discounts by Slim and other "friends" of Grupo Mexico executives, the complaint charges.

Meanwhile, Grupo Mexico was angling to seize control of the Peruvian copper mines.

After one independent company valued the two mines at nearly $1 billion, Grupo Mexico hired another company, which placed their value at $720 million. At one point, according to the complaint, Grupo Mexico offered Asarco $450 million, but only $100 million of it was in cash and the rest was in debt forgiveness.

The mines eventually were sold to a Grupo Mexico subsidiary for $765 million without soliciting any competitive bids. The complaint charges that Asarco received "not a nickel" in cash from the sale to cover its operating expenses.

As soon as the sale was complete, the Grupo Mexico executives on Asarco's board resigned.

The complaint alleges that even after the sale, Grupo Mexico tried to keep Asarco out of bankruptcy until the statute of limitations on a fraudulent conveyance claim had passed.

Connellsville Investor Faces Drug Charges (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, February 6, 2007

A New Jersey man who bought the 106-year-old Aaron's building in Connellsville was arrested Jan. 25 as the alleged ringleader of a multimillion-dollar narcotics network.

Mohamed Hassanain, of 30 Edgar Road, West Orange, used the alias Mohamed Aly to buy the structure. He allegedly ran the drug ring from his home as well as his business, Lyons Avenue Auto Sales in Newark, said state police in New Jersey.

Authorities seized 14 properties Hassanain owns in the Newark area as alleged proceeds of criminal activity. The Connellsville building was not part of the seizure, according to court records in New Jersey.

"This operation brings to a grinding halt a dangerous, multimillion-dollar criminal enterprise," New Jersey Attorney General Stuart Rabner said. "We have arrested the alleged leader of this narcotics ring as well as those who supplied him with what had been an endless supply of illegal prescription drugs."

Hassanain, 40, is charged with leading an organized criminal enterprise, racketeering, money laundering, forgery and distribution of controlled substances.

Hassanain bought the Aaron's building in August for $20,000 on the Internet auction site eBay. The purchase was based on snapshots and a written description, but Hassanain visited the city in December for a walk-through and met with public officials who have made the historic building's redevelopment a priority.

"This sure is a blow," Mayor Judy Reed said. "We talked, and he said he would fix the building. I tried to impress upon him the responsibility of owning this building, which is in deplorable condition, and he started work immediately."

Hassanain told officials he was "thrilled" with the building, and talked about his intention to create office and retail space on the first floor and loft apartments on the upper floors.

He planned to have the building ready for rental later this year.

Councilman Terry Bodes, who led the charge to refurbish the Aaron's building, said Hassanain "seemed too good to be true. It's just frustrating, disappointing. It's a disappointment to the whole city."

A downtown row-style structure, the 6,000-square-foot building at North Pittsburgh and East Apple streets is assessed at $73,333. It is eligible for the National Register of Historic Places.

A citation the city filed Sept. 5 against the seller, D&F Services Inc., of Leisenring, states the structure "is old, dilapidated, so out of repair as to be dangerous, unsafe, unsanitary, unreasonable to repair."

Former owner Richard DiCenzo, of Uniontown, was fined $8,053 in September 2005 for allegedly letting the structure become a public nuisance. Pieces of the building's facade, weighing as much as 10 pounds, had fallen onto the street, according to city health code officer Rita Bornstein.

But a Fayette County judge dropped those charges because the citation was "insufficient."

DOJ_NMG_0128467

DiCenzo bought the Aaron's building in 1978, just after the furniture store went out of business. It has been vacant since.

The building sold in November 2005 for $5,000 to Divito B. Corteal and Frank W. Corteal. The deed was transferred in April to D&F Services.

D&F Services was listed as owing more than $2,000 in taxes on the property upon sale to Hassanain, according to the Fayette County Tax Claim Bureau.

Hassanain paid the taxes in August, according to New Jersey attorney Matthew E. Przywozny, who executed the deed transfer on Hassanain's behalf.

The city did not file a citation against Hassanain because he promptly began work to meet code in January.

"If he's in a position where he can't continue the project, we need to find out," Reed said. "He made attempts to correct the problems, but unfortunately the work has stopped."

A telephone message left with Przywozny was not returned Monday.

The charges against Hassanain stem from a six-month investigation led by New Jersey State Police and the Attorney General's Division of Criminal Justice, with assistance from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

The investigation, dubbed "Operation Pandora," determined the network allegedly sold 20,000 to 30,000 OxyContin and Percocet pills per week, most going to a distribution ring based in Bronx, N.Y., according to state police Col. Rick Fuentes.

"Like the mythical Pandora's box, once this investigation was opened, a plethora of criminal acts, conspiracies and perpetrators kept pouring out," Fuentes said.

Approximately 22,000 prescription pills, seven guns and hundreds of thousands of dollars were seized during the execution of search warrants at 10 locations.

Also arrested was Dr. Mario Comesanas, 51, of Livingston, N.J., who allegedly went to Hassanain's home to write thousands of fraudulent painkiller prescriptions, and pharmacist Ahmed F. "Felix" Aly, 32, of Union, N.J., Hassanain's cousin, who is charged with knowingly filling the forged prescriptions.

Two other alleged members of the enterprise were previously arrested in New York, and warrants are outstanding for more than a dozen others.

At Hassanain's auto shop, police seized a Tech 9 machine gun and five pistols, including several .357 Magnum revolvers. Hassanain was carrying $10,000 in his sleeve when he was arrested, police reported.

Hassanain is incarcerated on $1.5 million bond.

S.J. Airport Screeners Nab Alleged Meth Smuggler (AP)

AP, February 6, 2007

(AP) SAN JOSE An East Palo Alto man allegedly tried to smuggle three pounds of methamphetamine in his cargo pants while trying to board a Hawaiian Airlines flight, according to court records.

Michael James Cade, 26, was charged Friday in U.S. District Court in San Jose with possession with intent to distribute at least 50 grams of methamphetamine.

About 8:30 a.m. Thursday, Cade was at San Jose International Airport preparing to board a Hawaiian Airlines flight to Honolulu when he was chosen for secondary screening at a security checkpoint, authorities said.

While patting him down, a Transportation Security Administration agent "felt a large bulk item in the front right pocket of Cade's cargo pants," Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent Anthony Guzman wrote in a charging document.

Cade was asked to remove the item, but he insisted it was only money, Guzman wrote. Agents took Cade to a private screening area where they again asked him to remove the item.

Cade removed "one bag of crystal-like substance," following by four more bags, all of which were clear, quart-sized and sealed with black electrical tape, the affidavit said.

Security officials notified a police officer, who learned that Cade had an outstanding felony warrant from Modesto for narcotics and that he could be searched because he was on probation, the affidavit said. A search found a sixth bag in Cade's lower right pants pocket and a pipe in his left front pocket, it said.

A test concluded that the crystal-like substance was methamphetamine, Guzman wrote.

Cade has previous convictions for felony theft, grand theft and narcotics possession, the affidavit said.

E. Palo Alto Man Tried To Smuggle Meth Onto Airplane, Court Records Say (SFC)

SAN JOSE -- A man is facing federal charges for trying to smuggle six bags containing 3 pounds of methamphetamine in his cargo pants while trying to board a Hawaiian Airlines flight in San Jose, court records released today show.

Michael James Cade, 26, of East Palo Alto was charged Friday in U.S. District Court in San Jose with possession with intent to distribute at least 50 grams of methamphetamine.

About 8:30 a.m. Thursday, Cade was at San Jose International Airport preparing to board a Hawaiian Airlines flight to Honolulu when he was chosen for secondary screening at a security checkpoint, authorities said.

While patting Cade down, a Transportation Security Administration agent "felt a large bulk item in the front right pocket of Cade's cargo pants," Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent Anthony Guzman wrote in an affidavit.

Cade was asked to remove the item but insisted it was only money, Guzman wrote. Agents took Cade to a private screening area where they again asked him to take out whatever it was in his pants, authorities said.

Cade removed "one bag of crystal-like substance," the affidavit said. It was followed by four more bags, all of which were clear, quart-sized and sealed with black electrical tape, authorities said.

Security officials notified an on-duty San Jose police officer, who learned that Cade had an outstanding felony warrant from Modesto for narcotics and that he could be searched because he was on probation, the affidavit said.

Police searched Cade and found a sixth bag in a lower right pants pocket, authorities said. Cade then told officers that he had a pipe in his left front pocket, the affidavit said.

A test of the crystal-like substance concluded that it was methamphetamine, Guzman wrote.

Authorities said they believe Cade was smuggling the drugs and, since he had only $10 with him, had hoped to be paid for the illicit cargo in his pants, authorities said. Cade has previous convictions for felony theft, grand theft and narcotics possession, the affidavit said.

He appeared Friday before U.S. Magistrate Patricia Trumbull in San Jose and will return to court Wednesday for a detention hearing.

Lawmen: Drug Lord Marked Witness For Death (NSL)

By Jeff Whelan, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, February 6, 2007

As sentencing nears for Newark kingpin, details of plot emerge

Even in captivity, Hakeem Curry maintained the ruthlessness that made him Newark's biggest drug kingpin in recent years, prosecutors say.

During his trial last year, Curry watched as one of his childhood friends and trusted lieutenants, Lachoy "Pooh" Walker, testified against him in federal court. The testimony had a devastating effect on his case.

On the second day of Walker's six days on the stand, a sheriff's officer overheard an alarming conversation as he transported Curry from jail to the courthouse, according to prosecutors. Curry's co-defendant told the gang leader they had a hitman in place to kill Walker, the prosecution's star witness.

That bold plot, never realized, emerged publicly for the first time in court papers prosecutors recently filed related to Curry's sentencing tomorrow. Security at the trial was unusually high, but no specific threat had been previously disclosed.

Curry, convicted by a jury last July of conspiracy, money laundering and drug trafficking, could face 30 years to life in prison under federal sentencing guidelines.

"This is a ruthless gang," Assistant U.S. Attorney John Gay said last week during a hearing in which Curry's co-defendant and cousin, Rakim Baskerville, was sentenced to life in prison. The prosecutor said members of the gang "think nothing of gunning down" witnesses.

Curry's conviction was one of the most significant for federal law enforcement officials since they began investigating and prosecuting drug gang members as part of ongoing conspiracies. During an investigation that spanned more than a year, Drug Enforcement Administration agents built the case by secretly taping tens of thousands of phone calls of Curry and his associates.

Prosecutors said Curry's criminal organization pumped tens of millions of dollars of cocaine and heroin onto the streets in Essex and Union counties for more than a decade and arranged for the murders of a rival and another government witness slated to testify against one of Curry's allies. At one point, 85 percent of the heroin sold in Newark came from Curry's crew, investigators said.

While the threat against Walker's life in the middle of the trial was particularly daring, it wasn't the first time his life was in jeopardy, prosecutors said. After he was arrested in March 2004, Curry immediately suspected Walker set him up. A hitman later testified at trial that Curry had attempted to hire him to kill Walker for $15,000.

Walker, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute drugs, is awaiting sentencing. He plans to enter a witness protection program.

In a related case, another of Curry's cousins, William Baskerville, goes on trial in April and could face the death penalty on federal charges that he plotted the murder of a secret FBI informant. Though Curry was not charged in that crime, prosecutors have said he tipped Baskerville off to the informant's identity.

During his own trial, Curry and his co-defendant were jailed without bail and wore leg shackles. Spectators had to pass through a checkpoint outside U.S. District Judge Faith Hochberg's courtroom, and juror names were sealed from the public.

Defense attorneys, in court papers filed last year, complained Curry wasn't even allowed to call his lawyers from jail, accusing the government of "cruel and unusual punishment far beyond the strictures of normal incarceration."

Last week, they submitted a sentencing memorandum to Hochberg seeking a sentence below federal guidelines. One circumstance they asked her to consider is that Curry has spent nearly three years in prison already, much of it in "virtual solitary confinement," with no access to family and friends.

"During this time, he has suffered through trying to arrange the care for his 10-year-old son whose mother had temporarily disappeared," wrote James Plaisted, Curry's attorney.

But Gay, the prosecutor, wrote in court papers the enhanced security put in place by U.S marshals was necessary because of Curry's "own actions of attempting to kill witnesses at trial."

Last week, Hochberg sentenced Rakim Baskerville to life in prison after he was convicted of conspiracy. The stepped-up security measures remained in place as about a dozen friends and family arrived on hand to support Baskerville, who sported a thick beard and a green prison jumpsuit.

"How y'all doin? You all right?" Baskerville asked his supporters. "Yeah, I'm all right."

In seeking a sentence lighter than the minimum 30 years recommended under federal sentencing guidelines, Baskerville's attorney, Troy Archie, said his client was a "mule" for Curry's organization "at best."

But Gay disputed that, saying the evidence at trial showed Baskerville was a trusted, high-ranking member of the organization. Gay's court filing urging a life sentence revealed the plot to kill Walker in mid-trial.

Hochberg said she found that threat "believable." She also said the accusation was corroborated by "sufficient other evidence," though she did not elaborate.

"The security precautions in this case were done for good reasons," she said, adding, "I do find the security threat very real in this case."

While she didn't use the incident in calculating Baskerville's sentence for technical reasons, she condemned the defendant's "utter disrespect" for witnesses.

"You've devoted your life to crime and now your crime is going to control your life," she said. There is no parole in the federal system.

Men Plead Not Guilty To Federal Drug Charges (SHJ)

Spartanburg (SC) Herald Journal, February 6, 2007

A federal drug conspiracy case involving hundreds of pounds of marijuana and more than 10 pounds of cocaine is headed to court this week for two men who have pleaded not guilty.

Two women and 13 men in the Upstate have already pleaded guilty to charges including weapons violations and conspiracy to distribute cocaine, crack cocaine and marijuana, but none have been sentenced.

On Monday in Spartanburg, U.S. District Judge Henry Floyd refused to suppress evidence gathered using a search warrant at the home of one of the men who will stand trial, Alviero Mesa-Lopez of Greer.

While executing the search warrant at Mesa-Lopez's residence at 849 Harvey Road, authorities found 1,400 pounds of marijuana, several ounces of crystal methamphetamine, one kilogram of cocaine, $20,000 cash, magazines loaded with ammunition, an Uzi machine pistol and four other weapons.

Jury selection in the joint trial of Mesa-Lopez and Roland Fuller of Greenville will begin today. Testimony starts Wednesday and is expected to last two or three days.

Suppression motion

Floyd's ruling Monday allows federal prosecutors to present a large amount of evidence against Mesa-Lopez.

During the August 2006 raid on the Harvey Road residence, DEA agents found the drugs and saw Mesa-Lopez crawling under a bed where the firearms were stored, agents said.

Mesa-Lopez's attorney, Janis Hall, claimed the search warrant was unconstitutional. A magistrate never should have signed the warrant, she argued, because no specific facts indicated drug activity at the house and that information investigators did have was almost a month old.

"This is a case where there was no contact with Harvey Road for 29 days," Hall said.

DOJ_NMG_0128470

The judge sided with Assistant U.S. Attorney Leesa Washington, who countered that Mesa-Lopez' roommate met with other conspirators, told police during a traffic stop that he lived at the residence and drove a vehicle owned by Mesa-Lopez.

"It does provide a nexus between the drug activity and the residence," she said.

Washington said the case clearly involved a "large-scale cocaine distribution ring" on top of the marijuana charges.

Arellano's Lawyers May Put Blame On Brother (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 6, 2007

Defense lawyers for accused Tijuana drug cartel kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Félix hinted at a defense in court yesterday: His brother Benjamín actually was running the drug organization from a Mexican prison.

The lawyers mentioned the theory while asking federal prosecutors to give them any documents that might help prove that in preparation for a trial in less than a year.

Javier Arellano took over as head of the murderous drug-running ring in 2002 after Benjamín was jailed and another brother, Ramón, was killed, prosecutors said in court papers filed last week.

Defense lawyers said they hope to prove that's not the case as they defend Javier from charges that could lead to the death penalty.

Prosecutors said they would turn over all their evidence as required by law.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is expected to decide whether prosecutors will seek the death penalty. U.S. District Judge Larry Alan Burns set an Oct. 10 deadline for prosecutors to announce how they plan to proceed.

Burns wants jury selection in the case to begin right after Thanksgiving and witnesses to begin testifying in January. Defense lawyers said that is too soon.

Prosecutors said they hope to try Javier Arellano at the same time as three other accused cartel members: Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia and brothers Gilbert and Ismael Higuera Guerrero.

Villarreal is accused of heading a band of thugs who beheaded three Rosarito Beach police officers and kidnapped and killed other enemies of the cartel. He also could face the death penalty.

The Higuera brothers are accused of running day-to-day operations for the cartel in Tijuana and Mexicali.

The brothers were among 15 Mexican prisoners extradited to the United States last month.

Mexican officials agreed to the extraditions as long as none of those extradited face the death penalty, which is not used in Mexico.

Mexican officials said the brothers and others still were running criminal organizations from inside jails.

San Diego prosecutors are hopeful that other members of the Arellano Félix cartel will be extradited soon, including Benjamín Arellano.

Convict-cop Labels ATF Accuser 'Liar' (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 6, 2007

Drawing chuckles from jurors for his Chicago mannerisms and colorful language, infamous former Police Officer Joseph Miedzianowski was back in federal court Monday, but only in a videotaped deposition in a case involving a one-time federal agent who is suing the city.

Tapes of Miedzianowski being questioned about his dealings with former Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms Agent Diane Klipfel were played for the panel. Klipfel and her agent husband are suing Chicago, charging that when they tried to blow the whistle on Miedzianowski in 1992, the city ignored the allegations and Miedzianowski was able to turn the Police Department's internal affairs unit against them.

Dressed in prison garb with short hair and a hint of a goatee, Miedzianowski admitted in the video that he doesn't like Klipfel. He called her out of control, a liar and a lunatic. He eventually was arrested in 1998 and later convicted of masterminding a massive Chicago-to-Miami drug ring and was dubbed the most corrupt police officer in Chicago history by federal prosecutors.

"Lunatic would've been one of the nicer words I would've used on her," Miedzianowski said.

Miedzianowski said Klipfel sowed dissent among agents and officers while she supervised a gang detail of which he was a member, and she made false allegations against him to cover her own questionable conduct.

He gave a vastly different version of events surrounding the February 1992 search at the home of a drug dealer than Klipfel has given jurors during the trial. Klipfel testified last month that she watched Miedzianowski take a safe-deposit box key from the dealer's pants and that cash and jewelry were taken from the home.

Miedzianowski said Klipfel was the one who found the key and she asked police officers to get a warrant and open the safe-deposit box. While officers were there, the wedding ring of the dealer's wife vanished, causing the dealer to shout about it, he said.

"I was right there when it happened," Miedzianowski said, at times barking his answers. "Diane Klipfel produced the ring and gave it to her (the dealer's wife.)"

In her testimony, Klipfel had described an enraged Miedzianowski who kicked her car and threatened her when she confronted him about taking money from the dealer and others. Miedzianowski described calmer meetings called by Klipfel, and he said the matter in dispute was that she wanted to give inventoried cash back to the dealer.

He said he had no idea that a formal complaint had been made against him until many months later and actually asked for a Chicago police investigation of himself a year after the search of the dealer's home to clear his own name.

Eventually, he just tried to get away from , Miedzianowski said, and he only made formal complaints against her after believing she was the source of complaints against him. He said he only wanted internal affairs investigators to know who they were dealing with and said he did not further influence any investigation of himself or Klipfel.

"Here's a woman screaming, 'Fire, fire fire,'" Miedzianowski said. "And the fire isn't over here, the fire's in her house."

He said he could not tell the lawyers that deposed him every "disgraceful" act Klipfel committed.

"I don't keep a catalog or a Rolodex of everything," he said. "I wouldn't have one big enough."

ATF Agent Says He Faked Murder To Get Into Hells Angels (CNN)

By Kelli Arena, Scott Bronstein And Jim Spellman, Cnn

CNN, February 6, 2007

MESA, Arizona (CNN) -- In a parched, secluded desert, a brutal killing is caught on videotape. A member of the feared and violent Mongol motorcycle gang is shot in the head at close range. His body is dumped in a shallow grave.

That murder was Jay Dobyns' ticket for membership into the Hells Angels motorcycle gang, Dobyns said.

"I had committed, like the ultimate deed, the ultimate act of loyalty to these guys," Dobyns said in an exclusive CNN interview.

But that murder was a fake, complete with special effects, cow guts for brains and artificial blood. What's more, Dobyns had a dark secret he was keeping from his fellow Hells Angels gang members: He was actually an agent for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and was infiltrating the gang to help bring them down. (Read about Dobyns' complaints against the ATF)

For nearly two years, from 2001-2003, Dobyns abandoned his old life, his family and his friends to wear the Hells Angels trademark vest and to simultaneously build a case against the most feared motorcycle gang in the world. If he'd been caught, he figured he would be dead.

The undercover plot was elaborate: Dobyns even had to fake a romantic relationship with a fellow biker played by a female agent, so he had an excuse not to sleep with other women.

Dobyns saw what few outsiders have ever seen -- the inner workings of the Hells Angels. He says that included gun and drug trafficking, extortion, rape and even murder. And Dobyns testified about it all in court.

One of the alleged murders happened on Dobyns's home turf at the time, Mesa, Arizona.

"Cynthia Garcia was a young woman who partied with the motorcycle gang. One day she said something one of them didn't appreciate, according to a Hells Angels informant for the government.

She was allegedly beaten unconscious, driven to the desert, and stabbed more than two dozen times, her head nearly severed from her body, according to government records. Dobyns testified about it in court.

Going deep undercover in the Hells Angels was only the latest installment of Dobyns' hard-living persona. In college, Dobyns was a star wide receiver at the University of Arizona.

After school, he went into law enforcement, getting shot through the chest and even run over by criminals in his first few years on the job. Fellow agents say he was among the best in his rough-and-tumble field.

Illegal Guns Targeted With $1,000 Rewards (SACBEE)

By Christina Jewett, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, February 6, 2007

Sacramento law enforcement leaders have announced a new program offering $1,000 rewards to get illegal guns off the street.

DOJ_NMG_0128472

Authorities are turning to YouTube, MySpace.com and text messaging - communication highways for teens - to promote a new program offering $1,000 rewards for information about illegal guns.

The rewards will go to anonymous callers who provide police with information about an illegal gun or unlawful gun owner - if the information leads to an arrest. In California, felons are not allowed to own guns, and only people with permits can carry loaded firearms.

"This is one of the things we're doing to try to reduce the level of violence we see on the streets," Sacramento Police Chief Albert Najera said at a press conference with Sacramento County Sheriff John McGinness and agents from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

ATF Agents Who Shot At Gunman Won't Be Charged (WP)

By Jamie Stockwell, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

Arlington County's chief prosecutor has ruled that there will be no charges against the federal agents who exchanged gunfire with a man who then broke into an Arlington home, shot another man and kept police at bay for 10 hours last summer.

Commonwealth's Attorney Richard E. Trodden said an investigation into the July 5 incident found that the three agents acted in self-defense when they fired at Travis Hampton, 24. Hampton had fired several shots at the agents before leading them on a chase that zigzagged through the county's narrow streets, Trodden said. Hampton, of Southeast Washington, later fatally shot himself inside the home he had broken into.

"We found no grounds for any kind of criminal case," Trodden said. "The only real issue here was whether the agents acted properly, and we found they certainly had a right to defend themselves."

The incident began as a minor collision at the height of rush hour on Interstate 395 south and evolved into a tense standoff that lasted into the next morning and involved out-of-town agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. Moments before the crash, Trodden said, Hampton had robbed a drug dealer of marijuana at gunpoint from inside the car, which belonged to his girlfriend.

ATF spokeswoman Sheree Mixell would not comment on the case and declined to say whether the agents faced any internal action. She referred calls to the civil rights division of the Justice Department, which also reviewed the case. A spokesman there did not a return a message left yesterday.

Trodden said that after Hampton sideswiped the agents' unmarked sport-utility vehicle, he took the South Glebe Road exit and got out of his car. After the agents identified themselves, Hampton fired at them. Bullets hit the SUV's engine compartment and a window. The agents returned fire, and Hampton dived back into his car and fled.

While he was being pursued on a congested Glebe Road, Hampton at one point leaned out his car window and fired again, Trodden said, shattering more of the SUV's windows and sending pieces of glass into the agents' faces. The SUV became disabled, and the agents ran after Hampton's car into Arlington's Douglas Park neighborhood. Hampton's Ford Taurus finally crashed into a Chevrolet Blazer parked in front of a house on South 13th Street.

Hampton left his car and kicked open the front door of the house, Trodden said, startling a resident who had just finished showering. He shot the resident, a man who lived in the basement with his sister, as the two siblings ran from the house. The man was not critically injured, police said.

About 4 a.m., after stalled negotiations and failed attempts to reach Hampton by telephone, a SWAT team found Hampton's body in a front bedroom. He had shot himself in the mouth, Trodden said. He said Hampton also suffered wounds to the back of his head, possibly during the exchange of gunfire.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigrant Entrepreneurs Shape A New Economy (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

Manuel A. Miranda was 8 when his family immigrated to New York from Bogotá. His parents, who had been lawyers, turned to selling home-cooked food from the trunk of their car. Manuel pitched in after school, grinding corn by hand for traditional Colombian flatbreads called arepas.

DOJ_NMG_0128473

Today Mr. Miranda, 32, runs a family business with 16 employees, producing 10 million arepas a year in the Maspeth section of Queens. But the burst of Colombian immigration to the city has slowed; arepas customers are spreading through the suburbs, and competition for them is fierce. Now, he says, his eye is on a vast, untapped market: the rest of the country.

In the long run, like bagels, "you're going to have arepas in every store," predicted Mr. Miranda, whose innovations include a "toaster-friendly" version (square instead of round), and an experimental Web site that offers online sales nationwide. "But I don't have the connections. I don't know the people who can advise how to take us to the next level."

As the flow of immigrants to suburban and small-town America outpaces the growth of bustling ethnic centers in New York, many foreign-born entrepreneurs like the Mirandas are facing an unfamiliar crossroads. In the city, rising rents and density hamper growth, while swelling ethnic enclaves in the suburbs generate competitors. Yet in other places, opportunity beckons as never before, as immigrants expand the tastes of mainstream America.

Whether these businesses exploit the new chances to break out or succumb to the new perils, the city's economy will feel the effects.

"Immigrants have been the entrepreneurial spark plugs of cities from New York to Los Angeles," said Jonathan Bowles, the director of the Center for an Urban Future, a private, nonprofit research organization that has studied the dynamics of immigrant businesses that turned decaying neighborhoods into vibrant commercial hubs in recent decades. "These are precious and important economic generators for New York City, and there's a risk that we might lose them over the next decade."

A report to be issued by the center today highlights both the potential and the challenge for cities full of immigrant entrepreneurs, who often face language barriers, difficulties getting credit, and problems connecting with mainstream agencies that help businesses grow. The report identifies a generation of immigrant-founded enterprises poised to break into the big time — or already there, like the Lams Group, one of the city's most aggressive hotel developers, or Delgado Travel, which reaps roughly $1 billion in annual revenues.

In Los Angeles, at least 22 of the 100 fastest-growing companies in 2005 were created by first-generation immigrants. In Houston, a telecommunications company started by a Pakistani man topped the 2006 list of the city's most successful small businesses.

But even in those cities and New York, where immigrant-friendly mayors have promoted programs to help small business, the report contends that immigrant entrepreneurs have been overlooked in long-term strategies for economic development.

Some are doing just fine anyway. Lowell Hawthorne, the Jamaican-born chief executive of Golden Krust Caribbean Bakery, has parlayed a single bakery, opened in the Bronx in 1989, into more than 100 franchise restaurants nationwide. The latest batch opened in Atlanta, where Jamaican-style specialties, supplied from a Bronx plant with 130 employees, draw on a mix of West Indian immigration and crossover appeal.

Other companies, like Rajbhog Foods, which started as a mom-and-pop Indian sweets shop in Jackson Heights, Queens, seem to be on the edge of a similar breakthrough, even as they struggle with rising costs and shifting immigration patterns.

"Two steps forward and then back one step," said Sachin Mody, the chief executive and son of the founders. "That is the hardest part, to keep hurdling and keep evolving."

Mr. Mody said the company had about 70 employees and three plants and sold its vegetarian products to stores in 41 states and Canada. Its catering operation handles Indian weddings and conventions for as many as 10,000. But six years ago, in recognition of a changing market, it began opening franchise stores in places like Jersey City and Hicksville, on Long Island, where Indians have settled in large numbers.

In Jackson Heights, where South Asians from around the region have long come to shop for ethnic food and the latest in saris, bangles and Bollywood DVDs, business in Rajbhog's gleaming flagship store is down 30 to 40 percent, said the owner, Nirval Shah, an Indian-born nephew of the founders.

"We try to reach out to every corner where there is an Indian community, so they don't have to drive all the way to one location to get what they need," he explained, allowing that such suburban shops were drawing business away from Little India in Queens, a view echoed by other merchants.

Then he pointed to the company's newest line: frozen Indian entrees, less spiced for American palates.

In some ways, New York may have a head start on the growing pains of immigrant businesses. The nation's recent surge of newcomers started earlier in the state and peaked by the mid-1990s, when immigration was still growing rapidly elsewhere. About 90,000 new immigrants still arrive each year in New York State, the vast majority still settling in the city, but that is down from about 168,000 in 1990.

Now, some children of the early influx are trying to build on their parents' success — success that itself has increased the cost of doing business, by driving up rents and creating congestion.

One example is Jay Joshua, a Manhattan company that designs souvenirs and then has them manufactured in Asia and imported. Jay Chung, who arrived from South Korea in 1981 as a graduate student in design, started printing his computer-graphic designs for New York logos and peddling them to local T-shirt shops. His company is now one of the city's leading suppliers of tourist items, from New York-loving coffee mugs to taxicab Christmas ornaments.

Mr. Chung's son Joshua, 26, who was 3 when he immigrated, joined the company after studying business management in college, and recently helped land orders for a new line of Chicago souvenirs. But frustration mixes with pride when the Chungs, both American citizens now, discuss the company's growth.

"It's really hard to conduct a business over here as a wholesaler," Mr. Chung said in the company's West 27th Street showroom, chockablock with samples. "We get a ticket every 20 minutes, no matter what. We need more convenient places with less rent, less traffic."

Thirty years ago their wholesale district was desolate. Now hundreds of Korean-American importers are there, said Jay Chung, who is a leader of the local Korean-American business association. They face a blizzard of parking tickets and high commercial rents — nearly $20,000 a month for 1,400 square feet, he said. Many merchants have had to subdivide and sublet their space, he added, shrinking just when they need to grow.

The association's efforts to find an alternate wholesale site have a checkered history that underscores the importance of partnerships with the city — and the pitfalls. Responding to the city's request for redevelopment proposals for the College Point section of Queens, more than 50 Korean merchants pooled $1 million to draw up the winning proposal, Mr. Chung said. At a news conference in 2004, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said it would create hundreds of new jobs. But the city backed out eight months later, after protests by older, white Queens residents and their representatives.

"They said they didn't want the area to become like Flushing, like Chinatown," Mr. Chung recalled. "It was a disaster for us — not only financially, but our image."

Apologetic city development officials offered five other locations, he said in an account that the city confirmed, and the group is negotiating for a private project in Jamaica, Queens, that could yield a 13-story center in about four years. Meanwhile, however, some merchants have already moved to New Jersey.

At a time when cities woo biotechnology firms and sports arenas to jump-start local economies, the economic potential of immigrant entrepreneurs has remained largely under the radar, says the Center for an Urban Future. Though there are no precise figures to measure their economic contributions, the report said, these businesses create jobs in good times and bad. They offset the cyclical slumps of more high-profile sectors like finance in New York or energy in Houston. And they have created ethnic markets that draw shoppers into the city, balancing the loss of retail trade to the suburbs.

The report credits the Bloomberg administration for small-business initiatives that have helped some firms, but calls on public, private and nonprofit agencies to do more to connect immigrant entrepreneurs to the expertise available.

Kara Alaimo, a spokeswoman for the city's Small Business Services Department, said it now deployed a staff speaking six foreign languages who aided almost 13,000 businesses in the five boroughs last year. "We are incredibly proud of our achievements in this arena and look forward to doing even more to provide resources to this vital community," she said.

Immigrant entrepreneurs seem ambivalent about getting more attention from the city. Some are leery of red tape, though they would welcome, say, a municipal parking garage. Others cite concrete help they have received from city agencies.

When Mr. Miranda's arepas company, Delicias Andinas, was struggling with high trash bills two years ago, he said, a city agent in an industry retention program referred him to a recycler. Now much of the company's garbage — mostly corn leftovers — is sold to hog farms.

"They helped us out to a win-win situation," said Mr. Miranda, now an American citizen who calls himself "a dyed-in-the-wool New Yorker."

"For us, it was a big deal. Right now, I don't need money. I need knowledge."

Send Convicted Illegal Immigrants Home (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

The county is right to send the illegal immigrants in its jails to deportation hearings after their sentences.

POLICE SHOULD NOT act like immigration agents, nor should landlords. But if there's one place it's wholly appropriate for local officials to crack down on illegal immigrants, it's in county jail.

Two years ago, Los Angeles County kicked off a controversial program to screen the immigration status of jail inmates more carefully. Eight custody assistants with the Sheriff's Department were trained to investigate inmates' backgrounds, and in October, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement doubled the number of agents assigned to local jails. The result, as Times staff writers Patrick McGreevy and Stuart Pfeifer reported Monday, is that the number of inmates flagged for deportation nearly doubled last year, to 5,829.

L.A. jails are facing an overcrowding crisis, and illegal immigrants are part of the problem. Federal officials estimate that as many as 40,000 of the 170,000 inmates who pass through local jails each year are in this country illegally. Deporting them won't solve overcrowding in the short term because they have to serve their sentences before being turned over to the feds, but it will probably reduce crime and the jail population over the long term. Meanwhile, illegal residents will have more incentive to obey the law, without being unduly discouraged from cooperating with police.

Outside of jail, getting local governments, or citizens, involved in the immigration enforcement business is usually a bad idea. Perhaps the most disturbing local example of the trend was last fall's short-lived Escondido law forcing landlords to verify the immigration status of their tenants and to evict illegal immigrants. Orange County Sheriff Michael S. Carona has long sought to conduct immigration sweeps, and the Los Angeles Police Department has slightly loosened its policy forbidding inquiries into suspects' immigration status.

The danger with these measures is that if local police are seen as immigration enforcers, law-abiding immigrants will shy away from reporting crimes or stepping forward as witnesses. Beat cops rely on community relationships; turning them into border police makes their jobs harder.

Jailhouse immigration screening applies only to convicts, so there's little danger that it will erode trust for police by law-abiding immigrants. And though deputies serving guard duty later end up on the streets, they aren't the ones doing the screening; that's performed by custody assistants, who remain in the jails. The only legitimate fear about the jail program is that cops may bust street thugs they suspect to be illegal immigrants for the tiniest of infractions, knowing that a deportation hearing will follow the punishment. But this is a narrow concern that requires monitoring; it's not a deal-breaker.

There should be a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants, but convicts have forfeited the right to be on it. Send them home.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

On Deficit Cutting, Skeptics Abound (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

President Bush often describes himself as optimistic about the nation's future, and he demonstrated that again with his 2008 budget request to Congress.

In the spending-and-tax plan released yesterday, Mr. Bush projects the deficits that have marked his tenure will disappear by 2012. To accomplish that, the White House assumes revenues will continue to pour into the Treasury at near their recent rates and Congress goes along with all of Mr. Bush's domestic-spending plans -- a scenario Democrats on Capitol Hill promptly rejected.

Even if the White House is able to persuade Democrats to cut 141 federal programs, squeeze nonsecurity programs to a 1% annual growth rate and make sharp cuts in Medicare, Mr. Bush's projections still don't account for several big potential budget-busters, as budget analysts and Democratic critics were quick to note yesterday. All of these are short-term problems that pale in comparison with the long-term fiscal time bombs the nation faces with the retirement of baby boomers.

Still, the budget's perceived shortcomings are sparking a lively debate.

The president's budget contains only partial projections of war-related spending, likely disguising what will be higher outlays. The budget assumes the cost of military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan will total $145 billion for fiscal 2008, but only $50 billion in 2009 -- and zero after that. Congressional Budget Office figures suggest a withdrawal of large numbers of U.S. troops by 2010 would actually add to overall costs.

Mr. Bush also hasn't addressed the likely costs of long-term relief from the alternative minimum tax. Originally created by Congress in the 1960s to ensure ultrawealthy people didn't use credits and deductions to avoid paying any tax, it is beginning to hit the middle class. It isn't indexed for inflation, so more earners qualify for the AMT, and the Bush tax cuts have accelerated the expansion of its reach. Congress keeps passing one-year patches, but the cost of relief is soaring each year; it would be at least $36 billion through 2008 and could reach $1.3 trillion over the next decade, according to various estimates. Democrats are adamant about fixing the AMT problem, in part because it hits states they dominate -- such as New York, New Jersey and California -- especially hard.

Mr. Bush also is projecting reductions in expenditures for agricultural subsidies -- as much as $5 billion annually, compared with last year's forecast -- as the administration seeks to reauthorize farm-economy support programs. Much of the change is due to strong market demand, which has kept prices from falling to levels that trigger federal subsidy payments. But the administration's agriculture plan also is expected to tighten up on some programs, while focusing more on establishing overseas markets and putting more money into research, particularly renewable fuels. Some of those proposals could fall short of farm-state Democrats' expectations.

Democrats also questioned the increases in tax collections the White House projects -- exceeding 5% annual growth on average over the next six years, greater than the yearly increase in projected economic growth and above the revenue growth congressional budget analysts forecast. The administration also is proposing a series of fees -- including an increase in premiums for corporations that participate in the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. and new fees for food inspection and enrollment in veterans programs -- that will be difficult to push through Congress.

The administration's economic-growth projection for 2007 is somewhat higher than others. It projects 2.7% real GDP growth for 2007, compared with 2.3% by the Congressional Budget Office and 2.4% by the Blue Chip panel, a group of business economists. Last year, the administration projected 3.4% real GDP growth for 2006 versus 3.6% by CBO and 3.4% by the Blue Chip. CBO now projects that real GDP growth in 2006 was 3.3%.

Critics say when more realistic projections are used, the small surplus forecast for 2012 is likely to melt away.

"While the president has endorsed the goal of balancing the budget, under realistic assumptions his budget remains in deficit every year," said Rep. John Spratt (D., S.C.), chairman of the House Budget Committee.

"In some places this budget shows vision, and in some places the president's eyes are shut tight to this country's fiscal reality," said Sen. Max Baucus (D., Mont.), the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

White House budget director Rob Portman termed the budget "credible." Mr. Portman said the handling of war costs also was more transparent than in the past, when requests were made off-budget through "emergency" appropriations.

Democrats vowed to counter Mr. Bush's priorities by pushing for more help for lower-income people and the middle class. Spending on health-care programs, education, energy and the environment were among the most likely friction points with the White House, as the two sides clash over appropriations bills.

Still, the focus by both sides on the five-year window ending in 2012 masks the fiscal problems that lie after that. Starting in 2011, the oldest members of the baby-boomer generation will begin to become eligible for Medicare, the government health-insurance program for people 65 and older. That system is projected by its trustees to go broke by 2018.

That reality sets up a much bigger debate over fiscal policy in 2009, following the presidential election in 2008. Hanging in the balance will be a possible overhaul of U.S. health care, the fate of Mr. Bush's tax cuts and maybe Social Security and Medicare. To jump-start the debate over entitlements, Mr. Bush again is urging Congress to create new private accounts for future Social Security recipients.

White House Sees End To Deficit (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

The White House budget sent to Congress on Monday shows the deficit declining moderately during the remaining years of George W. Bush's presidency – from 1.9 per cent in fiscal 2006 to 1.6 per cent in 2008 – plunging more rapidly from around the time he leaves office, and finally turning into a 0.3 per cent surplus in 2012.

This deficit dynamic is substantially driven by the way the budget accounts for the cost of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. It accounts for these costs in full in 2008 and sets aside $50bn to cover unforeseen war-related expenses in 2009, but makes no provision for one-off war costs in 2010 or beyond.

Whether actual war-related spending will follow the path set out in the budget is debateable, raising one source of uncertainty as to its fiscal forecasts.

More broadly, most of the deficit reduction is supposed to take place after Mr Bush leaves office and achieving this is cause for some scepticism.

The White House set out to show that it is possible to balance the budget by 2012 while making the Bush tax cuts permanent. The budget indeed does this, though the fiscal maths rests on certain assumptions, some of which – like the rapid decline in war costs – look optimistic.

The biggest assumption is that it is possible to hold non-security discretionary spending growth to 1 per cent in nominal cash terms. That means real terms cuts every year for five years – a degree of sustained spending restraint which is unprecedented in recent times.

Then, the White House assumes the economy will grow faster than the non-partisan Congressional Budget Office estimates in 2007 and again from 2011 onwards.

The budget has growth averaging 3 per cent from 2008 to 2012, which is probably a small fraction faster than the Federal Reserve now thinks is sustainable.

In addition, the budget makes no allowance for the cost of indexing the Alternative Minimum Tax (AMT) beyond 2008 to prevent it drawing in an increasing number of middle class Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0128477

This is legitimate in one sense, as Mr Bush has called for a "revenue-neutral" AMT fix. But it would be politically very difficult for Congress to find revenue increases to offset fully the cost of an AMT fix.

If Congress continues to patch the AMT year by year, as it has in recent years, the deficit will be significantly larger in each year from 2009 onwards than the budget forecasts.

The changes to Medicare and other entitlement programmes – which are significant in fiscal terms at the 2012 mark and hugely important thereafter – may also be difficult to get through Congress.

On the plus side, the budget includes an allowance for the cost of moving to private accounts in Social Security, which is unlikely to happen, leaving some cash on the table.

Also, the White House has not made very aggressive assumptions about growth in tax receipts in the light of the positive revenue surprises of the past couple of years.

This is in line with mainstream economic thinking, but it remains possible that there could be more tax buoyancy ahead, because of the share of income gains going to corporations and higher rate taxpayers.

Even if this materialised, though, it would very likely not be enough to make up, for instance, for any ongoing post 2009 war costs, inability to hold non-security discretionary spending growth to 1 per cent or failure to implement a cost-neutral AMT fix.

Bush Releases Budget Aimed To Erase Deficit (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5 — President Bush unveiled a $2.9 trillion budget on Monday that he said would wipe out the deficit in five years without raising taxes, setting up a clash with the Democratic-run Congress and charting a course for Republicans to continue his policies long after he leaves office.

The budget, in four volumes and 2,500 pages of text, charts and tables, made few concessions to the political realities facing Mr. Bush.

For a president less than two years from the end of his second term, and with his poll numbers low, it was a defiant statement of the principles he has championed for years: the power of tax cuts to drive the economy, the need to spend what it takes to succeed in Iraq and in the broader struggle against terrorism and the necessity of reining in spending on much of the rest of what government does.

Speaking to reporters after meeting with the cabinet, the president said, "We have proven, and I strongly believe Congress needs to listen to, a budget which has no tax increase, and a budget, because of fiscal discipline, that can be balanced in five years."

He said the plan "is realistic; it's achievable."

To the Democrats who now run Congress, it was little more than a prop in a bit of theater that the White House used to try to define the fiscal debate on its terms.

While all presidential budgets are political documents as much as economic plans, this one, Democrats said, would get little hearing on Capitol Hill. They said the budget was built on flawed assumptions and fiscal trickery, including the failure to include estimates for the long-term cost of the war.

"What he's saying is, basically you can have it all — you can spend the money, especially on defense and the war, and you can cut every tax, and it all works," Senator Kent Conrad, Democrat of North Dakota and the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, said in an interview. "But in the real world, it doesn't work out."

The budget calls for $145.2 billion for the war in the year starting Oct. 1, mostly for Iraq and Afghanistan, on top of a new request for an additional $99.6 billion to pay for the war for the balance of the current fiscal year. It includes money to increase the size of the Army and the Marine Corps and hire more Border Patrol agents, but imposes steep cuts in the growth of Medicare and Medicaid. It would trim or eliminate other domestic programs, like one providing loans for vocational education.

Assuming that all of Mr. Bush's proposals were agreed to by Congress, that his economic assumptions panned out and that the costs of the war dropped sharply and then went away in coming years, the budget would bring the deficit down from a projected level of $244 billion this year to $239 billion next year. In 2012, three years after he leaves the White House, there would be a surplus of $61 billion.

The document provided Mr. Bush's fellow Republicans with talking points to use in asserting that tax cuts have helped keep the economy strong, as they confront calls from some Democrats to roll back some of the tax cuts Mr. Bush signed into law in his first term. John Edwards, the Democratic candidate for president, said Monday that he would support raising taxes on upper-income people to help pay for his proposal to provide health coverage to the uninsured.

DOJ_NMG_0128478

In an internal party strategy memorandum circulated on Capitol Hill, a senior Republican aide wrote that the budget "gives us a huge (and rare, given our new status) opportunity to get a jump on the Democrats and stay on the offensive for weeks to come."

The memorandum continued, "Our message will be one that repeatedly challenges the Democrats to rein in federal spending and balance the budget without raising taxes on the American people."

But it was also to some degree a longer-term legacy-building document for Mr. Bush, an effort to bake into the fiscal cake many of the domestic policies that have defined his presidency and conservative economic thought in the last several decades. And while the two parties have different views of how much to credit the Bush tax cuts for the economy's current condition, the government's books, at least in the short run, are benefiting from a jump in tax revenues that has already brought the deficit down substantially in the past several years.

The White House promises to achieve its balanced-budget goal, in part, by limiting the growth of all federal programs, outside of the military and domestic security, to 1 percent. In addition to assuming spending restraint, the budget assumes the economy and federal tax revenues will continue to grow — assumptions that Rob Portman, Mr. Bush's budget director, described as "a cautious approach" rather than "a rosy scenario."

The 2008 proposal is the first Bush administration budget to include emergency spending requests for Iraq and Afghanistan, a move Mr. Portman called "our good-faith effort to be as transparent as possible." But that transparency came only after repeated complaints from lawmakers of both parties, who had grown tired of considering budgets that left out the bulk of war spending.

Just hours after the budget message was released, the Senate was locked in a procedural showdown over the Iraq resolution opposing Mr. Bush's troop buildup. Disagreements on the war, within parties and between them, are so profound that Senator Conrad, the Budget Committee chairman, predicted that a fight over Iraq spending might prevent his committee from adopting any budget at all.

"Can you imagine getting every Democrat to agree on spending for the war?" Mr. Conrad asked.

As he has in years past, Mr. Bush uses the budget to challenge Democrats to rein in the growth of the government's biggest entitlement programs: Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security. The 2008 proposal includes plans to divert payroll taxes from Social Security into private accounts, a plan that went nowhere in the past, even when Republicans ran Capitol Hill.

The blueprint also calls for the government to reduce its projected spending on Medicare and Medicaid by a total of $280 billion over the life of the 10-year budget. While Democrats criticized Mr. Bush for what Speaker Nancy Pelosi called "wrong priorities," they conceded privately that Mr. Bush was correct in warning that the unchecked growth of entitlement programs would eventually break the federal bank.

As in years past, domestic security would see a big increase under Mr. Bush's budget, with spending rising by 8.4 percent to $61.1 billion. The plan includes enough new money for the Border Patrol to hire 3,000 new agents, bringing the total force to 17,819, compared with just over 9,000 in 2001. By the end of 2008, a total of about 370 miles of fence would be laid out on the border, compared with about 75 miles today.

In yet another sign of the times for Mr. Bush, the plan drew criticism from a leading Republican, Senator Susan Collins of Maine, who is her party's senior member on the domestic security committee. Ms. Collins said the budget "highlights the chronic and troubling underfunding" of grant programs for first responders.

Mr. Bush has long been criticized by some conservatives as being too willing to tolerate a steady expansion in the size of the federal government; some commentators refer to him, usually not admiringly, as a big-government conservative.

This budget calls for a 4.2 percent increase next year in overall government spending, down from a 4.8 percent increase between last year and this year.

The budget includes isolated increases for a few popular federal programs, including two in the area of education, which Mr. Bush considers a signature domestic issue. The White House called for gradually raising over five years the maximum Pell Grant for aid to needy college students to $5,400 a year from $4,050. Mr. Bush also proposed a $1.2 billion increase in aid to high schools that educate predominantly low-income youngsters.

But the president also proved willing to propose reining in the popular health program called Schip that provides insurance to low-income children whose parents earn too much to qualify for Medicaid.

The budget calls for only slim spending increases in the Schip program, so slim that Democrats say they are tantamount to cuts when inflation is considered. The budget also sets new rules limiting eligibility to youngsters with family incomes below 200 percent of the federal poverty level, or about $38,000 for a family of four.

Bush's Budget Beefs Up Defense (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

DOJ_NMG_0128479

Chicago Tribune, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, seeking $245 billion more for the nation's two wars at a time when Congress is challenging an escalation of U.S. military force in Iraq, proposed a $2.9 trillion federal budget Monday that would significantly increase defense spending while restraining other areas of the government.

The president's plan for 2008 is much like the budgets he has presented for the past six years, averting new taxes and limiting spending in many "discretionary" areas while boosting defense spending. The $481.4 billion requested for the Department of Defense would mark a 62 percent boost since Bush took office and an 11 percent increase over the current budget.

What is different is the political environment in which the president is delivering his newest spending plan. Leaders of the new Democratic-controlled Congress are challenging not only the president's escalation of force in Iraq but also his conduct of the war in general.

The White House, while insisting that its commitment to military force in Iraq is not open-ended, added a $50 billion "placeholder" proposal for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan in the 2009 budget year, a fiscal acknowledgement that the conflicts will outlast Bush's tenure.

"Our priority is to protect the American people," Bush said Monday. "And our priority is to make sure our troops have what it takes to do their jobs."

The president's newest spending plan arrives as the Senate is working to craft a non-binding resolution protesting Bush's deployment of 21,500 additional troops in Iraq, which accounts for $5.6 billion of the $100 billion in added war costs for 2007 that the president is seeking. The White House says it has not factored that deployment into the war costs of the 2008 budget, because this "surge" of troops is expected to be temporary.

That resolution hit a Republican roadblock Monday when GOP leaders found the votes to halt debate on the measure. Republicans want their own resolutions considered at the same time as the Democratic-supported measure.

Congressional leaders—insisting they support the military, especially the troops already in Iraq—promised closer scrutiny of the president's war spending than the Republican-run Congress has given defense expenditures since 2002.

"The sums involved in the defense budget requests are staggering," said Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. At the same time, Bush is seeking a 92,000-person increase in the size of the standing military.

Skelton said the military has "long needed an increase in funding."

"We cannot provide an adequate national defense on the cheap, but neither can we afford to simply ratify the president's request," he added. "Congress must look very carefully at how much of this increase truly goes to enhancing our readiness and future defense capabilities and how much is being spent to further the fight in Iraq."

Projected war cost: $700 billion

The White House insisted that it has attempted to make the costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan as "transparent" as possible by spelling them out in its new budget. This comes after four years in which the White House has sent the Congress "emergency" supplemental funding plans for the wars, separate from the main budget.

The newest increase of $100 billion in war spending for the current year would push to $170 billion the wars' costs during the 2007 budget year that ends Sept. 30. The president's budget director said military planners have taken their best guess in estimating a $145 billion war budget for 2008.

Overall, the president's requests push the projected costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan to nearly $700 billion through 2008, just before Bush will finish his term.

"It's a credible and more transparent budget," said Rob Portman, Bush's budget director, maintaining that this blueprint "goes further than we have in the past to show the full cost of the war… for the rest of the president's term."

That is not all that Bush is promising by the end of his presidency and beyond. After the federal budget deficit jumped to record highs during the Bush administration, the White House promises to halve that deficit by the end of his presidency. The administration also maintains that the proposed budget would put the government on a path toward a slight surplus by 2012.

The deficit exceeded $400 billion during Bush's first term, and the White House budget office now projects a deficit of $239 billion in 2008 and $187 billion in 2009. That could put the government on track for a $61 billion surplus by 2012, the budget office maintained.

Bush maintained that balancing the budget would be possible without raising taxes.

"I strongly believe Congress needs to listen to a budget which has no tax increase, and a budget, because of fiscal discipline, that can be balanced in five years," Bush said at a Cabinet meeting Monday.

At the same time, the White House insisted that the spiraling increase in spending in entitlement programs such as Medicare and Medicaid must be curtailed, and proposed $96 billion in spending cuts over the next five years to contain the growth of those programs.

DOJ_NMG_0128480

Such mandatory spending now accounts for 53 percent of the overall federal budget, said Portman, noting that the share of entitlement programs in the budget has grown from 26 percent in the early 1960s. At the pace those programs have been growing, Portman says, they will "crowd out all other spending … unless we are ready to make the necessary reforms."

Education spending reduced

The president's 2008 plan includes close to 7 percent in additional spending for those mandatory programs, a 6 percent increase overall for "security"—including the Departments of Defense and Homeland Security—and just a 1 percent increase for all "discretionary" spending outside of the mandatory entitlements or security spending.

In some areas, such as education, the president is proposing a continuation of cutbacks. The 2008 plan proposes $58.6 billion for education, down from $68 billion this year. In 2006, $93 billion was spent on education.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) sharply criticized the proposal. Kennedy helped Bush win passage of his No Child Left Behind educational reforms during Bush's first year as president, but has since criticized the administration for failing to finance those reforms.

"I am particularly disappointed that the president has once again proposed inadequate funding for the law's important reforms and that he pays for his modest increases through cuts to other education programs," Kennedy said.

The president is calling on Congress, as he has before, to shrink or eliminate 141 government programs to save another $12 billion.

But Portman, a former Ohio congressman, said the White House has adjusted its budget proposals to more closely conform to what Congress actually has done in recent years—which has meant increasing the discretionary areas of spending in the federal budget by about 1 percent this year.

Bush Budget Cements Expiring Tax Cuts (AP)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

AP, February 6, 2007

President Bush asked Congress on Monday to slash taxes by $1.9 trillion over the next decade, cementing his first-term tax cuts while changing the way health insurance is taxed.

The lion's share of the president's proposed tax reductions would come from making permanent his signature cuts enacted in 2001 and 2003, at a cost of $1.6 trillion over the next 10 years. Those cuts would otherwise evaporate at the end of 2010.

"Well-timed, pro-growth tax policies helped create the right climate for innovation and entrepreneurship," powering a resilient economy, Bush said in his budget message.

The president also proposed a variety of individual and business tax breaks, including incentives for retirement and health care savings. He asked for an extension of a popular research and development tax credit, at a cost of $117.3 billion over 10 years. The cost of extending Bush's earlier tax cuts would be $146.5 billion in 2011 alone — the first year after they are set to expire.

Bush called for a change in the way the tax code treats health insurance as part of a complex plan to expand coverage to the uninsured. His plan would end the tax-exempt status of employer-provided health insurance payments, and give families a $15,000 deduction for buying medical coverage. Employer contributions that exceed the deduction amount would be taxed.

Other options for tax-free health spending, such as setting aside money in a Flexible Spending Account, would also end under Bush's proposal, according to details provided by the Treasury Department. Taxpayers could still save tax-free for a dependent's medical expenses.

The plan would go into effect in 2009. It would cost $121.2 billion over its first three years but would ultimately pay for itself, according to Bush's budget estimates.

Democrats have assailed the proposal as an inadequate solution to covering the uninsured, noting that it could penalize some workers who receive generous employer-furnished health coverage.

Bush's budget said it would "level the playing field for Americans who purchase health care individually rather than through their employers."

The president did not propose a permanent fix for the alternative minimum tax, a complex system created to ensnare wealthy tax-dodgers but which is increasingly hitting middle-class families. As he has in past years, Bush instead asked Congress to preserve a temporary change to blunt its effect for another year.

Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., the Finance Committee chairman, said he would like to see Bush's 2001 tax cuts extended, but faulted the president for leaving out the cost of addressing the alternative minimum tax, which he called "a far more immediate threat to American families."

Treasury estimated that the alternative minimum tax was paid by 4 million people last year and predicted that some 25 million can expect to pay it next year without a change in law.

DOJ_NMG_0128481

Bush's budget also proposes tackling the "tax gap" — the estimated $290 billion difference each year between what taxpayers owe and what they pay. He called on Congress to add $409 million to the Internal Revenue Service's budget next year to address the problem, and to pass a host of measures designed to improve compliance with tax laws.

Plan Calls For No Tax Hikes; Dems Say It's 'Disconnected From Reality' (USAT)

By David Jackson And Richard Wolf

USA Today, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — The proposed $2.9 trillion budget that President Bush sent Congress Monday sets the stage for a series of politically difficult debates over war, taxes and the safety net for poor, elderly and disabled Americans.

By laying down his priorities, Bush wooed Democrats with spending proposals they favor and made clear that if they want to raise taxes to pay for more, they will have to propose it themselves.

HIGHLIGHTS: Requests may get mixed reception

Bush pays for his own priorities — the Iraq war and permanent tax cuts — with reductions in Medicare and Medicaid, below-inflation increases in other domestic programs and what Democrats such as House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt decried as faulty revenue projections. If they reject those proposals, Democrats may need to boost taxes in their own budget plan, to be written this spring.

Bush's budget is 4.2% bigger than last year's. He raises defense spending by more than 10%. Spending on veterans and foreign aid soars by double digits. There's more money for programs ranging from Pell college grants to national parks.

Yet the budget professes to reach a $61 billion surplus in 2012 without raising taxes, thanks to fiscal restraint and continued economic growth averaging 3% a year that administration officials said will generate higher tax revenue.

"I strongly believe Congress needs to listen to a budget which has no tax increase," Bush said after meeting with his Cabinet at the White House.

Democratic leaders in Congress, taking up their first budget since winning House and Senate majorities in the November elections, said Bush eliminates the $248 billion budget deficit by leaving out three critical factors: The budget doesn't project war costs beyond 2009. It underestimates future domestic spending. And it assumes that the alternative minimum tax will raise taxes on tens of millions of middle-income taxpayers after this year, even though both parties have said they won't let that happen. The AMT is intended to ensure that wealthy Americans cannot avoid all taxes.

"This budget is a combination of deception and debt in a way that's disconnected from reality," said Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., chairman of the Senate Budget Committee. Now Democrats have to write their own budget, which Conrad said will be "extraordinarily difficult."

Democrats outlined three reasons why:

·War costs. Bush wants to spend another $99 billion this year, for a total of $170 billion, on the war on terror. That includes funds to increase U.S. troop levels in Iraq by up to 21,500 this year. He wants $145 billion for next year and at least $50 billion for 2009.

Democrats promised to scrutinize the request. "There will be no more blank checks or rubber stamps," said Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert Byrd, D-W.Va. Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., who will chair hearings on the war request, wants to boost troop readiness outside of Iraq, which White House budget director Rob Portman said Bush's budget would do. Conrad said war costs cannot be cut significantly without a plan to begin withdrawing troops.

·Taxes. Bush's budget assumes that $1.6 trillion in tax cuts remain in place through 2017, even though they are scheduled to expire after 2010. Democrats have criticized the portion of those tax cuts that benefited millionaires, which Conrad estimated at $55 billion for 2008. Now that they control Congress, they must decide whether to propose eliminating those or other tax cuts.

Bush's budget also assumes the alternative minimum tax will increase bills for millions of middle-class Americans beginning in 2008. Democrats such as Spratt say that's unrealistic, but if they eliminate the AMT, they must find a way to pay for it with other tax increases.

·Safety net programs. Both parties agree that the biggest fiscal problem facing the nation is the long-term costs of Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security. The retirement of baby boomers and health care inflation mean that those programs cannot sustain themselves without higher taxes, lower benefits or widening deficits. Medicare alone would need a $32 trillion cash infusion over the next 75 years.

Bush, as he does every year, called for some safety net reductions. He would cut Medicare's projected growth by $66 billion over five years, partially by requiring higher payments from wealthier beneficiaries, and Medicaid's growth by $12 billion. He would give retirees the option of investing some of their payroll taxes in private Social Security accounts, beginning in 2012. "We should not leave these problems for our children and grandchildren to solve," said Portman. "Small changes now can have a big impact later."

DOJ_NMG_0128482

Even with those reductions, inflation and population increases would drive Medicaid spending up 40% by 2012, while Medicare and Social Security would rise by 31%.

In 2005, a Bush proposal to change Social Security by adding private accounts went nowhere in a Republican-run Congress. Members of both parties have been loath to tackle Medicare, the health insurance program for seniors and people with disabilities.

Now Democrats must square opposition to Bush's cuts with their desire to address Medicare's long-term insolvency.

"We're not cutting $100 billion from Medicare and Medicaid and, in the same breath, approve the largest funding yet for Iraq," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., who headed House Democrats' campaign last year.

Bush Budget Trims From Energy Spending (LAT)

By Richard Simon

Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — When President Bush signed a major energy bill in 2005, an array of programs were promised much more money.

But when Bush unveiled his new budget Monday, some of these same programs -- from energy assistance to low-income families to research to promote energy efficiency -- lost out.

The promises of more federal dollars clashed with fiscal reality as a deficit-minded Bush sent his first budget to a Democratic-controlled Congress. The president's spending proposals are certain to provoke fights as energy policy moves back to prominence on Capitol Hill amid heightened concerns about global warming and U.S. dependence on foreign oil.

Bill Prindle, acting executive director of the American Council for an Energy Efficient Economy, said Monday that the president's budget "sacrifices important efficiency programs." "Efficiency is the first fuel in the race for energy security," he said, urging Congress to scrap the president's proposals. "If we don't get our energy demand under control, none of the president's or anyone else's clean energy proposals will be able to catch up."

Although the proposed $1.24 billion budget for the Energy Department's Office of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy is slightly higher than the administration proposed in its last budget, it represents a cut of $237 million, or 16 percent, from the amount proposed for the current year in a bill moving through Congress.

"The good news is that Congress has signaled its intent to make energy efficiency programs a priority notwithstanding the budget request of the administration," said Kateri Callahan, president of the Alliance to Save Energy.

Bush proposed more money for some of his favorite initiatives: promoting technology to reduce emissions from coal-fired power plants and seeking to revive the nuclear industry, which has been at a virtual standstill since the 1979 accident at the Three Mile Island reactor in Harrisburg, Pa.

And he followed through on the initiative he proposed in his State of the Union address earlier this month to reduce gasoline consumption by calling for more spending for developing home-grown alternative fuels -- such as ethanol made from wood chips, switch grass and other kinds of biomass -- an initiative that appears to enjoy bipartisan support in Congress, especially from farm-state lawmakers.

Drawing the most criticism were Bush's proposals to cut the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Program to about $1.8 billion from the nearly $2.2 billion expected to be allocated and to cut the weatherization program from the proposed $242 million for the current fiscal year to $144 million.

Nick Papas, a spokesman for the House Democratic caucus, said Bush was sending a message to families who receive the energy assistance: "Stock up on blankets."

Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, called Bush's proposed cut in funding for the energy assistance program "simply unacceptable," underscoring how energy policy often breaks not along party lines but isothermal lines.

David Bradley, executive director of the National Community Action Foundation, said that Bush's proposal "unwisely elects energy experimentation over conservation."

"We certainly need new breakthroughs, yet it is not wise to invest only in risky, long-range experiments and neglect more immediate and proven home energy-saving upgrades," he said.

Sen. Pete Domenici of New Mexico, the top Republican on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, suggested Bush should add a zero to his proposed $9 billion in loan guarantees for alternative energy projects, saying that amount "means we can only guarantee loans for a couple of nuclear power plants or a couple of coal gasification plants."

Ironically, among the criticisms directed at Bush, a former oilman, was his zeroing out of funding for research and development of oil and natural gas, leaving coal as the only fossil fuel on which the Energy Department would continue to carry out any research.

The chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., complained that this would stymie production from new sources. "The key players for natural gas onshore in the United States are independent producers," he said, "they don't have R&D departments, and they are too small to be able to afford to start ones, regardless of the price of oil and gas."Rep. Nick Rahall, D-W.Va., chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee, praised the administration for including a provision recently passed by the House that would end royalty relief to energy companies drilling in the Gulf of Mexico and allow the federal government to charge fees when companies apply for drilling permits on federal lands.

The president's budget document states simply: "Additional royalty relief for oil and gas exploration is unwarranted in today's price environment."

"Amen to that," Rahall said.

Bush Submits 'Staggering' $2.9 Trillion Budget (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

President Bush yesterday sent Congress a $2.9 trillion budget for fiscal 2008 with more than $620 billion for defense next year and more than $93 billion for the Iraq war for the rest of 2007 -- figures the new majority Democrats on Capitol Hill called "staggering."

After two years of freezing or cutting basic domestic spending, the White House says it is bowing to Congress by planning a 1 percent increase. But it is also butting heads with Democrats by calling for Mr. Bush's tax cuts to be made permanent -- at a value of $1.2 trillion over 10 years.

"I strongly believe Congress needs to listen to a budget that says no tax increase and a budget that because of fiscal discipline can be balanced within five years," Mr. Bush said after meeting with his Cabinet yesterday morning.

With Democrats now in control, Mr. Bush's budget is probably already a dead document.

"I doubt that Democrats will support this budget, and frankly, I will be surprised if Republicans rally around it either," said House Democrats' point man on the budget, Rep. John M. Spratt Jr. of South Carolina, chairman of the Budget Committee.

Mr. Spratt, though, said Democrats do share Mr. Bush's goal of a balanced budget by 2012 -- providing at least a common endpoint for negotiations.

The budget shows deficits will hover around $240 billion for 2007 and 2008, decline to $187 billion in 2009 and eventually turn into a surplus in 2012. But the Bush budget counts on revenue, including tax collections from the Alternative Minimum Tax, that both Republicans and Democrats said is unrealistic.

For the first time since the war on terrorism began, Mr. Bush included a prediction of the expected annual cost, so appropriators can take that into consideration when developing their budget.

Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, called it a "good-faith effort" designed to show Mr. Bush is ready to work with Congress on an honest budget this year.

But Democrats expressed shock at the size of defense spending -- all told, more than $717 billion in new money that was proposed for 2007 and 2008.

"The sums involved in the defense budget requests are staggering," said House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton, Missouri Democrat. Other Democrats said the sizeable spending shows Mr. Bush is not changing his course.

Overall, the budget for fiscal 2008, which begins Oct. 1:

·Projects revenue of $2.662 trillion and spending of $2.902 trillion, for a deficit of $240 billion.

·Spends $410 million to help the Internal Revenue Service collect taxes and tweaks tax rules -- which the administration says could help collect $29 billion over 10 years in unpaid taxes.

·Calls for Medicare spending to rise at 6.7 percent annually over the next decade, down from the current projection of 7.4 percent, and for smaller reductions in Medicaid, for savings of $96 billion over five years.

·Pushes back the start date for private accounts in Social Security another two years, to 2012 -- a recognition that Congress is unlikely to approve such a program any time soon.

·Includes Mr. Bush's proposals for boosting alternative fuels to help decrease the use of gasoline, and his new health care proposal, which would amount to a tax cut on most Americans but a tax increase on those with the most generous health insurance plans.

·Calls for slashing 141 programs, which would save $12 billion in 2008.

Mr. Bush won praise from House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, for dropping some of the "gimmickry" he said the White House has used in the past.

In addition to trying to include more war costs this year, Mr. Portman said they also stopped counting on fees that Congress routinely rejects as sources of income, such as higher airport-security fees.

DOJ_NMG_0128484

Democrats blasted the reduced spending on Medicare, and promised a fight over Mr. Bush's call to extend his 2001 and 2003 tax cuts.

"The administration cannot continue to ignore the fact that its tax policies are shortchanging key domestic priorities such as health care, education and the environment, and driving us further into debt," Mr. Hoyer said.

Republicans on the more liberal side of the party were almost as harsh, with Sen. Olympia J. Snowe of Maine saying the budget was "a reflection of misplaced priorities" and Rep. Michael N. Castle of Delaware saying the proposal "may fall short in balancing non-war Defense Department funding with the need for critical domestic-spending priorities."

But conservative groups said Mr. Bush should have done more to rein in spending.

Republican budget leaders promised to fight any Democrat-led effort to raise taxes.

"We do not have a revenue problem in Washington, we have a spending problem," said Rep. Paul D. Ryan of Wisconsin, the top Republican on the Budget Committee. "When revenues are coming in as fast as they are, there is no need to raise taxes."

Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, sent his fellow senators a letter telling them he will block any new spending that is redundant or not offset by cuts in other programs.

"We are at a point in our history when the question of whether we should live within our means and prioritize spending is beyond debate," Mr. Coburn said. "Our nation's unsustainable fiscal course, the impending bankruptcy of Medicare and Social Security, and our national security challenges leave us no option but to make the hard choices today that will secure the future for tomorrow."

Portman Changes Tone, At Least, In Budget Debate (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 6, 2007

As Republicans go, Democrats really like Rob Portman. It's just too bad for the Office of Management and Budget director that he works for the Bush administration.

"Certainly, Rob Portman is very well regarded by many Democrats," said Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.). "But the Bush administration, separate from Rob Portman, has a very low level of credibility with the Democratic Caucus. ... They end up formulating policies and budgets that are very different from what Rob Portman presents."

Similarly, Senate Budget Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) praised Portman as "a thoughtful, bright person who is concerned about the long-term unsustainability of our fiscal situation."

So does that mean that Conrad is approaching with an open mind the $2.9 trillion fiscal 2008 budget the White House delivered on Monday?

"The problem is not with the staff. The problem is at the top," Conrad said. "Staff says everything is on the table, and the vice president and president are undermining the staff. ... If their superiors keep contradicting their representations, nothing's going to happen."

That's the overwhelming sentiment Portman, a former Ohio Congressman, faces over the next few weeks as he teams up with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to sell President Bush's budget blueprint to a skeptical Democratic majority on Capitol Hill.

"There will be no Democratic support for it," said Davis, who pointed to revelations that the president's 21,500 troop "surge" in Iraq really would amount to 48,000 new soldiers for the war as just the most recent example of why Democrats view the White House with suspicion.

But Democrats' misgivings about the Bush administration may not be completely insurmountable, given Portman's and Paulson's stellar reputations among Members.

While one House Democratic Member noted that, with Portman, "there's distrust of what he'd like to do and what he can do," the Member said that if the president is serious about repairing bipartisan relations after six years of raw partisan warfare, "he has the right ambassadors" to Congress.

House Budget ranking member Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) agreed, saying, "The president couldn't have a better team to sell his budget."

Portman and Paulson got high marks from both New Democrats and Blue Dog Democrats who met with the duo over the past month and were encouraged by the pair's message of bipartisanship.

"It wasn't budget specific," said Rep. Melissa Bean (Ill.), a member of both centrist-to-conservative Democratic groups. "It was about reaching common ground."

Bean added that she believes the president "is very sincere about wanting to rein in spending and move to a balanced budget."

DOJ_NMG_0128485

Davis, who also attended a Portman-Paulson briefing, declared the president's budget "dead on arrival" in one breath, but in the next breath, he held out the possibility of working with Portman on "elements that will have room for compromise."

Portman said Friday that his goal in meeting with both Democrats and Republicans was to try to head off the partisan posturing that traditionally surrounds budget debates and to get Congress to concentrate on the substance of the policy differences.

Portman said he approached it that way "so we won't be poisoning the well for discussion about how to come together on both the short-term budget but also the long-term fiscal realities."

And in his budget press conference Monday, Portman outlined several ways in which the White House and the OMB tried to address the concerns of Congress in their budget.

For example, he said, "We heard loud and clear from Congress that they were seeking more detail" on the Iraq War costs, and so, for the first time since the war began in 2003, the White House included nearly $300 billion in war funding projections through 2009.

In fact, Conrad interrupted his litany of complaints about the president's budget Monday to praise the OMB's inclusion of Iraq War costs.

"They are at least moving toward transparency," he said, crediting Portman for the change.

Pressed for more ways in which the White House sought to make peace offerings to Congress, Portman said the administration gave up on a $1 billion-a-year transportation security user fee and included a 1 percent increase in non-security discretionary funding, rather than the traditional freeze proposed by the president.

"We have tried to be responsive to appropriators who have said this is not a realistic budget," Portman said.

Plus, Portman tacitly acknowledged, perhaps unwittingly, that the Bush administration often has approached Congress with take-it-or-leave-it proposals.

"By saying, 'There are no preconditions, and we should all come to the table and talk,' that was a change in position," Portman said. But when asked whether Bush actually set a precondition by saying that he would not accept any tax increases as part of balancing the budget, Portman said that was merely Bush's starting position — as unwavering as it may be.

"What the president and the vice president are saying, they are just reiterating the position we have had in terms of policy for some time," Portman explained on Friday. "What's new is the commitment of the administration to discuss all ideas."

But if the initial reviews of the president's budget hold, Portman — and Bush — are going to have to entertain a lot more Democratic ideas than they're used to, given that even the economic assumptions on which the White House based its budget have come under attack.

"You need to look at the underlying assumptions very carefully before you buy into the end result" of a balanced budget by 2012, said House Budget Chairman John Spratt (D-S.C.). "It's a very improbable assumption to say the least."

And while Portman emphasized Friday the need to "establish a procedure by which we can work through our differences," his message hasn't been completely embraced yet.

"The president's budget is filled with debt and deception," Conrad declared on Monday. "It is disconnected from reality."

Bush Budget Sets Stage For Clashes With Congress (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Faced for the first time with a Democratic majority in Congress, President Bush put a little of everything in his 2008 budget: high spending, assumptions that the government will collect still-higher revenues, and the promise of a modest surplus in five years, even if his tax cuts remain intact.

But no amount of optimism is expected to head off what is likely to be a continuing series of conflicts in coming months between the White House and lawmakers on priorities ranging from urban housing to farm subsidies and defense spending to investments in child health care and education.

Democrats share the president's goal of erasing the federal budget deficit by 2012, but would take a very different path. The two biggest flash points between the White House and Congress are taxes and the war in Iraq. Conflict over these two issues alone could derail Mr. Bush's promise of a modest surplus in five years -- the first since 2001.

In his $2.9 trillion budget, Mr. Bush wants to first protect his signature tax cuts and extend them beyond their scheduled 2010 expiration. Democrats want to scale back some of the reductions that apply to capital gains and the wealthy. Beyond that disagreement, the two sides are split over the alternative minimum tax, originally aimed only at the wealthiest Americans, but which is increasingly reaching into the middle class.

At this stage, the president has committed himself to doing little beyond next year. That's a major concern for Democrats, who have vowed to do what it takes to keep the AMT from hitting tens of millions of additional families.

Stirring Emotion

The second flash point, Iraq, is stirring even more emotion now than the Cold War debate did in the 1980s, when Republicans joined Democrats in trimming President Reagan's defense buildup to pay for domestic spending. The size of Mr. Bush's budget request for defense -- $716.5 billion in new spending over the next 20 months -- is "staggering," said House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (D., Mo.), a strong ally of the military.

One reason for the big defense budget is that the president, for the first time since the 2003 invasion of Iraq, is submitting a spending blueprint that spells out upfront defense costs. But beyond Sept. 30, 2008, Mr. Bush's budget reverts to past practice and allocates only $50 billion for Iraq, or less than half what the annual cost of the war has been so far.

The White House says that's because the war's cost can't be accurately predicted any further into the future. Still, the projected cost for the next year of the war alone will spark competition between defense spending and Democrats' desires to fund their priorities, particularly education and health.

For example, while the Defense Department budget would grow by $49 billion under the president's plan for next year, the Education Department's budget would be cut by $1.5 billion from the joint funding resolution that passed the Democratic-controlled House only last week.

Rob Portman, Mr. Bush's budget director, has sought to ease some of the conflicts. The administration is no longer pressing for a fee on airlines to pay for security screeners. In the case of Medicare, proposed cuts at the expense of oxygen services for the elderly set off a big fight in Congress last year; this time around, Mr. Portman and the administration have sought to find a formula to defuse some of the tension.

Mr. Portman told reporters he was comfortable with what he described as an overall 1% increase in domestic spending, saying, "It's adequate to fund the nation's priorities." But in a sign of the political challenges ahead, Mr. Portman overstated even this modest increase. Democrats have already begun revising spending for 2007, and in some cases the spending increases cited in Mr. Bush's budget turn out to be reductions from those levels.

Mr. Bush's refusal to reconsider his tax policy makes it harder to reach the compromises needed on entitlement programs such as Medicare and Medicaid, which are closely identified with Democrats. This tension is likely to have a ripple effect, shaping the broader budget debate this year.

The most likely route to real progress toward a compromise would be passage of a major deficit-reduction package. But unless the administration is more willing to include taxes in the same package, Democrats would be reluctant to tackle an issue as tough as Medicare. Instead of one battle, Congress faces a series of skirmishes as bills come to the floor, and much will depend on new "pay go" rules that require lawmakers to offset any new spending with new revenues or savings.

Early Test Fight

An early test fight will come over the planned reauthorization of a popular program designed to help states extend insurance coverage to low-income children. The so-called State Children's Health Insurance Program, established 10 years ago for children who don't qualify for Medicaid, would get another $5 billion over the next five years under the Bush administration budget. But advocates in Congress believe $12 billion to $15 billion is needed, and some Democrats would like to see the figure go even higher to extend the program's coverage.

Education is going to be similarly sensitive. Mr. Bush's "No Child Left Behind" reforms are coming up for reauthorization in Congress, and Democrats have long complained that more money must be provided to help local public schools meet the standards set under the law. Toward this end, the administration proposes to provide more funding for low-income public schools, targeted to high schools, and math and reading programs also would receive more money. But a total of $2.3 billion in other education programs would be terminated, setting up conflicts with lawmakers that will make it harder to reach agreement.

Agriculture spending will be another source of conflict. As part of the farm-bill debate this year, the administration is seeking greater investments in renewable fuel, but farm-state lawmakers complain that the budget doesn't provide adequate resources. Senate Agriculture Committee Chairman Tom Harkin (D., Iowa) said yesterday that while the administration's farm plan has "solid suggestions," the budget figures "would deny the necessary funding to reach critical objectives in energy, conservation and rural-economic-development initiatives." The proposed budget also cuts $360 million in 2008 from two conservation programs that have been a priority for the chairman.

Even the budget's basic assumptions about spending and tax revenues will spark debate.

In many respects, Mr. Bush's budget has been overtaken by events, including the House's passage last week of a resolution that includes increases in domestic spending for the last eight months of fiscal 2007.

The Association of American Universities complained that the new budget for the National Institutes of Health proved to be a $500 million cut from an NIH funding resolution for this year. In the case of veterans' medical care, funding does go up in the Bush budget, but the increase is about $1 billion less than the administration boasted in the accompanying explanatory documents.

DOJ_NMG_0128487

In the case of revenues, the administration predicts annual government receipts will grow by 30% to reach $3.3 trillion in the crucial year of 2012. That's more than $150 billion higher than what the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office estimates that same year.

Under Pressure

Democratic critics say the administration is using overly rosy estimates of how many more tax dollars a growing economy will generate for Washington. Still, Democrats themselves are tempted to use the same kinds of numbers, because they too are under pressure to show they can craft a balanced budget. House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt (D., S.C.) admitted that to get an "apples and apples" comparison with the president's numbers, Congress may take a second look at the White House estimates.

"Humpty Dumpty can get to balance by 2012 with these numbers. The real problem is 2015 and later," said Sen. Judd Gregg (R., N.H.), the former Senate Budget Committee chairman.

Bottom Line For Bush's '08 Budget: Contention (LAT)

By Joel Havemann And Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — The $2.9-trillion budget President Bush unveiled Monday highlighted major policy differences with the Democrats in control of Capitol Hill and set the stage for vigorous battles over healthcare, war costs and deficit reduction in the last two years of his presidency.

Although presidents' budgets have always been largely a theoretical exercise — the Constitution gives Congress the job of passing spending bills — they help set the terms of Washington's heated budget debates. The heat flared up immediately Monday as Republicans lined up squarely behind Bush's budget for fiscal 2008, while Democrats castigated it as both heartless and fiscally irresponsible.

The sharp divide seemed to shatter the spirit of bipartisanship that both parties had cultivated since the Democrats captured control of Congress in November's elections.

Democrats complained that they saw no evidence of declining war costs, and they railed against Bush's single biggest spending constraint: holding down the growth of Medicare.

"This budget represents more of the same wrong priorities: placing a higher priority on huge tax cuts for multimillionaires than on urgent national needs," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco). "Democrats are prepared to work with Republicans to make the tough choices that will return our budgets to fiscal responsibility, but today's budget from the president is simply not the right approach."

The coming face-off over outlays for the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan, social programs and tax cuts will offer a preview to the debates likely to dominate the 2008 elections.

Bush, in his written budget message to Congress, challenged lawmakers to balance the budget by 2012, as his plan would, without raising taxes.

"My formula for a balanced budget," he said, "reflects the priorities of our country at this moment in its history: protecting the homeland and fighting terrorism, keeping the economy strong with low taxes and keeping spending under control while making federal programs more effective."

Bush's plan to balance the budget in five years echoed the plan advanced last year by congressional Democrats during Congress' attempt to write its own budget for 2007. The Democrats' plan died when Congress was unable to agree on either party's budget.

Bush proposed that the government spend $2.9 trillion next year — that's $5.5 million a minute — on revenues of $2.7 trillion.

Revenues would overtake spending five years from now, according to Bush's calculations, with spending of $3.2 trillion and revenue of $3.3 trillion.

The president's plan would balance the budget mostly through spending cuts rather than tax increases.

"Balancing the budget by raising taxes would put our economy at risk," Rob Portman, director of the White House Office of Management and Budget, told reporters.

Bush's across-the-board tax cuts, enacted in 2001 and 2003 to expire at the end of 2010, would be made permanent. The expiration date had been a way to reduce the theoretical price tag.

The alternative minimum tax, designed four decades ago to prevent the very wealthy from sheltering most of their income from taxes, would be repealed before inflation could drive more middle-class and upper-middle-class taxpayers into its clutches. The revenue loss would be offset after next year by unspecified increases elsewhere in the tax code.

DOJ_NMG_0128488

"We want to work with Congress to reform the [alternative minimum tax] because we believe it is a misguided tax policy," Portman said.

The president's proposals also include stepped-up tax enforcement, acceding to complaints that nearly $300 billion in revenue is not collected each year.

Treasury officials suggested in a briefing Monday several ways to improve tax collection, including increasing the enforcement budget for the Internal Revenue Service and passing new provisions to help the government keep tabs on taxpayers' income. One proposal, they said, would make it easier to calculate capital gains taxes for stock transactions: Investment houses would have to report how much money a stockholder originally paid for a stock, not just how much he received when he sold it. The provision would take effect for stocks purchased after 2008, the officials said.

On the spending side, the administration proposed defense outlays of historic proportions, asking for more than $623 billion for the Pentagon in the budget for the 2008 fiscal year, which runs from October 2007 to the end of September 2008. And for the first time since fighting in Afghanistan and Iraq began, the administration's request included an estimate for the cost of the wars, which totaled $142 billion on top of the Defense Department's normal budget of $481 billion.

In addition, the Pentagon asked for $93 billion in war funding this year, which would bring the total war costs for 2007 to more than $163 billion. If both requests were approved, the cumulative cost of both wars would top $687 billion, according to the Pentagon's budget documents — more than the entire cost of the Vietnam War, even adjusted for inflation.In healthcare, Bush proposed his deepest cuts yet in one of the biggest and most politically popular federal entitlement programs: Medicare. The reductions would total $66 billion over five years, which when combined with a proposed $10 billion in administrative savings would slow the growth in Medicare spending.

The president also proposed a $5-billion increase for a federal-state program to provide health coverage for uninsured children. Democrats say the program needs an increase of $15 billion to maintain coverage at current levels.

In energy, Bush proposed to boost spending on basic science research by $4.4 billion, seeking energy-saving technology breakthroughs to improve economic competitiveness. In addition, he asked for $148 million for solar power research; $179 million for development of ethanol from corn, wood chips and switch grass; $81 million for "plug-in" hybrid vehicle technology; and $309 million to support development of hydrogen fuel vehicles.

In education, the administration proposed deep cuts in federal subsidies for student loans, an idea that sent the stock price of Sallie Mae, the largest lender, plummeting. The president also suggested eliminating two loan programs: the Perkins Loan and the Supplemental Education Opportunity Grant. The savings would be used to increase the budget for Pell Grants.

Under the president's scenario, the deficit would remain virtually unchanged next year at $239 billion, then decline every year until 2012, when it would record a small surplus.

But that surplus develops only because the administration does not include the budgetary effects of waging the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan, nor of shielding middle-income taxpayers from the alternative minimum tax.

Both Democrats and nonpartisan experts said the president's budget policies were unlikely to result in a surplus in 2012 or anytime in the foreseeable future.

"The president's budget is filled with debt and deception, disconnected from reality, and continues to move America in the wrong direction," said Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), chairman of the Senate Budget Committee. "This administration has the worst fiscal record in history, and this budget does nothing to change that."

Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, which lobbies for budget austerity, said: "A lot of things would have to come out just right" for the budget to balance. U.S. troops would have to withdraw quickly from both Iraq and Afghanistan, he said, and Bush and Congress would have to agree on a "miracle" source of revenue to replace the alternative minimum tax, which Bush proposes to eliminate.

"He also has to hope there are no more emergencies," Bixby added. "Forget about 9/11; there can't even be any more Hurricane Katrinas."

Bush also relied on no growth, even accounting for inflation, in outlays for the vast range of government programs whose spending levels are set not by benefit formulas, like Social Security and Medicare, but by annual appropriations bills. For 2008, Bush spelled out how much he would allot to each program, but for the subsequent four years he merely promised austerity without spelling out how he would achieve it.

With defense and benefit programs growing fast, it is the so-called domestic discretionary part of the budget that has absorbed most of Washington's budget discipline. A number of lawmakers think Congress has cut education, environmental and other spending in this category just about as far as it can.

House Budget Committee Chairman John M. Spratt Jr. (D-S.C.) said, "While the president has endorsed the goal of balancing the budget, under realistic assumptions his budget remains in deficit every year."

Democratic Budget Chairs Blast Bush Plan (MCT)

By James Rosen

McClatchy Newspapers, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - The new Democratic chairmen of the congressional budget committees assailed President Bush's spending plan Monday as a fiscal ruse that's based on inflated government revenue projections and understated future war costs.

Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., and Rep. John Spratt, D-S.C., gave caustic reviews to Bush's 2008 fiscal year budget, the first of the annual fiscal proposals he has submitted to a Democratic-controlled Congress.

"I would characterize this proposal as filled with debt and deception," Conrad said. "It's disconnected from reality. And it continues to move America in the wrong direction."

Spratt accused Bush of using budgetary sleight of hand to buttress his claim that the federal deficit - projected at $172 billion this year by the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) - would disappear by 2012 under his plan.

Among the most costly false assumptions alleged by Spratt:

-U.S. annual costs in Iraq and Afghanistan will fall to $50 billion, less than a third of current outlays, by 2009, with no subsequent expenses.

-The optimistic revenue forecasts clash with CBO projections and conceal $155 billion in future costs.

"If you look at the economic criteria on which their forecasts are based, what you'll see is in every case at the margins they're pushing for a little bit better, more favorable underlying circumstances," Spratt said.

Rob Portman, Bush's budget director, denied that the spending plan is built on overly optimistic projections of future government revenues or other unrealistic assumptions.

"It's a credible and more transparent budget," Portman said. "Instead of painting a rosy scenario on revenues to get to balance, we take a cautious approach."

White House press secretary Tony Fratto said, "We have a pretty high degree of confidence that we'll be able to get to balance by 2012."

Spratt, though, said Bush's budget understates future costs by easing the burden of the alternative minimum tax for only the 6 million Americans who now pay it. Providing relief for the 39 million people or families projected to be paying it by 2012, the final year of the president's five-year plan, would cost far more, Spratt said.

Congress created the alternative minimum tax to capture revenue mainly from high-income filers, but more and more people slide into the tax each year because it isn't indexed for inflation, unlike the standard IRS tax tables. Lawmakers from both parties say the alternative minimum tax must target fewer people.

Conrad and Spratt gave Bush credit for providing more detail of current and future costs for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, but they said that the White House figures still come up short.

Spratt said the $145 billion that Bush allocated for the wars next year will likely grow with a supplemental spending request. Even if the number of U.S. troops falls, Spratt said the 2009 cost will likely exceed $50 billion.

Portman admitted that the $50 billion figure in 2009 fiscal year war costs was little more than a guess.

"We have no idea what those costs will be," he said.

Spratt and Conrad said Bush raided important programs in education, health care and the environment in order to pay for almost $2 trillion in tax cuts.

Bush has joined congressional leaders from both parties in calling for a balanced budget by 2012, but there's little agreement on how to achieve it. Analysts say the Democrats now in charge of Congress will face tough choices if they try to balance the budget in their own spending plans.

Conrad and Spratt deflected questions from reporters asking whether Democrats would consider raising taxes in order to help balance the budget. They said Congress will develop its spending proposal in the coming weeks.

"We're here today to discuss the president's budget submission," Conrad said.

In many ways, the emerging budget debate echoes the debate over spending priorities of the 1990s, only then Democratic President Bill Clinton tussled with House Speaker Newt Gingrich and the GOP-led Congress.

Conrad repeated some of Clinton's main themes, accusing Bush of providing tax cuts for millionaires while trying to trim programs ranging from community cops to heating funds for low-income people.

Like Clinton a decade earlier, Conrad and Spratt said Bush wants to cut Medicare; his budget contains continued increases, but it slows Medicare's rate of growth - from the current rate of 7.4 percent to 6.7 percent over the next 10 years, according to Portman.

Addressing Wealth Gap (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

In a speech last week, President Bush said: "The fact is that income inequality is real; it's been rising for more than 25 years."

In his new budget yesterday, Mr. Bush proposed some modest ways to restrain the wealth gap, particularly by offering new tax breaks to help the uninsured buy health insurance, but did little to fundamentally strengthen existing government efforts to alter the distribution of income. Included in his budget also was a proposal to extend his 2001 and 2003 tax cuts, which Democrats say benefit the rich over everyone else.

Chief among Mr. Bush's plans that would, over time, tend to reduce inequality are his proposals to create a tax deduction for health insurance that would help lower- and middle-class families who don't receive insurance through their jobs, to spend more on grants to low-income college students and to create $3,000 personal accounts that workers may use for education and training, a proposal he has made before. The president also proposed cutting grants for dislocated workers to get training and limiting eligibility for a state-federal health-insurance program for low-income children.

Democrats attacked the budget, saying Mr. Bush was putting the needs of the wealthy above everyone else. "Its priorities are disconnected from the needs of middle-class Americans," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said in a statement. "His budget hands out favors for the oil and gas industry, while eroding health coverage for children and seniors."

While the economy has expanded nearly 15%, after inflation, since the last recession ended in 2001, many Americans haven't seen their paychecks increase fast enough to keep up with rising prices. Incomes at the top keep rising, with the top 20% of households claiming 50.4% of all the income in 2005 -- up from 46.6% in 1990 -- but median household income remains below its 1999 peak, adjusted for inflation.

Rather than using the tax code to redistribute income more than it does already, Mr. Bush's budget looks to address inequality largely by helping people afford health insurance and providing more money for education, including increased Pell grants for college.

The White House said the president, while seeking to restrain overall spending, identified "three key issues that are on the minds of many Americans" as budget priorities -- "the quality and cost of their children's education, access to affordable health care, and our nation's dependence on foreign sources of energy from unstable parts of the world."

The president's health plan would for the first time make employer-provided health insurance taxable but provide a standard tax deduction of as much as $15,000 for families who get insurance. Administration officials predict that the plan would help to restrain health costs and, ultimately, raise wages. The Treasury says the proposal would "make the tax system more progressive, with the benefits concentrated on low- and middle-income Americans" -- those with incomes below $87,750 a year.

Several of Mr. Bush's economic advisers have argued that the best response to widening income disparities, particularly the widening gap between those with education and those without, would be to improve K-12 education and encourage more Americans to go to college. The president "felt that the way to deal with this was to make sure that everybody had the opportunity to invest in the kinds of skills necessary to advance in this economy," the chairman of his Council of Economic Advisers, Edward Lazear, said in a C-SPAN interview.

To that end, Mr. Bush proposed increasing Pell grants -- which provide needy students with money that doesn't have to be repaid -- to $4,600 in the 2008-2009 academic year from the current $4,050, and to $5,400 in 2012-2013 and boosting funding for the No Child Left Behind education law, Mr. Bush's school-improvement program.

Critics say the budget would exacerbate inequality by weakening programs that many middle- and low-income families rely on, such as 'energy assistance, child health care and job training.

"Rather than lean against this trend toward increased inequality, the budget would aggressively accelerate the trend," said Robert Greenstein, executive director of the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. While he said some of the president's proposals, like the Pell grant increase, would be modestly helpful, "those proposals are dramatically outweighed by the others in the budget."

For the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which helps states to cover low-income children, Mr. Bush proposes an increase of about $5 billion over five years, much lower than advocates say is needed to keep the current enrollees in the program. The budget also calls for limiting the eligibility to 200% of the federal poverty level, or $41,300 for a family of four for 2007. At least 17 states have expanded the eligibility, to as much as 350% of the poverty level.

The proposal contrasts with the idea of covering all children, which is favored by many Democrats and several governors. Mike Leavitt, Secretary of Health and Human Services, says that while the S-Chip program was intended to cover children in the poorest families, some states have expanded it to cover children from higher-income families and even adults.

The president's budget proposes cutting two Labor Department programs aimed at helping individuals who have lost their jobs, including a 17% cut to adult employment and training and a 14% cut for dislocated worker and employment training. Those cuts would be offset with funding for "career advancement accounts," which would provide $3,000 to individuals to be used toward school or training.

Another program aimed at retraining workers whose jobs are eliminated because of global trade would see flat funding, while cash benefits provided as part of Trade Adjustment Assistance -- which provides displaced workers with unemployment benefits, retraining and education -- would increase about 8% to $606 million.

As in years past, several social-welfare programs are slated for cuts, including a 30% cut to social service block grants, which are used by states to provide child care, child welfare and a variety of other services to vulnerable families. The budget also proposes to eliminate funding for community services block grants, down from $630 million. When President Bush has proposed similar cuts in the past, Congress hasn't accepted them.

Rep. Brad Miller, a North Carolina Democrat who campaigned heavily on the issue of income inequality, said the budget "doesn't appear to be any great shakes for the middle class." He said Democrats would undoubtedly press ahead with their own plans to help address the wage gap, including more money for education and job training.

$623B Marked For Pentagon Spending (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush's defense budget reflects the toll of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, proposing money to increase the size of the Army and Marine Corps and replace war-damaged weapons and equipment.

The budget also proposes buying new weapons and spending $141 billion to continue fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan next year. Bush's budget brings Pentagon spending to $623 billion for 2008. It also includes a supplemental request for $99 billion to pay for fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan and other costs of the war on terror for the rest of this year.

"The sums involved in the defense budget requests are staggering," House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton, D-Mo., said. "We cannot provide an adequate national defense on the cheap, but neither can we afford to simply ratify the president's request without performing the due diligence and oversight our Constitution requires."

Steven Kosiak, a defense analyst with the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, said the increases, accounting for inflation, would bring Pentagon spending to its highest level since 1946. Much of the increase can be traced not to the wars, he said, but to modernization efforts.

"This is an enormous amount of money for defense," Kosiak said. "We're back to spending levels that are slightly higher than the heyday of defense spending in the 1980s."

Highlights of the Pentagon budget proposal for 2008:

·Adding 7,000 soldiers to the Army and 5,000 new Marines. The president's goal is to add 65,000 soldiers to the Army by 2012 for a total of 547,000. The Marine Corps would grow by 27,000 Marines by 2011 for a total of 202,000. That would cost $12.1 billion in 2008, Pentagon comptroller Tina Jonas said.

·Spending $27 billion for new warplanes, including 20 F-22A Raptor fighter jets, 24 F/A-18 Hornet fighters, and 28 Predator unmanned aircraft. That represents an 18% increase compared with 2007.

·Spending $14.4 billion on new ships, an increase of $3.2 billion compared with 2007, or 29%. It would include funds for an aircraft carrier, a submarine and three fast, shallow-draft ships.

Bush's proposal also includes emergency spending to pay for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and other war on terrorism costs. His request of $99 billion for the rest of this year comes on top of $70 billion approved by the last Congress.

Here's how that money would be spent:

·$13.9 billion would be used to replace worn out or destroyed equipment, including helicopters and jets.

"This is repairing, replacing and upgrading combat losses or equipment that's experienced wear and tear in the theater," Jonas said.

·$39 billion for supplies, support and maintenance.

·$8 billion for better armor for troops and their vehicles and $2.4 billion to counter homemade bombs or improvised explosive devices.

Overall, the proposal calls for $4.3 billion for efforts against improvised explosive devices in 2007 through regular and supplemental funding. In 2008, it calls for $4 billion more.

·$5.9 billion to train and equip Afghan forces, and another $3.8 billion for Iraqi troops. The money would support training and equipment for 362,000 Iraqi security forces and 152,000 in Afghanistan.

"This initiative is, I think, key to the strategy in Iraq and Afghanistan," said Vice Adm. Steve Stanley, the Pentagon's director of force structure, resources and assessment.

Defense Spending Is Set For Sharp Rise (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe And Jonathan Karp

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

President Bush is asking for almost $625 billion in defense spending in 2008, a big increase but one that may not be enough to cover the rapidly increasing costs of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, additional personnel and the military's appetite for new weapons systems.

In a boon to defense contractors, weapons spending is set to rise even faster than the overall Pentagon budget. The administration is requesting $101.7 billion for new weapons purchases, a $20 billion increase over 2007. Including research and development, total weapons spending is set to grow to $176.8 billion, and just about every major weapons system is set to get more funding than in the current fiscal year.

Rep. Ike Skelton, the Missouri Democrat who chairs the House Armed Services Committee, suggested the Democratic-led Congress may move to pare back the defense budget. "We cannot provide an adequate national defense on the cheap, but neither can we afford to simply ratify the president's request without performing the due diligence and oversight our Constitution requires," Rep. Skelton said.

Excluding war costs, the White House is submitting an annual Pentagon budget of $481.4 billion, up 11% from enacted 2007 defense spending. But even if President Bush gets all the money he is asking for in the current budget, his plan to increase defense spending still leaves some big questions unanswered.

Some defense analysts say the Pentagon hasn't set aside enough money to pay for the 92,000 soldiers and Marines President Bush plans to add. To cover shortfalls in these personnel accounts, the military might have to raid its weapons modernization accounts. President Bush's budget also doesn't make any cuts to big weapons programs, such as fighter jets, ships or space programs, which are scheduled to grow even more expensive in the coming years as they hit full production. These surging costs could force Mr. Bush or his successor to make some hard decisions about how much new hardware the country can afford.

In addition to the annual Pentagon budget, Mr. Bush is requesting a further $93.4 billion to cover the costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan in 2007, bringing the total so-called emergency spending this year to $163.4 billion. For 2008, the president is seeking $141.7 billion for war expenses in a request that assumes his decision to send an additional 20,000 troops to Baghdad will have significantly reined in the sectarian bloodletting and disorder by the beginning of 2008 and that overall war spending will fall as these troops begin to come home. "This is our best judgment at this time," said Tina Jonas, the Pentagon's budget chief. She called the troop surge into Baghdad and restive al Anbar province a "near term initiative."

In virtually every other area of defense spending, ranging from personnel to weapons modernization, the Pentagon is projecting costs will continue to grow over the coming years. President Bush announced recently that he plans to add about 92,000 Marines and soldiers to the current force at a rate of about 12,000 troops a year. To that end, the White House has asked for about $12 billion to cover the costs of the new people as part of $137 billion in personnel spending.

But some defense analysts have suggested the real personnel costs could be more. The Bush administration will ask Congress to force military retirees to pay a greater share of their overall health-care costs. If that request is rejected -- as it was last year -- the Bush administration would have to find about $16 billion to cover the additional personnel costs over the next five years, says Cindy Williams, a defense analyst at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Boston.

If the military continues to struggle to recruit new soldiers and Marines, the Bush administration could be forced to find more money for recruiting bonuses, pay increases or to increase the number of recruiters on the street. "Recruiting has been a big struggle and it is reasonable to think that it might require even more resources," Ms. Williams said.

The big increase in weapons and war spending suggests the administration is banking on continued economic strength to absorb the rising costs.

Each of the services' main weapons programs are to get increased funding in 2008, but the increase masks some longer-term cutbacks. For instance, the Army's ground-forces modernization program, a Boeing Co.-led program called Future Combat Systems, is to get $3.7 billion in 2008, up from $3.4 billion this year, but the program has been pared to 14 manned and robotic vehicles, down from 18, and the program lost $3 billion, or 10% of expected funding, between 2008 and 2012. The request for F-35 Joint Strike Fighter Aircraft, a Lockheed Martin Corp. fighter jet for the Air Force, Navy and Marines, jumps to $6.1 billion in 2008 from $5 billion this year. But ambivalent about the new stealth fighter, the Navy plans to scale back purchases of the plane over the five following years. Lockheed's F-22 fighter for the Air Force, which entered service last year, is slated to get $4.6 billion, up from $4 billion in 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0128493

Missile defense, President Bush's top strategic priority, is slated to receive $8.9 billion, or $500 million less next year than in 2007. Still, the administration's plan to buy more interceptor missiles for the Boeing-led program could face resistance from congressional Democrats. Michigan Sen. Carl Levin, chairman of the Senate Armed Forces Committee, has questioned the value of buying additional missiles until the shield's effectiveness is proven.

The administration's budget would take weapons funding to the highest level since the 1980s buildup under Ronald Reagan, said Steven Kosiak of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, an independent Washington think tank. He noted that the latest Pentagon plans call for another budget increase in 2009 before spending tapers back to 2008 levels in four years.

"One has to question the affordability of all this over time," he said. "There is still a significant mismatch between the Pentagon's long-term plans and the funding levels."

Bush's Defense Budget Biggest Since Reagan Era (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

President Bush's defense budget request of $481.4 billion -- an 11 percent boost over last year -- pushes U.S. defense spending to levels not seen since the Reagan-era buildup of the 1980s.

In addition, the president is seeking a projected $141.7 billion in emergency supplemental funding for 2008 for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and for broader anti-terrorism efforts -- bringing the total spent in those arenas since 2001 to $661 billion, eclipsing in real terms the cost of the Vietnam War.

Congressional Democrats and Republicans welcomed the fact that for the first time the administration had submitted its supplemental war funding requests at the same time as its defense budget, thus offering a clearer look at overall defense spending.

"This will help Congress and the American people gain a more realistic picture of the budget impact of the war in Iraq, the war in Afghanistan, and the broader war on terrorism," said Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

Pentagon officials noted that the 2008 supplemental request does not include additional funding for Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. The most recent 2007 supplemental request of $93 billion includes $5.6 billion to add five Army brigades and 4,000 Marines to the force in Iraq.

Undersecretary of Defense Tina W. Jonas called the troop increase "a near-term initiative," echoing recent suggestions by Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates that the increase is anticipated to last only several months.

Defense analysts have long argued that the war spending should be viewed in conjunction with the regular defense budget.

"We can't make heads or tails of the defense budget without understanding global war on terrorism funding," said Steven M. Kosiak, director of budget studies at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments (CSBA), a defense think tank. He said that because wartime supplemental budgets receive less scrutiny, there was an incentive for the military services to shift costs for modernization programs into those budgets.

The latest 2007 supplemental request, for example, includes $400 million for two of the Pentagon's most modern aircraft, the Joint Strike Fighter, to replace F-16 fighter jets that were lost in combat. "When in doubt, it's a war cost," Kosiak said.

Pentagon officials stressed that the 2008 supplemental request is likely to change depending on the progress of the wars.

"We know that it will be wrong," Jonas said at the briefing. She said the 2008 war spending request assumes pre-"surge" U.S. troop levels of 140,000 in Iraq and 20,000 in Afghanistan. "Conditions will change and we'll have to adjust," she said.

One of the biggest areas in which such an adjustment is likely is in funding to replace and repair equipment. So far the administration has asked for $37.5 billion for reconstituting equipment in 2007 and yesterday projected an additional $37.6 billion for 2008.

Army officials said yesterday that the addition of five Army brigades in Iraq probably would lead to additional equipment repair costs beyond the $13.6 billion the Army has budgeted for 2008. "That was based on an assumption of 15 brigades in combat. Now we're up to 20," said Lt. Gen. David Melcher, director of Army programs.

Reflecting another major cost of the Iraq and Afghanistan wars, the latest 2007 supplemental funding includes an additional $2.4 billion for the Pentagon organization tasked with combating roadside bombs, with an additional $4 billion projected for 2008.

The defense budget increases the proportion of overall defense spending that would go to the Army (from 25.4 percent to 27 percent), and the Marine Corps (from 3.7 percent to 4.3 percent), while lowering that for the Navy (25.5 to 24.8 percent) and

Air Force (from 29.7 percent to 28.2 percent). The shift reflects the preponderant role of ground forces in today's wars but could also foreshadow intensified rivalry between the services, defense experts said.

"You're going to see a period of new intra-service rivalry," said Robert Work, a senior defense analyst at CSBA.

Part of the growth in the Army's and Marine Corps' budgets includes $12 billion toward an increase in those branches of 92,000 troops over the next five years. The 2007 supplemental also includes $3.6 billion to speed up the creation of two Army brigades and one Marine regimental combat team -- aimed at reducing stress on active-duty soldiers and Marines who now spend as much time in combat as at home.

Bush Budget Gives Boost To Defense (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

The Bush administration budget released yesterday provides $623 billion for defense in 2008, an increase of 4 percent from the current year and the largest sum in inflation-adjusted dollars since 1946 after the end of World War II.

Including national security programs of other agencies, such as the Departments of State and Energy, the United States would spend more on security next year than the rest of the world combined.

"Our priority is to protect the American people, and our priority is to make sure our troops have what it takes to do their jobs," Mr. Bush said after a Cabinet meeting.

The budget for fiscal 2008, which begins Oct. 1, provides $142 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, marking the first time Mr. Bush has estimated the cost of the two conflicts in advance. Congress also will be asked for an additional $93 billion in the current year.

Other Pentagon operations would be funded at $481 billion in the budget, which allocates $37 billion for the State Department and its foreign-aid programs.

According to the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute, total world defense spending amounts to about $1 trillion. The Defense Intelligence Agency, the Pentagon's intelligence arm, estimates that China comes in second after the United States by spending up to $100 billion annually. Russia is third at about $50 billion, followed by France, Japan, Britain, Germany and Italy.

The budget estimates spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan at substantially less than the $170 billion being spent this year. It provides $50 billion for fiscal 2009 and nothing after that, but the White House insisted that the numbers do not indicate troop reductions.

"There will be no timetable set, and the reason why is because we don't want to send mixed signals to an enemy, or to a struggling democracy, or to our troops," Mr. Bush said.

Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman, said the budget numbers are not final and that it was "very, very difficult to project costs in future years."

The Pentagon's budget proposes a 3 percent pay increase for military members. Since 2001, military salaries have jumped by 32 percent. The proposal adds $4 billion to continue reducing the threat to troops in Iraq and Afghanistan from roadside bombs, which account for about 70 percent of U.S. battlefield casualties.

The Army, the military branch that bears the heaviest war burden, would receive the largest percentage increase in its budget: more than 20 percent to $130 billion. The Air Force, the Navy and the Marine Corps would get increases of 8 percent, 9 percent and 4 percent, respectively.

The overall budget to purchase weapons would total $102 billion, up more than 20 percent from fiscal 2007.

Mr. Bush's request, which faces significant opposition in Congress, calls for a budget increase of about 12 percent for the State Department.

Randall Tobias, the department's director for foreign assistance, said Israel and Egypt will remain the top recipients of U.S. aid. They will be awarded $2.4 billion and $1.7 billion respectively, he said, slightly less than last year.

Other top aid recipients are Afghanistan ($1.67 billion), Pakistan ($785 million) and Sudan ($673 million). Aid for Kosovo, the Serbian province that is moving toward independence, would nearly double to $151 million, Mr. Tobias said.

The budget of the Millennium Challenge Corp., which awards assistance using business principles such as setting fiscal and other benchmarks for developing nations, would almost triple to $3 billion.

The request proposes further cuts in support of counternarcotics efforts in South America.

Bush's 2008 Budget Request Doubles Spending On Replacing Military Equipment (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128495

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5 — More than a quarter of the money the Bush administration is requesting in the 2008 fiscal year for military operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere would go toward repairing and replacing military equipment, according to budget figures released Monday by the Pentagon.

The scale of the request illustrates the toll that years of combat in Iraq and Afghanistan are taking on the military's vehicles, aircraft, weapons and other equipment. But some budget experts say its size also raises questions about whether the military is using the argument that troops fighting in the field need equipment in top condition to increase purchases of equipment generally.

The budget request, if approved by Congress, would allocate $37.6 billion for refurbishment, from a war budget of $141 billion in the fiscal year beginning on Oct. 1.

To meet war costs between now and then, the administration is asking Congress for an immediate $93 billion, in a supplemental budget request that would add to what Congress approved months ago. And of that, $14 billion is for replacing equipment, bringing this year's total refurbishment budget, as well, to $37.6 billion.

Last year only half that much was spent for replacing equipment used up or worn out in the fighting.

The requests come at a time when the Senate is embroiled in a divisive dispute over whether to pass a resolution disapproving President Bush's war strategy. At the heart of the debate is the question of whether the resolution should promise not to cut spending for fielded forces.

Steven M. Kosiak, a military budget expert at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, said the military appeared to taking advantage of the political support for paying for whatever the troops need to provide in the budget for other items.

The Air Force, Mr. Kosiak noted, would receive $400 million for two F-35s, ostensibly to replace planes that were lost in the war. But the F-35 is an advanced fighter that is still on the drawing board and will not even be delivered for three more years, as replacement for other, older aircraft.

"We're not trying to get back to where we were," Mr. Kosiak said, "we're trying to get back to where we would like to be."

The Pentagon comptroller, Tina W. Jonas, said that officials had rejected efforts by the military services to insert expensive new hardware into the budget for replacements and refurbishments; but she said that the F-35s qualified as replacements for three other, older fighters that the Air Force had lost in recent years.

"We used a pretty tight rule set to scrub these budgets," Ms. Jonas said, "and we did return to the services some of their ideas. We've got a pretty careful scrub." She added that "combat losses are fair game here, and so we included them."

But Defense Department officials concede that some weapons systems are also being modernized, to make them more useful in Iraq and Afghanistan. Budget documents say the Army's M1A1 Abrams tank would receive an unspecified "system enhancement program" to improve its performance against urban threats "such as Baghdad."

As it has in the past, the Pentagon's long-term budget shows the costs of the war declining in the years ahead; Congress more than likely will be asked to increase expenditures in future years unless the fighting eases up.

The total war budget of $163 billion, sought in the 2007 fiscal year, is projected to be $141 billion in 2008 and just $50 billion in 2009, far enough in the future that the estimate is little more than a place holder.

Ms. Jonas said that the 21,500-troop increase Mr. Bush recently ordered for Iraq was not financed beyond the end of the 2007 fiscal year, when it is assumed for the sake of making a forecast that American troop levels will drop back to 140,000. Military officials say that the duration of the reinforcements will depend on security conditions, but that they could well last into next year.

The administration's overall request for $481.4 billion for 2008 for Defense Department costs excluding military operations represents an increase of about 11 percent in spending. It reflects the beginnings of what could be a long, costly increase in the size of the military.

Mr. Bush said last month that he wanted to increase the Army by about 7,000 soldiers a year, until reaching 547,000 troops by 2012, and by 5,000 marines annually until achieving a force size of 202,000 by 2011. The budget also provides $12.1 billion for increases in the Army and Marine Corps in 2008, officials said.

Democrats Face Limits In Changing Bush's Budget (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5 — With its military spending increases, reductions in popular domestic programs and calls to extend tax cuts, President Bush's $2.9 trillion budget for 2008 drew fire from Democrats the minute it landed on Monday.

But while Democratic critics may wish to challenge the administration's blueprint, political and fiscal constraints will make it hard for them to assert their own priorities.

DOJ_NMG_0128496

In theory, the budget presents the Democrats their first real opportunity to rewrite the administration's policies, especially on tax cuts, that they have been attacking for six years.

But in practice, Democrats know that the only way they can find the revenue to restore the administration's proposed spending cuts would be to cut back on military spending, delay their stated intentions to balance the budget or rescind the Bush tax cuts in future years. They are not especially eager to do any of these.

The most likely result, even some Democrats acknowledge, will be a limited reshaping of the budget by restoring some proposed cuts in a variety of domestic programs, including children's health care, Head Start and home heating assistance for the poor and the elderly.

But few Democrats are expected to look for new revenues by calling for an end to Mr. Bush's tax cuts, instead of extending them as the president proposed Monday, or to deal with the looming costs of Social Security and Medicare as the postwar generation retires, all of which pose huge budget problems in future years.

"The long-term budget crisis appears so distant that it's going to be very hard to get politicians excited about it this year," said Robert D. Reischauer, president of the Urban Institute. "The economy is strong, and the deficit seems to be at manageable levels right now. No one wants to risk popular support by doing something courageous."

Since 2001, Democratic leaders have made a point of saying that the Bush tax cuts are unfairly weighted toward the wealthy and dangerous to American solvency. But the tax cuts expire in 2010, and Democrats acknowledge that they are not ready to move on them now.

One development could reopen the tax cuts to revision this year, Democrats say: a signal from the administration that it would be willing to consider a repeal of some cuts for the wealthiest as part of a deal to pay for other priorities.

The issues most often mentioned that might entice Democrats to the bargaining table with the administration would be a package to finance future Social Security benefits, possibly combined with a curb on some benefits. Democrats might also want to cut a deal over the alternative minimum tax, which was devised to make sure that wealthy taxpayers with numerous deductions paid some taxes but which is increasingly ensnaring the middle class because of inflation.

Democrats say that in both cases the administration would have to move first to put discussion of taxes on the table.

Both Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. and Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, have dropped hints of such deals, ruling out "preconditions" for talks on Social Security. The implication is that private investment accounts to replace Social Security for future retirees are not a requirement for a deal.

"By saying there are no preconditions and we should all come to the table, that was a change in position," Mr. Portman told reporters Monday, noting that in the past the administration had pushed its plan for the investment accounts from the outset.

He also said it was an "olive branch" to propose the accounts but to delay their enactment until 2012.

Democrats remain skeptical and distrustful. They note, for instance, a recent comment by Vice President Dick Cheney to Fox News that overtures by Mr. Paulson and Mr. Portman did not signal a change in administration attitudes on taxes, only a desire to get Democrats to negotiate.

Moreover, despite Mr. Portman's talk of olive branches, Democrats see only trapdoors. They say Mr. Bush's claim to reach the goal of balancing the budget by 2012 rested on what they see as shaky assumptions.

Mr. Portman acknowledged, for instance, that the budget assumed only a nominal cost — $50 billion — for the Iraq war in 2009 and no cost after that. In addition, the administration assumes that tax increases due to kick in years from now will do so, in spite of the near certainty that Congress will prevent them from occurring, widening the deficit further.

Another constraint on the Democrats is their adoption of a "pay as you go" approach, meaning that they have to find savings in other parts of the budget for any new spending they want to make.

The Democrats fear after campaigning on the promise of avoiding widening the budget deficit, they cannot afford to waver on that score now.

Still, not everyone in the party is a deficit hawk. Among the 2008 presidential candidates, former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina has already said that he would defer the goal of a balanced budget to finance health, education and help for the poor. Other Democrats, including several in the Senate, may well have to follow suit.

Last week, without much fanfare, House Democrats passed a stopgap spending bill for the current year that increased federal spending in cherished areas by only about 1 percent — exactly the rate of increase that the administration says it seeks in domestic programs for the coming year.

The box that the Democrats find themselves in is likely to remain a factor in their spending decisions this year.

Even Senator Kent Conrad, the North Dakota Democrat who is chairman of the Senate Budget Committee and the biggest Cassandra in Congress about the perils of continued deficits, seemed to acknowledge that he had had trouble convincing even fellow Democrats of the urgency of the long-term fiscal problems.

DOJ_NMG_0128497

"Let me be frank," Mr. Conrad said at a recent budget hearing. "We're having a very difficult time persuading our colleagues and the administration of the need for urgent action."

Although Mr. Bush traveled to a Democratic retreat over the weekend and promised to try to accomplish "big things" with their help in his last two years of office, Democrats and their supporters tend to view the likelihood of budget fixes to be tiny, not big.

The Bush Budget: What's In $2.9 Trillion? (CSM)

By Peter Grier And Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON

President Bush's new proposed budget represents an attempt to make permanent some of his key changes in US domestic policy, while challenging the fiscal priorities of the new Democratic- controlled Congress.

What it may not represent is an easy pathway to the land of black ink. While the White House plan projects a balanced budget by 2012, some of its assumptions about future government spending are unrealistic, say some budget analysts.

In essence, the Bush budget may promise a budgetary nirvana in the future, while avoiding some of the messy details about the way that nirvana might be reached.

"They're trying to get you to focus on 2012 instead of 2008," says Stan Collender, a veteran federal budget expert and managing director of Qorvis Communications.

The release of the massive amount of paperwork that represents the executive branch's proposed budget for the coming fiscal year is a much anticipated annual event in official Washington, like the appearance of Punxsutawney Phil on Groundhog Day, or the March return of the swallows to San Juan Capistrano in California.

A president's opponents routinely deride his budget as dead on arrival. Despite this, months of congressional hearings on its details follow. In the end, much of the plan will provide a blueprint for the day-to-day operations of many federal departments and agencies.

It is the top lines of total spending and receipts, plus key budgetary assumptions, that can prove controversial. In this, President Bush's proposal for fiscal 2008 is no exception.

"I doubt that Democrats will support this budget, and frankly, I will be surprised if Republicans rally around it either," said House Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt (D) of South Carolina, in a statement after the plan's release.

Mr. Bush's plan calls for $2.9 trillion in 2008 spending. It would make permanent his first-term tax cuts – reductions that, at this point, may well represent Bush's signature change in domestic policy.

Military spending would represent the government's largest area of growth. The Bush proposal calls for a Pentagon budget of $624.6 billion for fiscal 2008, up from $600.3 billion in 2007. Included is an estimated cost of $141.7 billion for fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan – the first time war costs have been wrapped into the annual budget instead of dealt with separately in supplemental appropriations.

The $141.7 billion may not represent the final spending figure for Iraq and Afghanistan, however. And the budget's longer-term projections include just $50 billion in war costs for fiscal 2009, and zero after that.

Considering the nature of wars, it is "very, very difficult to project costs in future years," said White House spokesman Tony Fratto on Monday.

Healthcare spending, by contrast, represents one of the budget plan's primary areas of restraint. The White House would squeeze $66 billion in savings from Medicare, the health insurance program for seniors, over the next five years, primarily by slowing the rate of growth of payments to healthcare providers. In addition, some $12 billion would be pared from Medicaid, the federal program for the indigent.

In addition, US government outlays for domestic discretionary spending – a category that includes everything from the FBI to the Food and Drug Administration – would be held to 1 percent growth, before inflation. Because costs are likely to rise more than 1 percent over the next year, this cap represents a cut, in real terms.

Republicans in Congress say that, overall, Bush showed fiscal responsibility with his plan, and that if the new Democratic majority on Capitol Hill were serious about balancing the budget, it should work with the White House, not criticize it.

"If they want to show they can govern, the path has been laid for them to control spending," said the ranking GOP member of the House Budget Committee, Rep. Paul Ryan (R) of Wisconsin, in a phone interview with reporters.

Critics of the Bush plan, however, say it is notable for what it excluded. For one, the White House made no serious attempt to pencil in post-2008 war costs, says Mr. Collender of Qorvis.

Nor did it include the cost of changing the Alternative Minimum Tax (AMT), a levy aimed at the wealthy that increasingly hits middle-class taxpayers. An AMT change is anticipated by lawmakers of both parties.

DOJ_NMG_0128498

"Proposals that provide long-term savings are fully included in the Bush budget," says Collender. "Proposals that provide long-term increases [in spending], like the Iraq war or an AMT change, are not included."

Under assumptions that the Concord Coalition, a budget watchdog group, considers more plausible, Uncle Sam will remain $400 billion in the red in 2012. These assumptions include discretionary spending that keeps up with the increase in the gross domestic product, and a continuation of other current policies.

Bush Wants To Means-test Middle-class Benefits (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Krishna Guha

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

President George W. Bush presented his $2,900bn budget to Congress on Monday, setting the stage for a confrontation with Democrats by making greater means-testing for middle-class benefits a central part of his proposals to address entitlement reform.

The budget represents a challenge to parts of the system of entitlements enacted as part of the Great Society agenda of the 1960s, with plans to cut Medicare spending, the main publicly funded health insurance programme for those over 65, by raising premiums for wealthier recipients.

That could save $66bn over five years, according to budget estimates, and up to $9,000bn during the next 75 years, according to some analysts.

Michael Franc, vice-president for government relations at the Heritage Foundation, said Mr Bush had considered means-testing as part of Social Security reform. “Now there is a shift to applying it across the board for all entitlements. The big change concerns the wealthy. Democrats want to tax them more. Republicans say they want to make them pay more for their middle-class benefits and shoulder more of the burden.”

The progressive tilt was also underlined, Mr Franc said, by Mr Bush’s recent proposals to extend healthcare insurance by limiting large tax deductions for some employer-funded schemes, and his plans to cap the amount of farm subsidies granted to a single entity.

The budget underscored Mr Bush’s political priorities for his final two years, with proposals to aggressively fund defence, the Iraq war, homeland security and US diplomatic operations generously. According to budget forecasts, the deficit will decline from 1.8 per cent in fiscal 2007 to 1.6 per cent in fiscal 2008, before declining further to turn into a surplus of 0.3 per cent of gross domestic product in 2012.

Democrats, however, expressed doubts about the budget, with one committee chairman dismissing the rise in defence spending to a record $481bn, as “staggering”, while others questioned the political viability of the entitlement cuts. John Spratt, chairman of the House budget committee, said: “I doubt that Democrats will support this budget,” while Max Baucus, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said the proposed Medicare cuts “are more than the president has asked from any previous Congress during his administration”.

In addition to the proposals to increase means-testing in Medicare and other plans intended to slow the growth in entitlement spending in the long term, the budget set out to demonstrate it is possible to eliminate the federal deficit by 2012 while making the Bush tax cuts permanent. Energy policy was also confirmed as an important legacy issue in the budget with plans to encourage more aggressive use of renewable fuels.

Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, welcomed Mr Bush’s focus on fiscal conservatism.

“Balancing the budget by 2012 and making the tax cuts permanent is important, but more important is that by 2012 the share of GDP the government spends is set to fall from 20.3 per cent to 18.3 per cent.”

New Drug Benefit Could Have Higher Price For Some (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Higher-income Medicare beneficiaries — those earning more than $80,000 individually or $160,000 as a couple — would pay more for the new drug benefit under the president's budget released Monday.

The plan is part of a package of proposals aimed at slowing the growth in the Medicare program, whose hospital trust fund may go broke in 11 years. It comes as part of a package of proposals to:

·Trim $66 billion from Medicare over five years. About $42 billion would come from limits on annual inflation adjustments for hospitals, nursing homes, hospices and surgical centers.

·Reduce Medicaid spending by about $13 billion over five years.

DOJ_NMG_0128499

·Increase funding for the State Children's Health Insurance Program (CHIP) by $5 billion over five years. But it would place restrictions on the amount of money states can get if they choose to cover children in families above 200% of the federal poverty level, or about $40,000 for a family of four.

"This is an aggressive and responsible budget," Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said.

The budget proposals drew fire from some Democrats, such as Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., and patient-advocacy groups such as Families USA, that want increased funding for the children's health program.

"It could take as much as $15 billion additional simply to maintain CHIP coverage for children already enrolled, but I intend for the Finance Committee to do even more to keep kids healthy," Baucus said in a statement.

The administration says the program needs to remain focused on its original target market: children in homes at or below 200% of poverty. At least 16 states have added kids whose families earn more, resulting in about 400,000 additional children being covered. States could continue to cover kids above the 200% poverty level, but would receive a smaller percentage of federal matching funds for them.

Medicare advocates, such as the AARP and the Medicare Rights Center, opposed the plan to increase costs for beneficiaries.

"The president is looking to save money in all the wrong places," said Bob Hayes of the Medicare Rights Center, who says that savings should first come from allowing Medicare to negotiate drug prices and reductions in payments to insurers who offer alternatives to traditional Medicare.

Some conservatives, however, such as Joe Antos at the American Enterprise Institute, said the Medicare trims will be a small help, but more is needed.

"To the extent we can generate a little bit more in premiums, it's going to help a little bit," Antos says. "The bigger fix is to find away to improve the efficiency of the program."

Under the Medicare proposal, the president would phase down federal premium subsidies to beneficiaries who earn more than $80,000 a year, meaning the members would pay more. A similar measure is already in effect for higher-income beneficiaries under Part B of the program, which covers such things as doctor visits.

Currently, the federal government pays 74.5% of the average national premium for the drug benefit and the member picks up the rest. Under the proposals, singles earning between $80,000 and $100,000 — the income limits double for couples — would see the subsidy reduced to 65%.

Those singles earning $100,000 to $150,000 would get a 50% premium subsidy; $150,000 to $200,000, would get 35%; those earning more than $200,000 would have a 20% subsidy.

Medicare estimates the plan would affect 868,000 people, about 2.7% of Medicare members, the first year, rising to 1.2 million in 2012. Savings would be $3.2 billion over five years.

Bush Budget Pinches Domestic Spending (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, February 6, 2007

President Bush unveiled a $2.9 trillion budget Monday that rewards the Pentagon with a record $50 billion budget hike but pinches programs cherished by Democrats, including health research and heating subsidies for the poor.

In control of Congress for the first time in a dozen years, Democrats accused Bush of trimming domestic programs, using smoke and mirrors to predict a balanced budget in five years and ignoring a hidden tax threat to middle-class families. His $245 billion request for Iraq and Afghanistan has given lawmakers sticker shock.

Despite common agreement that something must be done soon about the spiraling cost of benefit programs such as Social Security and Medicare, Bush recommended mostly modest steps — while refusing to consider tax hikes that could draw Democrats into negotiations.

"There's a lot of skittishness on both sides about coming to the table," said Sen. Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, the top Republican on the Senate Budget Committee. "The White House is afraid of taxes and the Democrats are afraid of controlling spending."

Democrats went on the attack.

"The president has simply offered more of the same, proposing a budget that cuts ... from Medicare and Medicaid, while sending $240 billion more in American taxpayer dollars to Iraq," said Rep. Rahm Emmanuel, D-Ill. "This is not a tradeoff the American people want."

Bush touted his fiscal blueprint as "protecting the homeland and fighting terrorism, keeping the economy strong with low taxes and keeping spending under control." He said after meeting with his Cabinet, "Congress needs to listen to a budget which says no tax increase, and a budget, because of fiscal discipline, that can be balanced in five years."

Bush said $245 billion is needed for military and diplomatic operations in Iraq and Afghanistan over the next year and a half, bringing total Pentagon funding for the wars to $662 billion. But his budget assumes, at least on paper, that no additional war funding will be needed after 2009.

Bush also proposed modest cuts to the rapidly growing Medicare and Medicaid health care programs, but failed to address chronic shortfalls in future years that would force painful sacrifices on beneficiaries. Instead, Medicare providers such as hospitals, nursing homes and home care providers would face payment cuts, while higher-income beneficiaries would pay greater premiums.

Less ambitious Bush proposals went nowhere when Republicans controlled Congress last year, and the budget process broke down amid election-year acrimony. Health care providers promised to lobby hard to kill the proposals again.

"Today's budget is devastating news for children, seniors and the disabled who depend on the Medicare and Medicaid programs," said Rich Umbdenstock, president of the American Hospital Association. "They are being unfairly singled out to carry the burden of achieving a balanced budget."

The cuts to Medicaid would come in part from curbing payments to states for administrative costs, which advocates for the poor say would force states to pass those cuts on to the poor.

Democrats griped that Bush would meet his five-year balanced-budget goal by forecasting far higher tax revenues than nonpartisan congressional estimators expect. His budget predicts a $61 billion surplus in 2012, but the plan would generate almost $100 billion in red ink that year instead under more cautious Congressional Budget Office revenue estimates.

White House officials countered that their estimates are in line with mainstream economists and are produced by career professionals at the Treasury Department.

"Instead of painting a rosy scenario on revenues to get to balance, we take a cautious approach," said Budget Director Rob Portman.

Extending Bush's tax cuts, most of which are to expire in 2010, would cost $211 billion in 2012 and $1.6 trillion over the next decade, according to budget documents.

Iraq continues to weigh on the nation's finances, accounting for well over half of the current year's projected deficit of $244 billion. For 2008, the budget year that begins Oct. 1, Bush sees just a slight decline in the deficit to $239 billion. He expects the decline to continue until reaching a surplus in 2012, three years after he has left office.

Democrats challenged those projections, contending that Bush would achieve a surplus only by leaving out the many billions of dollars Congress is expected to spend to keep the alternative minimum tax from ensnaring millions of middle-class taxpayers. His budget includes an AMT fix for just one year.

In theory, this could be a productive year on the budget since there's no election. Also, it can be easier to make painful budget choices when there is divided government. That's because it's virtually impossible for one political party to pass politically painful cuts to programs such as Medicare all by itself, but the job can be made easier if both parties agree to make the leap.

Thus far, however, there's no sign of that. Bush is focused on Iraq and is sagging in opinion polls. He doesn't seem inclined to exert much political muscle on the budget, and Democrats won't take the lead on their own.

"The president really does have to play a leadership role and he's got to be willing to use up some of his capital," said Bob Greenstein, who heads the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. "And I just don't see it happening in the current environment."

Bush proposes to eliminate or sharply reduce 141 federal programs totaling $12 billion. But Congress has ignored these same recommended cuts in the past, including an attempt last year to kill the Commodity Supplemental Food Program, which provides nutritionally balanced boxes of food to about a half-million poor people per month.

Democrats also promised to restore cuts from low-income heating subsidies, Head Start for preschool children, rural health programs and the Corporation for Public Broadcasting by shifting some portion of Bush's big defense hike to domestic programs.

In addition, they are sure to again kill many proposed fees such as a medical care enrollment fee on higher-income veterans and higher co-payments for their prescription drugs. Congress has rejected both four years in a row. But Bush dropped a much-reviled increase in airline ticket taxes to pay for security screenings.

Bush is proposing a few high-profile spending boosts, such as an increase in the maximum Pell grant for low-income students, from the current $4,050 to $4,600. The $15 billion cost over five years would largely be borne by cutting subsidies to lenders issuing student loans.

The president's budget also includes an initiative — billed as "dead on arrival" by Democrats — to expand health care coverage to the uninsured. The complex proposal would give every family a $15,000 tax deduction for purchasing health coverage but would make current employee-supplied health coverage taxable for certain taxpayers.

Bush's plan would save most taxpayers money, but Democrats say it would lead many employers to stop providing health insurance.

Bush Plan Reins In Domestic Spending (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

President Bush took aim yesterday at domestic spending as part of a plan to balance the budget in five years without raising taxes while increasing funding for the Iraq war and permanently expanding the military.

With the $2.9 trillion budget he submitted to Congress, Bush signaled he would attempt to squeeze spending on health care, education, housing and other domestic programs important to the Democratic majority for the duration of his term. Overall domestic spending would be held below the rate of inflation in the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1 and frozen thereafter.

The new Bush budget would also seek to reduce the rapid rate of growth in Medicare and Medicaid, trimming $101 billion from the two programs over the next five years by reducing payments to health-care providers and forcing wealthier seniors to pay more for physician services and prescription drug coverage. And it would provide additional funds for the Children's Health Insurance Program, but not enough to maintain the same enrollment over the next five years, according to independent analysts.

Bush said his plan would bolster national security while "keeping the economy strong with low taxes and keeping spending under control." But Democratic leaders, who will control the budget process for the first time since Bush took office, immediately denounced the plan as an irresponsible attempt to make costly tax cuts for the wealthy permanent and to finance the war by shortchanging children, the elderly and the nation's long-term fiscal health.

"It is disingenuous for the president to suggest cuts to Medicare and Medicaid that he knows the Congress will not support," said House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.). "It's not going to happen."

Some Democrats also questioned the president's math, saying his budget plan relies on a series of rosy economic assumptions to transform the nation's $248 billion deficit into a $61 billion surplus by 2012. Even if the plan is successful, Democrats noted, the president would only be restoring the country's fiscal condition to the surplus he inherited when he took office in 2001.

"This budget is filled with debt and deception, disconnected from reality, and continues to move America in the wrong direction," said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.).

While the spending blueprint met resistance from Democrats, it appeared to shore up the president's position with conservatives in his own party, who have been deeply unhappy with the growth of federal spending over the past six years. In comments to reporters yesterday, Bush emphasized his desire to reduce the number of congressional pork-barrel projects, known as earmarks, and acquire a line-term veto -- favorite initiatives of fiscal conservatives.

Extending Bush's first-term tax cuts, a collection of rate reductions and tax credits that has kept more than $1 trillion in taxpayers' pockets since 2001, would cost the Treasury an estimated $374 billion between 2008 and 2012, according to the administration. Most of the cuts are scheduled to expire in 2010.

Bush's advisers yesterday credited the tax cuts for the nation's healthy economy and said keeping them in place is essential to maintaining economic growth. A growing economy, in turn, they said, will continue to stimulate tax collections, making it possible to balance the budget even while paying increasing sums for the Iraq war.

White House budget director Rob Portman stressed that point in a briefing for reporters. "The cost of the war is reflected in the administration's deficit projections," he said. "In fact, there has been a $165 billion decrease in our deficit over the past two years, and that includes all of the war costs that we've incurred during that time."

Bush's proposed fiscal 2008 budget would provide another big boost in spending for the war and overall defense and diplomatic spending. The budget plan includes $623 billion for the military next year, including $141 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and a $50 billion down payment on the president's plan to permanently increase the size of the armed forces by 92,000 over the next five years.

The State Department would receive nearly $35 billion, an increase of more than 20 percent over current spending estimates, plus $3 billion in emergency spending related to the administration's "global war on terror."

Federal agencies other than State, the Pentagon and Homeland Security would receive increases of about 1 percent over 2007 spending estimates, with requests for eight agencies -- including education and environment -- falling below fiscal 2006 levels.

Bush proposes a number of new initiatives, including a plan to boost the size of Pell grants to help students pay for college, a program to fund pilot projects to reduce traffic congestion and a new effort to raise $3 billion in public and private matching funds to improve national parks. But those programs' costs would be offset with cuts elsewhere.

For example, the Education Department's request for discretionary funding would rise $10 million over the 2007 estimate -- about 1 percent less than the agency received in 2006. The increase for Pell grants and an extra $1.2 billion for elementary and secondary education would be paid for in part by slashing subsidies to the banks that provide student loans and eliminating a student loan program for students at vocational and technical schools.

The Justice Department would get about a 1 percent increase, including substantial boosts for counterterrorism and counterintelligence programs and more than 220 new FBI agents. But law enforcement groups say the proposal would effectively cut grants and other assistance to local police by 75 percent at a time when violent crime is rising nationally.

And state officials complained that the president is seeking an 18 percent reduction in funds to provide heating assistance to 5.6 million low-income families, a proposal that would force states either to contribute more money or cut off assistance to about 1 million families.

Democratic budget leaders decried the cuts, many of which have appeared in previous Bush budgets.

"These things have been around the track numerous times and never made it to the finish line," said House Budget Committee Chairman John M. Spratt Jr. (D-S.C.). "It's doubtful they're going to pass."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) also criticized the president for allowing the alternative minimum tax to expand to millions of additional families by 2012, subjecting them to substantial tax increases. The tax was originally conceived as a way to ensure that wealthy Americans did not escape paying taxes.

Grover G. Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform and a staunch administration advocate, said conservatives are likely to applaud the package. "By putting a line in the sand that says that 'You can -- and I have -- balanced the budget without raising taxes,' then the Democrats have to do the same," Norquist said.

Bush's Austere Health Proposal Draws Complaints (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — The budget President Bush proposed Monday calls for the deepest Medicare cuts of his six years in office and falls short in expanding health coverage to uninsured children -- a top priority for congressional Democrats this year.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt acknowledged the budget's austere tone but said action was needed to rein in programs growing at an unsustainable pace.

"A very clear priority of the budget has been to reach balance in 2012," he told reporters Monday, "and that has forced many of the hard decisions."

Consumer and industry groups -- including AARP, the American Medical Association, the American Cancer Society, the Alzheimer's Association and the California Hospital Association -- roundly criticized Bush's plan, and their opposition signaled that it is unlikely to gain traction.

Rep. Pete Stark, D-California, chairman of the House Ways and Means subcommittee on health, dismissed the budget as "an exercise in make-believe intended to incite partisanship, not invite policymaking."

Separately, Bush's proposed tax deduction of up to $15,000 for health insurance ran into more problems after an independent analysis concluded that most of the tax break would go to higher-income households that already have private insurance.

Bush had outlined the plan last month in his State of the Union address. But a study by the Lewin Group, a health-care consulting company, found that only about 21 percent of the tax breaks would go to families with one or more uninsured person. Just over half the benefit would go to families earning $75,000 or more.

"The money is not being targeted at those who are most in need of it," said John Sheils, a Lewin vice president.

The budget's curbs on Medicare spending included reductions in payments to hospitals, nursing homes, hospice programs, home health providers and ambulance companies. Also, upper-income beneficiaries would have to pay higher premiums for prescription coverage and doctors' services.

But the proposal left Medicare managed-care plans largely alone, to the chagrin of Democrats who see the private plans as undermining the traditional government program.

The Medicare cuts -- described by an HHS budget official as the biggest Bush has ever proposed -- would total nearly $66 billion over five years. Administrative and anti-fraud measures would save an additional $10 billion. Taken together, the proposals would slow the rate of increase in Medicare spending by about 1 percentage point between 2008 and 2012, to 5.6 percent.

Bush also called for almost $26 billion in cuts for Medicaid, which provides health care for the poor, over the same period.

Some congressional Republicans expressed misgivings. "These are alarming proposals to our health-care system, and many have already been denied by Congress," said Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore.

DOJ_NMG_0128503

Sen. Michael Enzi of Wyoming, the ranking Republican on the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, stopped short of criticizing the budget but noted: "At the end of the day, the House and Senate control the purse strings ... (and) the final document may look very different from the president's proposals."

On children's insurance, Bush proposed to renew the politically popular State Children's Health Insurance Program, which is set to expire this year. The federal-state program provides coverage to as many as 6 million children whose parents make too much to qualify for Medicaid but too little to afford private insurance.

But where Democrats estimate it will take as much as $15 billion in additional spending over five years to maintain the current caseload, Bush proposed only about $5 billion. Administration officials said their calculations show no children would lose coverage, but activists for the poor were highly skeptical of such assurances.

Even if Bush's health-care budget is unlikely to survive as a whole, Democrats might resurrect parts of it to help pay for their priorities -- such as an expansion of coverage for children.

"This is like a menu of issues on the table," said David Certner, a top lobbyist for AARP. "These are much larger cuts than Congress would entertain, but members may pick and choose among them as they put together their own proposals."

How Plans To Expand Health Coverage Could Affect Insured (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

New prescriptions to help the uninsured are proliferating by the day, but some of the proposals would have a big impact on another group -- people who already have health insurance.

Yesterday, Democratic presidential hopeful John Edwards became the latest entrant in the health-overhaul derby, announcing that he would raise taxes to expand coverage. (See related story.1) His plan, like those of many states working to expand coverage, would require employers to "play or pay" -- meaning cover their workers or pay a new tax. He would also require most Americans to have insurance, helping middle- and lower-income people by offering tax credits. Both the uninsured and those who already have insurance through work would have the option to get coverage through new public pools called Health Markets.

Mr. Edwards's plan joins an array of proposals already being advanced by the White House, several states (including California, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania), members of Congress and insurance and consumer groups. With health care shaping up as a major issue in the 2008 elections, more plans are on the way, including from Democratic presidential candidates Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama.

The blueprints aim to reduce the number of uninsured people in the U.S., currently at 46 million, but use different strategies. Two of the plans -- by President Bush and Sen. Ron Wyden, an Oregon Democrat -- have the potential to affect nearly all Americans by fundamentally altering the employer-sponsored system that now provides coverage to 175 million people.

On the federal level, the chances of any of these proposals being enacted this year are slim, given that there is little consensus and little money to spend on any plan that would increase subsidies. Still, activity in this area is building and, if Congress and the White House are looking to make a deal on something major, they might look to health care.

The states have a better chance of quick action, with Democrats and Republicans working to find consensus. In Massachusetts, a plan has already been passed and is being implemented.

Here's a look at how the plans work, and some potential winners and losers:

PRESIDENT BUSH'S PLAN: Under the Bush plan, employer-provided health insurance, now excluded from workers' taxable income, would be subject to income and payroll tax. As a tradeoff, all taxpayers with insurance would get a standard deduction of $15,000 for a family and $7,500 for an individual.

Among the winners would be those whose coverage costs less than $15,000 a year -- or about 80% of workers who have job-based insurance, the White House says. For example, a worker with a family policy costing him and his employer $10,000 a year would still be able to take the full deduction of $15,000. Losers would include people with family policies worth more than $15,000, including executives with generous benefits and some union workers who have traded wage increase for better health coverage. They would be taxed on the amount that exceeds the deduction.

But winners could turn into losers with time. Even people with policies under the cap could eventually hit the ceiling as health costs rise. That's because the cap would be indexed to general inflation -- not health-care inflation, which has risen more rapidly in recent years.

Clear winners would be the 17 million people who buy insurance on the open market. Currently, they don't get any tax break for purchasing health insurance. But like any tax deduction, the one for health-insurance would be most valuable in dollar terms for people with high incomes who pay the most taxes. Low-income people who don't owe any income tax wouldn't be able to use the deduction -- they would have their payroll taxes reduced instead. But that could cause a serious, unintended problem: Since those taxes go into the Social Security coffers, people paying in less would get lower benefits in retirement.

"This could translate into a very substantial drop in retirement living standards," concluded an analysis by the Tax Policy Center, a joint venture of two liberal-leaning think tanks, the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution.

The White House acknowledges that changing the tax treatment of insurance would reduce the number of uninsured by only three million to five million. It has proposed a separate initiative that would redirect federal funds from hospitals that provide indigent care to help states expand coverage to the uninsured.

Some experts see another potential problem: If younger, healthier employees use the tax deduction to buy insurance on their own, rather than through their employers, then employer health plans could end up with mostly older, sicker workers, resulting in higher premiums. "It's good for you if you're a healthy person who will do well on your own," says Paul Fronstin, director of health research and education programs at the Employee Benefit Research Institute. "It's bad if you are not."

But Joseph Antos, a health-policy expert at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, doubts many people would jump into the open insurance market, considering it's so much easier to stay in an employer plan. "It takes a lot to get people to move," says Mr. Antos.

SEN. WYDEN'S PROPOSAL: Sen. Wyden's plan, in many ways, is the most radical one on the table. He would sever the link between employment and insurance altogether and require everyone to buy coverage directly from insurance companies, much like people now buy auto insurance. He initially would require that employers pay their workers the cash that they had been spending on health insurance. He argues that employers would ultimately continue the practice, even when no longer required, to keep the best workers.

Beyond that, he would provide a tax break to help people pay their insurance premiums, and give low-income Americans direct subsidies for coverage. A new tax on employers would help pay for the program. New rules would require insurance companies to cover anyone who applied for insurance, even ones with existing medical conditions, and would bar the companies from charging sick people higher premiums.

Under this plan, people with insurance will have a greater choice of health plans than most get from work today, given that the market is likely to produce more options. But as health costs and insurance premiums rise, families would have to absorb the increase. As is, employers pass the cost of rising health care to their workers through higher premiums and lower wages, but workers don't always feel the impact, says John Sheils of Lewin Group, a health-care consulting firm that helped develop the Wyden plan. Everyone would be required to buy insurance even if they don't think they need it. Sen. Wyden describes a young, healthy man he met in central Oregon who told him that he didn't think he needed coverage. Sen. Wyden noted that the young man was a skier and asked him, "What if you crack up on the mountain?" The man replied that if he got hurt he would buy insurance then. "That's not how insurance works," Sen. Wyden says. "This is going to be a huge education job."

STATE EFFORTS: Several states including Massachusetts, California and Pennsylvania are working to expand health coverage through a combination of approaches: People without insurance would be required to buy it. Low-income families would get subsidies to do so. All but the smallest employers would have to provide coverage to their workers or pay fines. And states would make it easier for individuals and small businesses to buy coverage from central pools.

These approaches wouldn't directly affect those who already have insurance, though if more healthy people were added to the insurance pool, it could reduce the cost of coverage for everybody, says Mr. Fronstin of the Employee Benefit Research Institute. The biggest impact would be on the low-income uninsured who would be eligible for new subsidies, says Paul Ginsburg, president of the Center for Studying Health System Change, a Washington think tank. "They are out-and-out winners."

A COALITION PROPOSAL: A diverse collection of consumer, business, medical and insurance groups called the Health Coverage Coalition for the Uninsured is recommending another approach that tries to reduce the number of people without insurance without affecting people who already have it. It suggests making it easier to enroll the 6.6 million children who are eligible but not yet signed up for Medicaid, the state-federal health program for the poor and disabled, or the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which targets low-income kids who don't qualify for Medicaid.

It also recommends a new tax credit to help low-income families pay for private insurance, including coverage that may be offered through work.

If this plan became law, families who earn less than 300% of the federal poverty level could get help paying for health coverage. And single adults, even if they don't have kids, would become eligible for Medicaid if they were below the poverty line. Taxpayers would pick up the cost -- an estimated $60 billion over five years.

While many want to expand the Children's Health Insurance Program, the Bush administration wants to scale it back. States have been adding children and some of their parents to the program's rolls, but yesterday the administration proposed cutting enrollment of all adults, as well as children in families with incomes over 200% of the poverty level.

JOHN EDWARDS'S PLAN: Former Sen. Edwards's plan wouldn't require any changes of employees currently getting insurance on the job, although employers would have to provide coverage or pay 6% of their payroll. He would use a blend of new tax increases, tax breaks and subsidies to expand coverage. Under his proposal, people who don't get insurance through work could buy into public pools called Health Markets, with tax credits to help pay the premiums. Further, insurance companies wouldn't be able to charge sick people extra and would be required to insure everyone who applied. Mr. Edwards also would expand Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program, to cover more families and, for the first time, poor adults without kids. Once it was all in place, he would require nearly all Americans to get coverage one way or another.

The uninsured, though, would have a handful of new options. Those with particularly low incomes may become newly eligible for government programs. Others, including families with incomes up to $80,000 a year, could get new tax breaks to buy insurance from the Health Markets. Those with insurance through work could also opt to get it from the Health Markets as well, where there might be more choices.

Slow Growth In Health (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

President Bush would increase current funding levels for the state-federal Children's Health Insurance Program by $5 billion over the next five years -- far short of the $12 billion or more that experts say is needed to keep covering the 6 million children now in the program. The program, which costs about $5 billion annually, helps provide health coverage to children whose families earn too much to qualify for Medicaid but still cannot afford insurance on their own. The administration wants states to focus on serving children whose families earn 200 percent of the poverty level, or $41,300 for a family of four.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) said, "Congress must do more to fund the Children's Health Insurance Program than the president suggests here."

In Medicare and Medicaid, which serve nearly 93 million Americans, Bush would slow growth in spending for both programs by a combined $101 billion over five years, partly through changes in Medicare payments to hospitals, nursing and rehabilitation facilities, and home health agencies, and through changes in the way Medicaid pays for prescription drugs. He also proposed triggering across-the-board cuts in provider payments if Medicare spending reaches certain levels.

In the Medicare prescription drug benefit, individuals who earn more than $80,000 annually (and couples who earn more than $160,000) would have to pay higher premiums than less affluent beneficiaries enrolled in the same drug plans. The change would affect 1.1 million people in 2008.

Health Industry Cool To Bush Budget Cuts (AP)

By Kevin Freking

AP, February 6, 2007

Health care providers would see their reimbursement rates from the federal government go up less in coming years when they care for the elderly, poor and disabled under President Bush's budget.

The recommendations, if adopted by Congress, would trim Medicare spending by $66 billion over five years. Also, the administration will move to trim another $10 billion in Medicare spending through regulations.

Together, the changes sought for Medicare means the program would grow at a 5.6 percent clip rather than 6.5 percent, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said Monday.

"The program will continue to grow. It will have robust growth," Leavitt said.

Bush also calls for reducing Medicaid spending by about $25 billion over five years. That change would just slightly dent the more than $1.2 trillion the federal government will spend on the program during that span. Congress would have to sign off on about half of the proposed Medicaid savings. The remainder are regulatory changes the administration will pursue.

The two programs account for about $1 out of every $5 spent by the federal government. The president called for smaller reductions last year, and those proposals went nowhere.

Democratic lawmakers were cool to the recommendations. Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif., said that trimming Medicaid will make it harder for states to fund health care for the poor and the uninsured.

Stark, who oversees the House Ways and Means Committee's health subcommittee, said savings can be achieved by targeting payments to health care providers, but not in the ways that Bush sought.

For example, Stark said that he believes Congress can lower payments to insurance companies that provide managed care for seniors, a concept the administration opposes.

Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, noted that the proposed Medicare reductions are more than the president asked from any previous Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0128506

Baucus took issue with the changes that Bush seeks for the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which provides health coverage to about 6 million people.

The program cost about $5 billion annually. The president called for an additional $4.2 billion in funding over five years, but Baucus said it may take as much as $15 billion over the same period to maintain current health insurance coverage.

"Simply put, Congress must do more to fund the Children's Health Insurance Program than the president suggests here," Baucus said.

Some Republican lawmakers defended the president's budget. They said that entitlement programs are growing at an unsustainable rate.

"We must reform these programs in order to save them," said Rep. Jim McCrery, R-La.

But hospitals, nursing homes and other providers say that they can't afford lower payments from the government. They said that the payments won't keep up with the cost of providing health care.

The effect of the budget on providers would differ depending upon the specialty, but almost all would be affected one way or the other. The reimbursement rates for providers increase each year to account for inflation and other factors. The president wants to limit those updates, and, in some cases, such as with home health agencies and nursing homes, the payments would be frozen next year at 2007 levels.

The administration will also ask wealthier beneficiaries to pay higher premiums. Individuals who make more than $80,000 a year and couples who make more than $160,000 would pay a higher premium for their prescription drug coverage under Medicare Part D.

They already pay higher Medicare premiums for doctor visits. Under the president's proposal, the income threshold would not be indexed to increase at the rate of inflation. As a result, more and more people would fall into that category as inflation pushes incomes upward.

Many of the agencies within Health and Human Services will have to make do with about the same amount of money as they got this year.

"We are serving our citizens with compassion while maintaining sensible stewardship of their tax dollars," Leavitt said.

The budget recommends an estimated $50 million reduction for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, which is the principal agency for protecting the health and safety of all Americans. Funding for the agency would total $5.76 billion. Grants to states for bioterrorism preparation would be reduced, and funding remains at current levels for preventing the nation's leading health problems — heart disease and cancer.

Meanwhile, funding for the National Institutes of Health, which oversees medical research, would rise nearly 2 percent to about $28.7 billion.

The president upped his recommendation for the Food and Drug Administration to about $2.1 billion. That's a $106 million increase compared to what he requested last year. The increases focused on strengthening food safety and getting more generic drugs to the market.

Numerous advocacy groups took issue with the president's budget.

"This is not a budget that the nationwide cancer community was hoping for after the president's visit to NIH last month to tout an historic decline in cancer deaths," said Daniel E. Smith of the American Cancer Society.

The AARP's Bill Novelli said the Medicare and Medicaid savings reflect an annual rite in Washington — "piecemeal cuts that threaten to damage critical programs without addressing the fundamental problems that exist in our entire health care system."

Bush's And Spitzer's Budgets Hit New York Hospitals Hard (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peña

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

The budget that President Bush proposed yesterday includes deep cuts in spending to train young doctors, cuts that would hit New York especially hard, eliminating several hundred million dollars a year in payments to teaching hospitals around the state.

The proposals arrived just days after Mr. Bush put forward a different set of cuts that would affect New York much more than the rest of the country, and after Gov. Eliot Spitzer proposed significant health care cuts of his own.

The combined reductions would total more than 4 percent of New York hospitals' total incomes — well over $1 billion a year — a prospect that left industry officials and elected officials struggling to describe the dire effects.

"This is the worst, the most damaging scenario," said Kenneth E. Raske, president of the Greater New York Hospital Association.

DOJ_NMG_0128507

In particular, the cuts would take money from the academic medical centers that teach new doctors and do a large share of advanced medical research. New York City has by far the largest concentration of teaching hospitals in the country, training about one in seven of the nation's interns and residents, many of whom go on to practice elsewhere.

A hospital-by-hospital analysis by Mr. Raske's group shows how uneven Mr. Spitzer's proposed cuts would be, with the losses concentrated in the city. In all, the governor would cut about 1 percent from hospitals' revenue.

While some hospitals would actually gain money from the changes, others would see significant cuts, like two hospitals in Brooklyn that are already short of cash — Interfaith Medical Center, which would lose 6 percent of its total income, and Brooklyn Hospital Center, which would lose 4 percent.

On seeing the plans laid out by Mr. Bush, Senators Charles E. Schumer and Hillary Rodham Clinton, members of the new Democratic majority in Congress, vowed to fight them.

"Much of the damage that the president seeks to do will be undone, but to say we can eliminate all of it would not be right," Mr. Schumer said.

He called the president's proposals "an all-out assault on graduate medical education" and a "dagger to the heart of New York health care."

In its budget summaries, the Bush administration described the changes as needed to rein in rapidly growing health care spending, and to fight the practice of expanding government programs beyond their intended boundaries.

Medicare, the federal health plan for the elderly and the disabled, is a major supporter of training programs for interns and residents at teaching hospitals. In New York and some other states, Medicaid, the program for the poor, also pitches in for that training — known as Graduate Medical Education, or G.M.E. — while other states have opted not to take that step.

Mr. Bush proposed gradually eliminating that use of Medicaid money — about $600 million a year in federal funds for New York, more than any other state.

"Current law does not explicitly authorize such payments," the administration's budget summary said. "Paying for G.M.E. is outside of Medicaid's primary purpose, which is to provide medical care to low-income individuals."

The president also called yesterday for abolition of one type of Medicare payment for doctor training — again, a cut that would disproportionately affect New York. The hospital group estimated the cost to New York hospitals at more than $100 million a year.

Two weeks ago, Mr. Bush proposed a different sort of cut in Medicaid that would affect only certain public hospitals, particularly New York City's Health and Hospitals Corporation. The corporation and New York State estimated the cut to the city hospitals at $350 million a year.

Mr. Spitzer has proposed cutting $1.2 billion a year in health care costs, including more than $350 million in hospital payments.

But the loss to individual hospitals would vary widely, depending on their reliance on Medicaid, how many doctors they train, and how much those training programs have changed in size over the last 25 years.

Under the Spitzer plan, St. Barnabas Hospital in the Bronx would gain more than $7 million a year, while Beth Israel Medical Center in Manhattan would lose almost $15 million, the most for any single hospital, according to the Greater New York Hospital Association. New York-Presbyterian hospital, actually two very large hospitals that merged, would lose almost $24 million a year.

Just 15 hospitals would absorb more than half the losses for all of the state's more than 200 hospitals, and 14 of the 15 are in New York City. Most of the big losses would be suffered by hospitals that are relatively successful financially and in relatively affluent neighborhoods, but there are notable exceptions, like Interfaith and Brooklyn.

Mr. Spitzer has described his changes as reforms designed to make the health care system more sensible and responsive to patient needs. The industry and its main union, 1199 United Healthcare Workers East, say that in pursuit of abstract theories, the governor would make cuts that are so abrupt and deep that they would make health care worse, not better.

Jennifer Cunningham, a consultant to 1199, said, "The Bush and Spitzer cuts to teaching hospitals would be a double-whammy — more than double."

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg weighed in yesterday, saying that the governor had "set the right overall priorities," but that he feared damage to teaching hospitals that are "one of the stars in the crown" of New York health care.

A Look At Winners, Losers In The President's Proposed Budget (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, February 6, 2007

Some agencies would win big under President Bush's fiscal 2008 budget proposal, while others would suffer slashed funds. Here are some notable winners and losers:

WINNERS:

-Defense Department: $624.6 billion, a 4.1 percent increase over 2007. The Army would get $130.1 billion, a 20.4 percent increase. Some $37.6 billion would go to fix or replace equipment destroyed in battle.

-Veteran Affairs: $84.4 billion, a 13.3 percent increase over 2007. The VA will treat nearly 263,000 Iraq and Afghanistan war vets; the budget seeks $36.6 billion for medical care, including $3 billion for mental health.

-State Department: $37.4 billion, a 12.9 percent increase over 2007. Seeks to triple funding for the Millennium Challenge Corp., to $3 billion. The corporation provides aid to 11 fledgling democracies that meet U.S.-set fiscal criteria.

-Interior Department: $10.1 billion, a 4.1 percent increase over 2007. Seeks $1.9 billion for national parks, a 13 percent increase, including 40 percent more for daily park operations than when Bush took office. Seeks a $100 million match from citizens' contributions.

-Labor Department: $50.4 billion, a 7.9 percent increase over 2007. Seeks $313 million for the Mine Safety and Health Administration, a 13 percent increase from 2007 request.

LOSERS:

-Amtrak: Seeks $800 million, $500 million less than fiscal 2007.

-Environmental Protection Agency: $7.1 billion, a 4.9 percent cut from fiscal 2007.

-Low Income Home Energy Assistance: Seeks $1.8 billion, down from $3.2 billion, a 56 percent cut.

-Corporation for Public Broadcasting: Seeks $350 million, down from $460 million in fiscal 2007.

-Education Department: Seeks $62.6 billion, a 5 percent cut from fiscal 2007. Would eliminate more than three dozen programs.

-Labor Department's Bureau of International Labor Affairs: Would cut from $73 million to $14 million, nearly 81 percent.

-Office of Disability Employment Policy: Would cut from $28 million to $19 million, or 32 percent.

-Centers for Disease Control and Prevention: Would cut by $550 million.

A Closer Look At Where The Money Will Go (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

President Bush would increase the Department of Homeland Security budget by $2.3 billion, to $34.4 billion, boosting spending to secure the borders and detect nuclear materials. There would also be $1 billion for better communications systems for first responders.

Other priorities include $1.8 billion for a "virtual fence" at the border, 3,000 new Border Patrol agents and 600 new detention beds; $80 million more for nuclear detection; and $224 million to hire airport security checkers.

But states and cities would see cuts of $1.2 billion in grants for anti-terrorism, law enforcement, firefighters and emergency medical teams.

The story was similar at the Justice Department, where overall spending would increase about 1 percent, to $20.2 billion, with new outlays targeting terrorism, violent crime and illicit drugs. But the budget would cut $1.7 billion from local law enforcement assistance, such as the popular Community Oriented Policing Services program, according to the International Association of Chiefs of Police.

Congressional leaders immediately criticized the cuts. Rep. David E. Price (D-N.C.), chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on homeland security, accused the White House of "depriving our communities of the critical support they need to operate in the post-9/11 world."

In other homeland security spending, funding for the Coast Guard's troubled fleet-replacement program would fall from $1.1 billion to $800 million. But the FBI would be a big winner, with its budget growing about 13 percent, to $6.4 billion.

Budget Winners And Losers (WP)

Washington Post, February 6, 2007

The budget that President Bush sent to the Congress yesterday contains nuggets of good news for federal employees: Their numbers would grow, as would their salaries.

But those retiring after relatively short careers would lose part of the standard health insurance subsidy. And many employees not involved in national and homeland security would see their programs operate with flat or reduced funding in fiscal 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0128509

According to the president's plan, executive branch employment, excluding the Postal Service, would increase to more than 1.87 million civil service workers, up by 2.8 percent compared with fiscal 2004. The budget numbers show that the government would add 40,000 full-time employees to the 2006 tally of 1,832,800.

Much of the hiring would be in response to added duties for homeland security and fighting terrorism, the budget said. The Department of Homeland Security, for example, would receive funding to hire an additional 3,000 Border Patrol agents.

The budget also would add staff at the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, the Food and Drug Administration, the Federal Aviation Administration, the Energy Department's National Nuclear Security Administration and in federal prisons. The Census Bureau would also grow by opening regional offices in preparation for the 2010 census.

But some agencies would lose employees. The biggest loser would be the Agriculture Department, which would decline by about 5,000 workers in 2008, compared with 2006.

Civil service and military personnel would receive a pay raise of 3 percent in 2008, according to the budget. The proposed raise, announced Friday by the Office of Management and Budget, will be reviewed by Congress.

The National Treasury Employees Union objected to the budget's proposal to allow the president to allocate some of the pay raise to address recruitment and retention challenges in government. Colleen M. Kelley, the union president, said the raise should be at least 3.5 percent, given that the 2007 raise was the lowest in 20 years.

Bush's budget also included a discussion of military compensation that said "military members are compensated well above comparably aged and educated civilians" in the private sector. That argument rested largely on the higher deferred payments for health-care and retirement benefits for military personnel. Overall, the budget said, current and future pay and benefits average more than $100,000 per service member.

The budget would make changes to the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program. The biggest policy change would reduce the subsidy that the government provides for retiree health-care costs.

Currently, federal employees who retire with five years of continuous service receive the same subsidy as they did when they were working. Under the formula, the government pays about 70 percent of the health insurance premium.

The budget proposal would require employees to have 10 years of government service for the government to pick up 70 percent of the premium. The government would pay only half of the subsidy, or 35 percent, on behalf of those with only five years of service and would phase in higher contributions for those with more than five but less than 10 years of service.

Each year, the government has about 550 employees who retire with more than five but less than 10 years of service, the Office of Personnel Management said. They make up a small part of the annual retirement exodus that ranges from 60,000 to 70,000.

Linda M. Springer, director of the OPM, said the budget proposal sought to "create greater equity" between those who served a full career in government and those who joined relatively late in their careers, perhaps motivated by the opportunity to claim relatively generous health benefits in retirement. "We don't want people just coming opportunistically to join us," she said.

But Judy Park, legislative director for the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association, suggested that the proposal could hamper the government's ability to hire mid-career professionals at a time when federal agencies will be coping with substantial numbers of baby boom retirements. "If the government is trying to be more competitive in getting middle-management people to fill those positions, then is this not tearing down their competitive edge?" she asked.

The changes to the health benefits program also affect the Patent and Trademark Office, requiring the agency to set aside money to cover retiree health-care liabilities. OPM officials said the patent office operates through fees and should take over its retiree obligations, much as the U.S. Postal Service has for its retirees.

The administration also seeks to allow the largest carrier for the Federal Employee Health Benefit Program, Blue Cross and Blue Shield, to offer a third health insurance option, probably a high-deductible plan featuring a health savings account. Currently, Blue Cross is limited to two options.

Democrats See Holes In President's Budget Plan (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan And Alec Macgillis

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

President Bush's proposed 2008 budget would provide hundreds of millions of dollars for projects in the Washington area, including a new Homeland Security complex in Southeast and improvements to roads and Metro.

But Democratic lawmakers said it does not include enough for homeland security, health care and cleanup of the Chesapeake Bay.

"We're now in another year where the president has sort of said one thing in the State of the Union but the reality of the budget is very different," Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.) said after reviewing the proposal, released yesterday, for the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1

The staffs of federal lawmakers from the D.C. area were still wading through the voluminous document last night to more clearly gauge its potential impact on the region. Sharp increases for the departments of Defense and Homeland Security seemed certain to benefit the local economy, with its profusion of contracting firms.

But legislators said proposed cuts in some programs could harm local residents.

For example, a Homeland Security grant program for state preparedness was slashed by 60 percent -- to $465 million nationwide -- and another for state and local training was reduced by more than half -- to $95 million. That could lead to smaller amounts from those anti-terror programs for Maryland, Virginia and the District.

"This year's budget fails to acknowledge the role that the national capital region, and Maryland, plays in protecting our nation from future attacks," Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.) said in a statement. She complained that funds for port-security grants, for example, were kept at 2007 levels instead of increased to address continuing threats.

Jarrod Agen, a federal Homeland Security spokesman, pointed out that the department would get an extra $1 billion to distribute nationwide in grants for communication equipment for police and other first-responders.

"When you factor in that $1 billion with the rest of the totals, it's roughly about the same as what the allocations were last year" for national homeland security spending, he said. The Washington region also stands to potentially gain money through an anti-terrorism program for urban areas that was revamped when legislators complained last year that it shortchanged high-risk areas.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) played down concerns about local homeland security cuts in Bush's proposed budget, calling the proposal a "starting point" and adding that Congress would likely be able to avert funding cuts.

"We'll take care of it," Davis said. The administration has "got to make everything balance out. Congress will get its two cents in."

The budget request includes almost $347 million to build a Homeland Security complex and Coast Guard headquarters on the campus of St. Elizabeths Hospital in Southeast Washington, according to Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.).

In a statement, she said that the complex was her "major economic development project for the District" and that the funding would mean that groundbreaking could begin soon.

But sources on Capitol Hill said the $120 million portion designated for the Homeland Security offices might be targeted as Congress looks to make up for the cuts in the state and local homeland security grants.

The budget proposal gives the D.C. area hundreds of millions of dollars in funds for transportation, moving forward programs approved in past years. Metro, for example, is slated to get $35 million for rail cars to relieve crowding. And a highway planning and construction program would provide $133 million for the District, a 20 percent increase from last year; $515 million for Maryland, a 17 percent increase; and $868 million for Virginia, a 15 percent increase. The latter program is funded mainly through gasoline taxes.

The project to extend Metro to Dulles International Airport would receive part of a $72 million pot of money for public transit, said Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.).

The $4 billion project is expected to be approved for its full allotment of federal funding, about $900 million, late this year. But worries over federal approval have risen as the project suffers delays and cost increases, partly because of the debate over whether to change the route to go below ground in Tysons Corner.

"It's a good sign," said Dan Scandling, Wolf's spokesman. "It's another step in the right direction for rail out to the Dulles corridor."

The budget provides $7.4 billion, the same amount as last year, for construction related to the program of closing or retooling military bases.

Members of Maryland's congressional delegation were concerned over what they called insufficient funding to clean up the Chesapeake Bay. Under the president's proposal, Maryland would receive $16.6 million for a special state revolving fund to upgrade sewage treatment plants. That's a cut of nearly 50 percent from 2001, according to the office of Sen. Benjamin L. Cardin (D).

An additional $26 million in federal funds would again go to the Chesapeake Bay Program.

Mikulski reproached the Bush administration for cutting money for another local priority: the consolidation of the Food and Drug Administration offices in White Oak in Montgomery County. The president has asked for $58 million in 2008, compared with $178 million last year, the senator said, adding that the lower amount could delay the project by years.

In the District, officials were pleased by the budget requests for several projects. They include $12 million for the D.C. Water and Sewer Authority to reduce sewer overflows into the Anacostia and Potomac rivers as well as Rock Creek, a jump of $5 million. The budget would also provide $10 million for a forensics laboratory and $5 million to reimburse the FBI for the use of its laboratory.

The proposed budget also includes $10 million to renovate the D.C. central library and its branches.

Cultural Agencies See Boost From Bush Budget (WP)

By Jacqueline Trescott

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

The federal cultural agencies and museums received solid support yesterday from the White House in the proposed budget for fiscal 2008.

The Bush administration proposed $678.4 million for the Smithsonian complex, the largest of the cultural accounts. If passed by Congress at that level, the budget would include an increase of more than $20 million for utilities, rents and salaries; $10 million for improvements to a storage facility for anthropological and art collections in Suitland; $9.9 million for planning for the National Museum of African American History and Culture; and $18 million for improvements at the National Zoo, including $9 million for the new elephant habitat.

The cultural organizations are in budget limbo -- as are other government agencies -- because the fiscal 2007 budget was not passed by both the House and the Senate. The appropriations are spelled out in a continuing resolution, an interim funding measure. If the continuing resolution becomes law, the Smithsonian would received $637 million for fiscal 2007.

Despite the uncertainty, the chairmen of the arts and humanities endowments yesterday said they were satisfied.

In the president's proposal, the National Endowment for the Arts is to get $128.4 million.

"We're pleased that the budget requests a $4 million increase for the arts endowment, which continues a steady restoration of funding for the agency," said NEA Chairman Dana Gioia.

The National Endowment for the Humanities was slated for a increase of $400,000. "The president's budget request reaffirms his long-standing support of the endowment and its 'We the People' program," said NEH Chairman Bruce Cole. The "People" initiative encourages the study and teaching of American history and culture.

A third federal agency, the Institute of Museum and Library Services, would get $271.2 million, with the lion's share going to support libraries. Yet the museum portion of the institute's budget has steadily increased in recent years, with a proposed $39.8 million for fiscal 2008. "The administration understands the essential role these institutions play in connecting people to information and ideas," said director Anne-Imelda M. Radice.

The proposals for the arts agencies are just a trickle of the $2.9 trillion package the White House announced yesterday but are essential to the Washington area because of the national museums' importance as tourist destinations and their workforce.

The administration proposed $39.3 million for the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, which receives funding for its operations and capital repairs. That is a slight increase over last year's proposal but an increase of $9 million over the last official budget in 2006. The increase would cover costs for the renovation of the Eisenhower Theater, which will close in May for the 16-month job.

The National Gallery of Art is slated for $116 million in the proposed budget, the same amount the president proposed last year.

The U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum was relatively flat with a target of $44.9 million.

New Spending For No Child Left Behind (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

President Bush proposed $56 billion in Education Department funding, level with his proposal for the current fiscal year but 3 percent less than what Democrats are expected to approve for this year. He also sought about $1 billion in new spending related to the landmark No Child Left Behind law.

Democrats and education groups attacked Bush's proposal. Critics said Bush's budget would slash key education programs and fall short of full funding for the federal school law.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said cuts in inefficient programs are necessary to achieve a balanced budget. Officials also said that the plan, if approved, would mean that funding for No Child Left Behind has risen 41 percent since the law was enacted five years ago.

The budget would add about $1 billion for the education law, most of it directed toward high schools to help pay for a proposed expansion of testing and other programs. It would add $300 million for school vouchers and cut special-education grants to states, compared with the Democrats' proposal for this year.

"The cuts in this budget for students with disabilities and for young children are reprehensible and undermine the efforts of students and teachers who are working hard in classrooms across the country," Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0128512

The budget also would increase the maximum size of Pell grants for low-income college students to $4,600 from $4,050. The administration would pay for the boost by eliminating other student aid programs and cutting billions of dollars in subsidies to private companies that lend money to students.

Bush Seeks Renewal Of No Child Law (WT)

The $2.9 trillion spending blueprint calls for establishing a national expectation that all high school students will graduate on time and be prepared for college or the workplace.

Bush is seeking more than a $1 billion increase in Title I grants for students attending high schools in low-income areas and $100 million for reading programs. Some $412 million is being sought to help pay for achievement testing.

The budget calls for greater emphasis on math and science. It also seeks to improve performance at struggling schools and more school choices for students currently attending below-average schools.

The budget provides for nearly $91 billion in financial aid for college students, increasing maximum Pell Grant awards from $4,600 in 2008 to $5,400 in five years. Academic Competitiveness Grants also would increase awards to deserving low-income students by 50 percent.

Why Are We Still Free? Because We're Vigilant and Nuclear-Equipped

With all due respect to Hiroshima Mayor Tadatoshi Akiba ("With 20/20 Foresight, Mayors Around the World Join to End Nuclear War," Letters, Jan. 23), nuclear deterrence has protected U.S. soil from conventional attack, keeping our country inviolate since a few years after Imperial Japanese forces landed in the Aleutian Islands in June of 1942. For more than 60 years, the U.S. nuclear triad (aircraft, naval vessels and ICBMs) has provided the guarantee of massive retaliation in response to an attack by a rogue state, a deterrent unmatched by any other means of defense.

Prior to the development of nuclear weapons, the security of nations rested on conventional forces. These forces, while strong, were not infallible and could be bested by a dastardly surprise attack, as evidenced by the terrible events of Dec. 7, 1941. With no fear of instantaneous obliteration by way of an irresistible retaliatory nuclear strike, a nation, even in the 21st century, might feel emboldened to launch a bold strike against a fellow nation.

While the events of Sept. 11, 2001, prove that the U.S. faces a new enemy of a stateless nature, the remnants of 20th century rogue states, like Iran and North Korea, remain a threatening reality in the new millennium.

Mayor Akiba refers to the cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki as the victims of nuclear attack. I'd ask him to consider those cities as the victims of Imperial Japanese national arrogance and temporary insanity, from a sad period in history when Japan was a rogue nation, perpetrating brutalities upon the peace-loving peoples of several countries. Until the propensity to launch ruthless surprise attacks is somehow removed from the human psyche, I must respectfully disagree with Mayor Akiba and call for the retention of U.S. nuclear retaliatory capabilities.

As an American, I sleep soundly knowing that Trident-equipped U.S. naval submarines lurk deep beneath the waves, Minuteman III missiles wait silently in their silos on the Great Plains and Air Force bombers are ready to deploy, should any nation attempt some desperate gambit and attack our country. The U.S. has the stated position of using nuclear weapons only in retaliation to an attack on our country. Until we abrogate that commitment, I support our remaining vigilant, resolute and nuclear-equipped.

Strict Rules Threaten Release of New Drugs

As a physician, I am concerned about the serious impact the Vioxx scandal may have on patient care by changing the drug-regulation landscape for the worse ("Drug Makers Try to Bring Back Cox-2 Inhibitors," Marketplace, Jan. 19). The general opinion held by most pharmaceutical-industry insiders and drug-stock analysts is that the Food and Drug Administration will now exhibit stricter drug-approval standards because of the accusations it has faced concerning drug safety. This may lead to the FDA requesting excessively detailed safety data before licensing a medicine. Should such a cautious approach not be welcomed? Will drugs not be safer as a result? Isn't this how things should have been done all along?

DOJ_NMG_0128513

Stricter drug-approval standards won't necessarily be good for the public if it means that ground-breaking drugs spend longer in clinical trials and, hence, take a greater period of time to reach the market. I fear that patients with life-threatening diseases may have to wait longer than necessary to receive novel drugs in years to come.

With the arrival of the genomic revolution, we are about to enter a period of great and sustained drug advancement. In the next decade or two, personalized medicines -- drugs that are tailored to a person's genes -- will become reality and assist in the fight against the world's biggest killer diseases. Wouldn't it be a pity if the Vioxx scandal was to slow down such ground-breaking drug development? I think so.

Russ Displays Moxie

Kimberley A. Strassel is right to recognize Russ Feingold as one of the few in Congress with the courage of his convictions regarding our future course of action in Iraq ("Senator Feingold's Sin," Potomac Watch, Feb. 2). Whether you agree with him or not, and I for one decidedly do not, he's at least standing for something other than re-election. Chuck Hagel, John Warner and the majority of their peers seek to fashion themselves as leonine statesmen in the mold of Pericles, Cato and Henry Clay. In reality they're more like Bert Lahr in "The Wizard of Oz": They talk a great game, but lack either the moral fortitude or political courage to actually put their high-sounding words into action.

Vouchers Divert Funds From Public Schools

Your Jan. 30 editorial "Voucher Comeback" endorses the use of public funds for private school tuition as a way to give parents "more education choices." The real choice is whether every child deserves an opportunity to attend a good school, or not. That's an easy choice for most parents and voters, which is why vouchers have been rejected at the ballot box by a cumulative margin of two to one in 13 states and the District of Columbia.

Experimental voucher projects have been tried in some places, including Milwaukee, Cleveland and Washington. In none of those cities have vouchers led to any sustained improvement in the academic performance of the students who participated.

By diverting much-needed public funds from our public schools, the widespread use of vouchers would actually reduce attractive choices for most parents. Since most elite private schools charge higher fees than vouchers would provide, they would only serve as a subsidy for students already attending private schools as the Cleveland experiment has proven. Everyone else would be left in public schools with dwindling resources.

The way to give parents more positive choices is to improve our public schools. The NEA agrees with President Bush that the No Child Left Behind Act should be reauthorized; meantime, we have a positive agenda to improve the law.

Kill the Income Tax By Spending Restraint

Thank you for drawing national attention to the important movement to abolish state income taxes ("Rich States, Poor States," Review & Outlook, Jan. 25). Here in Georgia we have a unique opportunity to reduce and even abolish the state income tax; however, we take issue with Georgia Majority Leader Jerry Keen telling the Journal that the only options on the table are the flat tax or expanding the sales tax to pay for income tax cuts.

Americans for Prosperity-Georgia has introduced a plan modeled on Gov. Mark Sanford's proposal for South Carolina that would use spending restraint to phase out the income tax to complete repeal, without raising any other tax.

DOJ_NMG_0128514

Designed by economist Barry Poulson of the University of Colorado, our plan, based on the most conservative possible assumptions, could eliminate the income tax by 2021 exclusively through spending restraint. The key to this plan would be the adoption of a constitutional amendment to place a cap on spending growth, which has been introduced as Senate Resolution 20. While states are considering pro-growth tax reform measures like income tax reduction and elimination, it is crucial that they also restrain spending to keep the overall burden of government under control.

Bush Plan Would Raise Grants To Low-income Students (USAT)

By Sandra Block
USA Today, February 6, 2007

The budget President Bush proposed Monday would increase federal grants to low-income college students by 33% over five years and pay for it by reducing subsidies to private lenders.

The Bush plan calls for raising the maximum Pell grant, which hasn't been increased since 2003, to $5,400 from $4,050 over five years. To offset the cost, the administration proposes reducing interest-rate subsidies to private lenders by half a percentage point. The reduction would save the government an estimated $12.4 billion over five years, the Bush administration said.

Lenders that provide federally guaranteed student loans denounced the proposal. Sallie Mae, the largest lender, said in a statement that the cuts would cause fewer lenders to participate in the federal loan program.

Also critical was the Consumer Bankers Association, which said the cuts would slash lenders' profit margins by about 20%.

"Driving away banks from this program will leave students with either a government monopoly or an oligopoly of loan providers and few, if any, of the benefits currently provided by competition," CBA President Joe Belew said in a statement. "Without banks in the student loan program, graduates can look forward to IRS-style quality of service."

News of the plan sparked a sell-off in shares of publicly traded lenders. Sallie Mae's shares fell $4.09 to $42.37, a decline of 8.8%. Shares of Nelnet, a Lincoln, Neb.-based lender, fell $2.65 to $25.05, a drop of 9.6%.

Consumer groups and student advocates countered that lenders are highly profitable and could easily withstand lower subsidies. Student lenders are "one of the most heavily subsidized and lucrative financial industries" in the country, said Luke Swarthout of the U.S. Public Interest Research Group's Higher Education Project.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, called the current level of subsidies "outrageous," and said the Bush plan "shows how a Democratic Congress is changing the nation's priorities on student aid."

Robert Shireman, director of the Project on Student Debt, said the proposal will spark a healthy debate in Congress, which must approve any final budget plan. "This is a good time for Congress to look at what the level of subsidies should be and how do we get the most bang for our taxpayer dollars," he said.

Though Pell grants are the primary source of federal aid for low-income students, the value of the grants hasn't kept up with tuition inflation.

Pell grants covered only 33% of the average cost of tuition, fees, room and board at a public college or university in 2005-06, down from 42% in 2001-02, according to the College Board.

Twenty years ago, the maximum Pell grant covered nearly 60% of that cost.

Bush Budget Proposes Cut In Student-Lender Subsidy (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0128515

By John Godfrey

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush is proposing a 50-basis-point cut in student lender rate subsidies and increasing lender risk as part of a plan to save the government $95 billion in entitlement spending by 2012.

The proposal would affect Sallie Mae, Student Loan Corp. and Nelnet.

"Student lenders are the big issue this morning. It really caught people by surprise," said Brian Gardner, Washington research analyst with Keefe, Bruyette, & Woods, Inc.

Sallie Mae and other student lenders came out against similar proposals earlier this year, warning that cutting the margins will hurt students.

"Our margin on a guaranteed student loan is 50 basis points, so it is a razor-thin margin," Sallie Mae spokesman Tom Joyce said last month.

Mr. Gardner said Mr. Bush's proposal "has the potential to drive lenders away from the industry as margins shrink. It has the ability to reduce capital available to college students."

Mr. Bush is also asking for another $5.5 billion hike in premiums paid to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., a follow-up to legislation he signed into law last year that would weaken in the near-term pension funding rules. The premium increase would bring those premiums closer to what a private financial institution would charge for insuring the same risk, according to the White House.

"These reforms would improve PBGC's financial condition and safeguard the future benefits of American workers," the budget document said.

The bulk of the savings in that plan, $66 billion, would come from changes to Medicare, including increased Medicare premiums for upper-income Americans. Details of the Medicare proposal were leaked this weekend and Democrats have already begun to criticize it.

"Rather than trying to solve our health care crisis by lowering costs and covering more people, the president's plan will make the crisis worse by raising costs and failing to cover those who need it most -- our nation's children," Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pension Committee Chairman Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.), said.

Sen. Kennedy and the Democratically controlled Congress is far more likely to propose cuts in subsidies to health insurers if they decide to seek out savings in Medicare.

But Sen. Kennedy and other Democrats had already begun looking to subsidies to student lenders to finance education spending increases they prefer.

Under the Bush administration plan, the government would pay lenders $13.5 billion less over the next five years, according to White House estimates.

Another $3.3 billion would be saved by reducing subsidies to student loan guaranty agencies and another $3.2 billion would be saved by eliminating the Federal Perkins Loan revolving funds entirely.

The bulk of those student loan savings under Mr. Bush's plan would be used to gradually increase the Pell Grant maximum to $5,400. The bulk of that increase would not take effect until after Mr. Bush had left office in 2009.

Net of the spending increase, overall changes to student aid programs would save the government an estimated $2.9 billion over the next five years.

The proposal is substantially more ambitious than one being pursued in Congress, in which lawmakers also reduced lender guarantees, but cut the lender rate subsidy by just 10 basis points.

The proposal, approved 356 to 71 on Jan. 17 by the House of Representatives, would save the government $5.9 billion in lender subsidies and another $1.2 billion in guaranty agency subsidies.

The House bill would use the savings to offset the cost of cutting student loan interest rates to 3.4% from 6.8% over the next five years. Mr. Bush opposes that plan, arguing that "student debt loads have soared in recent years, and it is not clear that encouraging more loans is a wise course," according to a statement released by his Office of Management and Budget.

The Senate is expected to consider a similar student-loan interest-rate cut, but the author there, Sen. Kennedy, would prefer to offset the cost of the rate cut by pushing students into direct student loan programs, in theory generating savings for the program by cutting out private lender middlemen.

Bush '08 Budget Falls Short On Money For Border Fence (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

President Bush's new budget would pay for only about half of the 700 miles of U.S.-Mexico border fence he and Congress four months ago promised to build.

DOJ_NMG_0128516

With Mr. Bush trying to prove to Republicans he is serious about immigration law enforcement, his budget makes good on his promise to fund 3,000 new U.S. Border Patrol agents, putting him near his goal of doubling the agency's size. He also included funding for 22 new Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) teams to identify and deport illegal aliens serving time for criminal convictions.

The White House budget asks for $1 billion in new money to build the fence. Even coupled with $1.5 billion appropriated in the past two years, this would not pay for the entire fence called for in a bill Congress passed and the president signed into law in October.

"If you mean double-strand or double-fence for 700 [miles], no," said Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman. The $2.5 billion could pay for either 700 miles of single-tier fence, or 370 miles of double-tier fence, along with cameras, sensors and other technology to build a "virtual fence" along the other parts.

The Department of Homeland Security has argued that only 370 miles of actual border fencing is needed, saying a "virtual fence" would suffice elsewhere. Congress, though, rejected that and insisted on 700 miles of double-tier fencing, even specifying its general locations in the bill.

Congressional fence supporters said Mr. Bush must make good on the entire fence.

"We want to see the full fence built -- every smuggler's corridor is designated with a time and physical description to see a double fence," said Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican, who wrote the first bill to put fencing along key crossings.

While the fence would cover about 700 miles of the border, Mr. Hunter said it would amount to 854 miles of actual fencing. He said by his calculations, enough money is either already in the pipeline or included in the new budget to build all or almost all of that.

Overall, the Homeland Security budget would increase 1.3 percent -- a figure Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat and chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, called "ridiculous."

And Rep. David E. Price, North Carolina Democrat and chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on homeland security, said his panel will scrub the request to try to figure out what changes are needed.

"The subcommittee will need to take a fresh look at whether essential security priorities would be adequately supported under this budget," he said.

Border security fared best among Homeland Security Department programs.

Spending on U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) would rise to $8.8 billion, up from $6.4 billion this year, and ICE spending would increase from $4.4 billion to $4.8 billion.

But the biggest challenge in meeting the hiring goal is to recruit and train agents.

T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, said the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center in Artesia, N.M., can't handle the load.

"They clearly have to look beyond Artesia," he said. "There's only so far you can expand that, and part of the problem is the community itself isn't large enough to house all the instructors."

CBP Commissioner W. Ralph Basham told The Washington Times in an interview last year that an aggressive recruiting effort by the agency had resulted in "no want for applicants."

Mr. Basham said an ongoing attrition rate for the Border Patrol of about 4 percent -- significantly down from previous years -- meant that 8,800 new agents ultimately would have to be hired and trained by 2009 to fill the 6,000 slots Mr. Bush called for in a May speech that sought to boost the Border Patrol's numbers to 18,000.

To meet the president's goal, Mr. Basham -- who once headed the training center -- said the agency had reduced the total number of days the trainees attend the academy, "but not the training they receive." He said the overall training schedule was reduced in October from 92 to 81 days.

Bush Plan Leaves Alternative Minimum Tax Untouched (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush's budget ducks tough issues such as shoring up Social Security and overhauling the alternative minimum tax, which threatens to punish millions of middle-class taxpayers in coming years.

The tax was intended to close loopholes for the rich, but it wasn't indexed to adjust for inflation, so income that once was considered rich is today middle-class and threatened by the AMT.

For several years, Congress has avoided the AMT's impact on middle-class families by passing one-year patches. Bush's budget assumes no more patches after the 2008 tax year. He also assumes that new revenues from the AMT will help him balance the budget by 2012. Congress is unlikely to go along, however.

DOJ_NMG_0128517

"The budget rests on the assumption that the AMT will be allowed to expire and affect more than 40 million households in 2012, something nobody believes would be allowed," said Robert Greenstein, executive director of the liberal Center for Budget and Policy Priorities, a research organization.

The president takes a pass on how he thinks the AMT issue will be resolved. With each passing year it would rake in more revenues for the Treasury if left unfixed - $93 billion by 2012, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office.

Bush also assumes that Congress will make permanent his first-term tax cuts, which are set to expire in 2010. If the tax reductions were made permanent and the AMT were allowed to hit millions of Americans, the AMT would reclaim any benefits from the cuts for many taxpayers.

On Social Security, the president repeats his 2005 call to let individuals divert portions of their payroll taxes into stocks and bonds. He now envisions this beginning in 2012, three years after he's left office. He offers no long-term fix for the retirement program, despite the impending retirement of the baby boom generation, which will strain its finances.

On health care, Bush pledges to squeeze $78 billion from projected federal spending increases over the next five years. He'd cut the rate of payment increases for health-care providers and increase premiums for wealthier retirees.

He also proposes a new $15,000 standard deduction for health-insurance costs but offers no comprehensive solution for the 46 million Americans who lack health insurance.

The AARP, the powerful lobby for older Americans, on Monday accused the president of punting on health care with "piecemeal cuts that threaten to damage critical programs without addressing the fundamental problems."

The Budget Battle And Your Wallet (WSJ)

By Tom Herman And Anne Marie Chaker

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

With Democrats now in control of Congress, many proposals President Bush made yesterday affecting individuals' wallets -- including killing the estate tax and overhauling the tax treatment of health-insurance benefits -- appear to be heading for the cutting-room floor.

But a few others, such as giving the Internal Revenue Service more money to pursue tax dodgers and protecting millions of people for another year from being ensnared in the alternative minimum tax, could attract bipartisan support.

Here is how the president's proposed $2.9 trillion budget may affect your pocketbook.

TAXES: The president is asking for nearly $2 trillion in net tax cuts over the next decade, mainly by extending provisions scheduled to expire in coming years. For example, the top 15% rate on long-term capital gains and most corporate dividends is set to expire at the end of 2010. So are today's federal income-tax rates, which range as high as 35%. Without legislation, those rates would head higher starting in 2011.

Don't expect Congress to act soon on the president's proposals to make those tax rates permanent. Lawmakers effectively have punted that issue into the elections of 2008, and beyond, amid continuing concern about reining in the federal budget deficit.

The budget also includes a plan to prevent the rapid spread this year of the alternative minimum tax, a parallel tax system designed originally to prevent a small number of wealthy people from dodging federal income taxes completely. Because the AMT wasn't indexed for inflation, it's now hitting many middle-income families, too. A Treasury official said about four million taxpayers will get hit by the AMT for 2006, and if Congress does nothing, that number will soar to about 25 million people for 2007.

Some kind of AMT fix is likely to win congressional approval. Among those already feeling the pinch of the AMT are many people who live in high-tax areas, such as New York City, New Jersey, and California and those with large families.

As expected, the president reiterated his request to Congress to kill the federal estate tax permanently. Under current law, this tax will disappear in 2010 but only for that one year.

Democrats are clear they won't go along with permanent repeal. Instead, look for an eventual compromise that includes raising the basic exclusion from the tax and cutting the top rate, thus reducing the number of people affected by it. This year, the basic estate-tax exclusion is $2 million, and the top rate is 45%. Some lawmakers have discussed increasing the exclusion to somewhere in the range of $3 million to $5 million.

Part of the budget calls for new steps to attack the nation's so-called tax gap, the difference between what the government collects each year and what it should be collecting. IRS researchers have estimated the gap is about $290 billion. .

One proposal: The president wants Congress to require many securities brokers, mutual funds and others to report what investors pay for stocks and funds. The information is relevant in figuring tax on capital gains, or the profit investors make when they sell. Treasury says it would increase compliance on capital-gains taxes.

The budget estimates the measure, which would apply to securities acquired after 2008, would rake in about $6.7 billion over 10 years. Key details of the plan aren't yet available, said a Treasury spokesman. Some Democrats have already come out in favor of similar legislation.

This proposal is "very constructive," said a spokeswoman for the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, a trade group.

STUDENT FINANCIAL AID: President Bush proposed cutting the subsidy that banks and other student-lending companies receive from the federal government. Lenders say this would likely mean cuts in student benefits, such as 24-hour hot lines and discounts for on-time payments. Democrats have proposed a similar move, so the question will be, how deep the cuts?

The president also proposed cutting entirely certain student-aid programs, including the Perkins Loan, Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant and Leveraging Educational Assistance Partnership grants for needy students. Mr. Bush tried, and failed, to eliminate some of these programs in the past and it's doubtful he'll succeed this year with a Democratic Congress.

The administration wants to apply the savings to other aid that affects more students, including raising the annual loan limit on subsidized Stafford loans by $2,000 for third- and fourth-year students. Stafford loans, which have a current limit of $5,500, are the government's biggest student-loan program.

The administration also proposed raising the annual limit students receive from the Pell Grant program -- which provides needy students with money that doesn't have to be repaid. The limit would be increased to $4,600 in the 2008-2009 academic year from the current $4,050, and ultimately to $5,400 in 2012-2013.

Pell Grant recipients are likely to see some increase. A Democratic bill introduced last month would boost the limit by a greater amount. But it's uncertain what will happen with subsidized Stafford loans. While Mr. Bush proposed raising loan limits, Democratic legislation that passed the House last month would cut interest rates.

HEALTH: Mr. Bush proposed requiring more higher-income seniors to pay more for Medicare. Currently, about 1.5 million seniors -- individuals with incomes above $80,000 a year and couples with incomes above $160,000 -- pay higher premiums in Medicare's Part B, which covers physician and outpatient services. Those income levels currently are indexed for inflation, but the president's proposal would eliminate that and expand the means testing to include the the new drug benefit, Part D. Officials expect the means testing of Part D to affect more than 1.1 million seniors in 2008. It's not clear how this proposal will fare in the Democratic-controlled Congress. While many Republicans and some Democrats have supported the limited means testing in Medicare that has already begun, many Democrats have opposed it. And senior citizens' groups aren't likely to support expanding means testing unless the resulting savings are used to improve the program, which isn't part of the Bush proposal.

The budget also calls for major tax-law changes designed to make health insurance more affordable, but also threatens to raise taxes on many upper-income Americans. But with so many competing health plans on the table, there is little chance the president's proposal will be enacted. (See related article.4)

Funding For Treating Sewage At Mexican Border Is Sought (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

The White House, stepping into a controversy over cross-border pollution from Mexico, asked Congress for $71.7 million to enhance treatment of sewage drifting from Tijuana to communities in Southern California if a plan to use a private contractor falls through.

Until 2000, the U.S. had planned to expand treatment of sewage from Tijuana at an existing government-owned treatment plant on the border in San Ysidro, Calif. The intent was to help stem pollution from raw sewage causing beach closings and damaging a wildlife estuary on the U.S. side.

The amount of sewage produced by Tijuana, Mexico and sent gushing toward the U.S. has jumped over the years. See photos.2

As reported in a Jan. 29 Wall Street Journal page-one article3, a group of Southern California lawmakers was able to cut off funding for that plan and instead helped a start-up company, Bajagua LLC, a generous contributor to their campaigns, get a no-bid contract to build an entirely new plant on the Mexican side of the border.

The article reported that Bajagua recently missed crucial deadlines spelled out in its contract, including for obtaining land, permits and financing. The White House proposal, part of the president's 2008 budget plan, would expand treatment at the San Ysidro plant if Bajagua fails to meet the requirements by May 2, 2007.

Federal officials say the proposed appropriation was spurred mainly by worry that the government may violate a federal-court order on treating the sewage if the Bajagua project doesn't materialize. However, if Bajagua does meet requirements, the proposal calls for spending $3 million to cover a month's worth only of the Bajagua project's initial costs.

DOJ_NMG_0128519

The San Ysidro plant currently takes 25 million gallons a day of raw Tijuana sewage and treats it only to preliminary standards before discharging it into the Pacific Ocean. That fails to meet the federal Clean Water Act standards, and the federal agency that operates the plant is under a strict order by a federal court to upgrade the treatment by late 2008. The new budget proposal for the first time would make funds available for additions to the San Ysidro plant if the Bajagua project falls through.

A Budget Ax Over 'Harry Potter Crowd' (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

Christian Science Monitor, February 6, 2007

ASHLAND, ORE.

In a corner of southwestern Oregon, a century's worth of American history is bumping up against the politics of federal spending. As a result, all 15 public libraries in Jackson County could be shuttered in a few weeks for loss of federal payments.

Washington, Alaska, Montana, and other states would be affected as well. In California, more than 4,500 schools face imminent teacher and administrator layoffs.

As a portion of President Bush's $2.9 trillion budget sent to Congress Monday, not much money is involved: about $800 million or so. But the cutoff in funding has united lawmakers across the political spectrum – from Sen. Ted Stevens (R) of Alaska on the right to Sen. Barbara Boxer (D) of California on the left. Normally mild- mannered Sen. Gordon Smith (R) of Oregon is threatening to filibuster a $464 billion continuing resolution meant to fund the federal government for the rest of the fiscal year because of what is, in essence, a quirk of history.

The controversy also highlights the difficulties of fairly allocating federal money in rural areas where the government owns so much of the land. On one hand, federal ownership crimps growth and constrains the tax base. On the other hand, residents in some of these localities pay less in state and local taxes than residents in other states.

The story starts about 100 years ago when Congress allotted 25 percent of timber harvest revenues from national forests to rural counties and school districts. Forty-one states around the country benefited from the program, mostly in the West where much (in some states most) of the land is owned by the federal government.

"For generations, these timber receipts provided funds to offset the fact that local communities cannot tax the federal government," Senator Smith said on the floor of the Senate recently.

Then came federal environmental laws, including the Endangered Species Act. Combined with what critics said was overcutting and the loss of timber jobs, the industry saw its revenues fall by some 70 percent in the 1990s. As a result, says Smith, "When timber harvest evaporated, so did county budgets."

In 2000, Congress passed the "Secure Rural Schools and Community Self Determination Act" meant to make up the difference. It covered more than 700 counties in 39 states, with Oregon getting the largest amount because it had been most affected – including when the federal government back in 1937 took over more than 2 million acres of timberland from a railroad company charged with fraud.

But that law expired last year. With budget deficits and expensive foreign wars, western lawmakers face an uphill battle getting it renewed.

"Frankly, it's a tough sell," says John Snider, a congressional staffer for Rep. Greg Walden (R) of Oregon. "Back East, they can tax almost every piece of land."

As a result, says Jackson County commissioner Dave Gilmour, "We're now in a terrible situation with funding." At a recent public forum in the old National Guard armory in Ashland, Ore., he said the county plans to lay off 30 positions in health and human services, reduce the number of jail beds, and cut back on information technology slots.

But it's the libraries that have gotten the most attention. Rallies have been held, and book lovers have packed public hearings.

At a county commission meeting last week, grade-schooler Bronson Samel-Garloff could barely see over the podium as he offered the perspective of the "Harry Potter" crowd: "I'm reading three series of books right now, so I guess I'll have to buy the rest of them."

Erin Brender juggled her squirming 11-month-old son Sulayman as the two of them led those present in a chorus of "Itsy Bitsy Spider." The point, she said, was that "the-babies-in-the-library program lays the foundation for a lifetime of literacy and learning."

Not everyone feels this way. In letters to the editor and website postings, some have questioned the place of libraries filled with books when more and more people are getting their information online. Others wonder why federal taxpayers should foot the bill when the per capita state and local tax burden here is lighter than in 34 other states. And there are those who say the situation argues for a resumption of logging.

However it turns out, it's one more chapter in the continuing story of a region transitioning from "old West" economies based on natural resources to a "new West" of high-tech and recreation.

Fiscal Revelation (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

Politicians are typically late in picking up trends, so it will be interesting to see how long it takes Washington to acknowledge the big story in the Fiscal 2008 budget that President Bush unveiled yesterday: To wit, with a little spending restraint, Congress could balance the budget in no time.

You wouldn't know this from all the garment-rending yesterday in response to Mr. Bush's proposal to spend the not-so-meager sum of $2.9 trillion. Our favorite agonist is Kent Conrad, the Senate Budget Committee Chairman, and he didn't disappoint. "The President's budget is filled with debt and deception, disconnected from reality, and continues to move America in the wrong direction," said the Senator who was himself blocked from sneaking nearly $5 billion in "emergency" farm spending into a military construction bill in the final days of the last Congress. The North Dakotan needs to keep shouting disaster in a crowded political theater so he can justify his desire for a big tax increase.

The news Mr. Conrad won't broadcast is that over the past three years the federal deficit has shrunk by 58%. The Congressional Budget Office -- not the White House -- is estimating that the current year's deficit (for fiscal 2007) will fall to $172 billion. That's not bad given continuing Katrina relief spending, $30 billion for homeland security, and a couple hundred billion or so to fight the war on terror.

The White House is projecting that its new budget will eliminate the deficit by 2012 assuming Mr. Bush's tax cuts are extended after 2010. We don't put much stock in future budget forecasts because they depend on so many variables. But even CBO predicts the deficit should remain near or below 1% of GDP for the rest of the Bush Presidency. That's well below the 40-year average of 2.4% of GDP.

This also means that the federal debt burden will continue to fall. Alarmists point to the $1.4 trillion rise in total federal debt from 2003-2006, but that amount is dwarfed by the $14 trillion in new household wealth created over the same period. And for all the international scolding of an allegedly profligate America, U.S. federal debt as a share of GDP is falling again (see the top chart nearby). At 37% in 2006 and heading south, the U.S. figure compares to 52% in Germany, 43% in France, and 79% in Japan. Once again rising total "debt" is a scare word used to justify higher taxes.

The real game to watch isn't debt or deficits but spending. Here, too, Mr. Bush has an improved track record in his second term. From 2001-2005, outlays ballooned by $609 billion, or 33%, and Mr. Bush never did veto a spending bill. By contrast, on current pace his second term outlays will grow by 21% -- hardly tightfisted, but a third slower.

The other news you won't often hear concerns the soaring tax revenues in the wake of the 2003 supply-side tax cuts. Tax collections have risen by $757 billion, among the largest revenue gushers in history. Receipts, especially from high-income individuals and corporations, have been growing for some two years at nearly twice the rate of spending, which explains the falling deficit. Economic growth is always the key to eliminating red ink, which is why keeping this 63-month expansion rolling needs to be the main domestic priority. This requires making those lower 2003 tax rates permanent, rather than letting them expire in 2010 and socking the economy with the biggest tax increase in history.

The more immediate budget brawl between Mr. Bush and Democrats will be how to divide that mere $2.9 trillion between guns and butter. Mr. Bush wants $245 billion more for Iraq and Afghanistan for 2007 and 2008. His overall Pentagon request of $606 billion in 2008 has been lambasted by Speaker Nancy Pelosi as a "huge number" and Democrats are moaning that their cherished social programs will suffer.

In fact, Mr. Bush's request would only bring defense outlays to 4.2% of GDP, or about 20% of total federal spending. That compares to 4.7% of GDP even under Jimmy Carter, and 6.2% of GDP in 1986 at the peak of the Reagan defense buildup (see bottom chart). Budgets are about setting priorities, and if Democrats agree that defeating terrorism is vital they will put it ahead of funding the National Endowment for the Arts.

Or how about capping subsidies to farmers with incomes above $200,000? Senator Conrad could lead by example in accepting that White House proposal, and in return zero out Mr. Bush's $200 million political sop for state and local police.

All in all, the fiscal news is so good that the tax hike lobby has had to do a bait-and-switch and fret about the "long-term." Somehow this wasn't a priority when Democrats and Republicans alike were trying to kill Social Security reform in 2005. But all of a sudden penury is said to be right around the corner. Well, Congress could always reform those programs, but don't hold your breath. Mr. Bush is proposing a very modest $96 billion reduction in the growth of Medicare and other entitlements over five years, and Democrats are already outraged.

The best news in yesterday's budget may be that Mr. Bush seems to be rediscovering some fiscal nerve. His proposals won't raise taxes, while using the power of the market to combat problems in health care, and putting a tight leash on domestic discretionary programs. Defense gets the bulk of spending increases, as it should in a time of war. Maybe we'll finally get a debate over national spending priorities.

Mr. Bush's Deficit Dance (WP)

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

HAVING PILED UP record deficits, President Bush now promises black ink by 2012 -- three years after he leaves office. The fiscal 2008 budget the president submitted to Congress yesterday shows Mr. Bush's purported path to a $61 billion surplus by 2012. Some of its approaches, particularly the effort to restrain the growth of Medicare through additional means-testing and cutting payments to providers, are commendable; they merit more serious consideration by Congress than they appear destined to receive. The administration also deserves credit for a more candid acknowledgment of the likely cost of the war in Iraq than in budgets past. For the first time, the administration included a realistic estimate of the cost of operations in Iraq and Afghanistan for the coming year, $145 billion.

Yet Mr. Bush's balance is more illusory than real. It ignores known costs such as ameliorating the impact of the alternative minimum tax, which would top $90 billion in 2012 alone; the administration, once again, would simply affix a one-year patch for 2008. It assumes the government will collect far more revenue than the Congressional Budget Office projects, amounting to a $150 billion difference in 2012. No one should start spending Mr. Bush's projected surplus.

The more fundamental problem with Mr. Bush's supposedly balanced budget is its fundamentally unbalanced approach. He squeezes social programs while his tax cuts remain untouchable. An administration serious about fiscal prudence would have acknowledged that political and fiscal reality -- a new Democratic Congress, the ever-mounting costs of war -- demand reconsideration of some of the tax cuts. Instead, Mr. Bush yesterday insisted once again on extending them, at a cost of $1.6 trillion over the next 10 years.

That's not sustainable, particularly in light of the squeeze the administration wants to put on domestic spending. On top of emergency spending for the war, it would hike outlays for defense and homeland security by 10.7 percent next year and 23 percent over five years. By contrast, domestic discretionary spending would, depending on how you measure it, grow slowly -- 1 percent over each of the next five years, according to the administration's figures -- or actually shrink slightly.

Either way, the money available would increasingly fall behind as the population grows and inflation erodes the funding's purchasing power. A Democratic Congress is not going to accept -- nor should it -- cutting health insurance for low-income children or fuel assistance for the elderly while extending tax cuts for millionaires.

If Mr. Bush's budget is dead on arrival in this Congress, that increases pressure on the leadership there to come up with its own approach. Democrats have a new responsibility to propose realistic solutions to difficult problems and to demonstrate that they are willing to make the kinds of painful trade-offs for the country's long-term fiscal health that the president, once again, has ducked.

The Other Defense Budget (NYT)

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

American troops under fire in Iraq and Afghanistan deserve every penny requested for them in President Bush's new $622 billion Pentagon budget. And the overstretched Army and Marine Corps clearly need support, along with the extra troops that will eventually come their way. But that still leaves more than half of the overall request for Congress to carefully scrutinize and significantly prune.

Apart from war costs and personnel increases, this budget slips in more than $40 billion in other spending increases, compared with last year. Since Mr. Bush took office, the Pentagon budget has more than doubled. It is now higher, in real terms, than it has been in the past half-century.

Congress should direct particular attention to the roughly $140 billion in weapons procurement, research and development costs that are not part of the Iraq and Afghanistan section of the budget. Far too many of these programs are products of cold war strategic thinking and have outlived their rationale in a world with no superpower arms race.

That includes the $4.6 billion slated for the Air Force's F-22 stealth fighter, the $2.6 billion for the Marine Corps' tilt-wing V-22 Osprey, the $3 billion for the Navy's DDG-1000 stealth destroyer and $2.5 billion for the Virginia-class attack submarine. It also includes much of the $15.9 billion going to space weapons and missile defense.

Several of these programs can be canceled outright. The F-22 is one of three new-generation stealth fighters, and the most expendable because it was originally designed for air-to-air combat against Soviet-style MIG fighters. Likewise, the Virginia-class submarine was designed to track enemy nuclear submarines. The DDG-1000 is a blue-water fighting fortress, when what the Navy really needs these days is smaller, faster ships that can operate in shallow coastal waters.

It makes sense to provide the Navy and Air Force with adequate means to maintain their current comfortable margins of superiority over any probable foe. That can still be done for billions of dollars less than President Bush has just requested.

If the new Democratic-controlled Congress is serious about reducing budget deficits and finding the money to pay for acute domestic needs, it will have to pare back the most extravagant elements of this fantasy weapons wish list. Special responsibility falls on the Armed Services Committee chairmen in both houses, Senator Carl Levin and Representative Ike Skelton. Addiction to military pork is the one area in which bipartisanship has flourished in Washington in the past six years.

This nation can afford to pay for all of its legitimate military needs. What it cannot afford are costly jobs programs disguised as defense and the wasteful weapons projects promoted by an army of well-connected Washington lobbyists.

Fudging The Budget (NYT)

By Steven Rattner

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

WHEN President Bush sent his new budget to Congress yesterday, he trumpeted a continuing decline in the deficit and projected a swing back into the black by 2012.

But the accounting in the thick volumes issued by his Office of Management and Budget bears about as much similarity to the practices of private sector companies as Sanskrit does to Chinese. For sometimes obscure and sometimes political reasons, the federal government reports its finances in a way that portrays them far more favorably than they deserve.

The "official" deficit figure for the 2006 fiscal year is just under $250 billion. But a more accurate calculation would indicate a deficit nearly three times higher, and that is even without including some vast obligations the government owes. And while a strong economy is pushing down that headline deficit, the government's financial commitments actually grew more rapidly last year than in 2005.

In fact, the federal government itself obliquely acknowledges this chimera in a flotilla of other reports, including the obscure Financial Statement of the United States, prepared by the Government Accountability Office using methods closer to what a shareholder would find in an annual report.

These adjustments concentrate on one gap in federal budget bookkeeping: the government's failure to properly account for the cost of pensions for its own workers. Simply incorporating this liability would increase the federal deficit by roughly $200 billion.

But the official accounting is also misleading another way — specifically, in the way it handles Social Security. In 2006, the federal government received $185 billion more in Social Security taxes than it paid out in benefits. Unlike a private company, which keeps such overages in its pension fund to cover future benefits, the White House pockets the money and declares the deficit to be smaller.

Interestingly, until 1968, the federal government followed private sector practice by putting trust funds like Social Security in separate budgetary silos. Then President Lyndon B. Johnson appointed a commission that brought these programs into a new "unified budget."

While the commission argued that a single federal budget would be less confusing and more reflective of the government's overall impact on the economy, skeptical commentators noted the salubrious effect — in the midst of the Vietnam era guns-and-butter debate — of wrapping in the Social Security surplus.

Even if we adjusted properly for pensions and entitlements, we would leave unaddressed the largest financing gap, unheralded by President Bush yesterday: by some estimates, $39 trillion would have to be set aside now to pay for Social Security, Medicare and similar benefits that have already been promised. Just a year ago, those future obligations were $3 trillion less. Taken as a whole, the federal government's commitments have grown from $20 trillion in 2000 to $50 trillion today.

To be sure, arcane and even misleading accounting policies long predate the current administration; for the past 10 years, the G.A.O. has cited "material weaknesses in financial reporting" by the government. In recent Congressional testimony, David M. Walker, comptroller general of the accountability office, said, "Our fiscal and financial condition is worse than advertised."

And of course, the private sector has its shortcomings, particularly in providing medical benefits to retirees. But when it comes to pension obligations, the disparity is striking. Just two weeks ago, the consulting firm Towers Perrin reported that at the end of 2006, the pension funds of the Fortune 100 companies were actually overfinanced.

Meanwhile, in Washington, the damage from gaming federal accounting idiosyncrasies grows exponentially. When President Johnson created the unified budget for the 1969 fiscal year, the ultimate effect was to turn a deficit of $507 million into a surplus of $3.2 billion. Today, our budgetary sleight-of-hand obscures hundreds of billions of dollars of shortfalls.

Sadly, the solutions to this problem are well known and painful: more revenues (yes, including from rolling back President Bush's tax giveaway to the rich) or less spending (at long last, public outrage seems to be curbing the pork barrel "earmarking" process in Congress).

DOJ_NMG_0128523

But we'll have to go further than that. To make meaningful progress, we will need to tackle Social Security and Medicare. One glimmer of hope regarding Social Security has emerged from Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, whose many years of studying corporate financial statements doubtless contribute to his offering to work toward solutions with "no preconditions." Both Democrats and Republicans should pull up chairs at Secretary Paulson's table with open minds.

Building a political consensus behind difficult measures would be easier if the public were more accurately apprised of our fiscal condition. Unfortunately, simply importing private sector accounting practices wouldn't properly express the complexity of the federal government's activities and obligations.

Instead, we need to elevate "accrual accounting," which better measures the government's future pension responsibilities, to the same level of public visibility as the "cash accounting" figures that are now emphasized. And our primary measure of our deficit should exclude the Social Security surplus. Finally, our obligations for future entitlements payments — the $39 trillion — should also be emphasized in reports like today's.

Back in 1802, Thomas Jefferson beseeched his Treasury secretary to adopt finances for America "as clear and intelligible as a merchant's books" so that "every man of any mind in the union should be able to comprehend them." More than 200 years later, that advice remains regrettably unheeded.

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act tried to reform misleading private sector practices. The federal government needs a similar effort.

Tax-Law Crackdown To Raise $29.5 Billion (WSJ)

By Rob Wells

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration is launching an effort to collect an estimated $29.5 billion in uncollected taxes, partly through new reporting requirements on securities sales.

The proposals to close part of the estimated $290 billion tax gap are included in the White House's proposed $2.9 trillion budget plan for the 2008 fiscal year, released Monday. (See related article1.)

Overall, President Bush's fiscal 2008 budget calls for $1.85 trillion in tax cuts over the next 10 years, primarily by making his first-term tax cuts permanent law. As he has in years past, Mr. Bush wants Congress to make into permanent law the repeal of estate taxes, reductions in income tax rates, and lower capital gains and dividends taxes. These tax cuts are due to expire in 2011.

Several new proposals this year would address the "tax gap," a measure of uncollected taxes. The Bush budget would require corporations, investors and merchants to report more details of their business dealings to the Internal Revenue Service. This is part of a move to boost the overall compliance rate with the tax code, which was 86% in 2001.

A key proposal in this expanded "information reporting" includes new reporting requirements for the basis of publicly traded securities, which involves a measure of stock purchase price plus any necessary adjustments. The Bush budget has few details of the plan and a Treasury spokeswoman declined immediate comment.

Underreporting of capital gains resulted in $11 billion of the tax gap, according to a 2001 IRS estimate.

Proposals to address capital gains shortfalls have been made on Capitol Hill, however. Congress' Joint Committee on Taxation last year proposed brokers to report to the client and to the IRS the adjusted basis of publicly traded securities sold during the preceding taxable year.

One congressional tax expert, Marc J. Gerson of the law firm Miller & Chevalier, said the Democratic-controlled Congress would find such a proposal attractive, particularly under new budget rules that require any tax benefits to be offset with revenue increases.

"Congress will be looking for money and they will gravitate towards this," said Mr. Gerson, a former Republican staff member on the House Ways and Means Committee.

Industry groups have warned about the burden posed by such plans. The Securities Industry Association has said such a tax basis reporting requirement "presents substantial challenges for brokers."

DOJ_NMG_0128524

Other changes to tax information reporting would involve certain payments to corporations, expanded "broker information reporting," and reporting on merchant payment card reimbursements. It would also require a certified tax identification number from nonemployee service providers. And it would require increased information reporting for certain government payments for property and services. The plan also involves increased penalties for incomplete tax information returns.

The Bush budget plan also would expand a variety of tax penalties to deter wrongdoing by tax preparers, punish failure to comply with electronic filing requirements or for filing erroneous tax refunds.

Another major change would involve the airline ticket tax. The budget envisions a $69.7 billion tax cut due to modifying the "Airport and Airway trust fund," beginning in fiscal 2009. The budget said this proposal involves changing the funding of the Federal Aviation Administration.

"The FAA's current excise tax system, largely based on taxes on the price of airline tickets, does not have a direct relationship between the taxes paid by users and the air traffic control services provided by the FAA," the budget said.

"Under the reauthorization proposal, FAA would collect user fees from commercial aviation operators for air traffic control services starting in 2009," the proposal said.

New initiatives include revamping tax treatment of employer-provided health care. The President's proposals are designed to encourage more people to buy private health-care policies instead of relying solely on employer-provided plans.

This proposal would cost $121 billion through 2012, but it more than pays for itself through 2017, the budget contends, bringing in $5.15 billion over the 10 year period.

The proposal would classify employer-provided health insurance benefits as taxable income. It would give all taxpayers the same deduction for health insurance, $15,000 for families, $7,500 for singles. As a result, workers with a generous health plan, or "Cadillac" health plans, would pay taxes on the amount exceeding the deduction.

The budget also proposes expanding and making Health Savings Accounts more flexible, a $10.4 billion benefit.

In other areas, the Bush budget proposes $33 billion in tax incentives to boost savings and charitable giving, make health care more affordable, strengthen education and help the environment. It would permanently extend the corporate research and development tax credit, a proposal made in prior years.

It would repeal two energy tax breaks, such as a more favorable recovery period for natural gas distribution lines and write-offs for geological and geophysical exploration expenses. This would bring in $1.5 billion through 2017.

The budget would extend relief from the Alternative Minimum Tax for one year, in fiscal 2008, at a cost of $47.9 billion. The AMT was created in 1969 and was designed to halt tax evasion by the wealthy.

Congress failed to index the AMT to inflation and so it is capturing an increasing number of middle-income taxpayers in high-tax states such as New York, California and New Jersey. According to the Congressional Budget Office, with no change in law, the number of taxpayers subject to the AMT is expected to rise from four million in 2006 to 39 million by 2017.

Bush Proposes Change In How FAA Is Funded (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

President Bush told Congress he wants to scrap the passenger-ticket taxes used to help fund the air-traffic control system and replace them with user fees for commercial airlines.

The result, however, will be some air travelers, commercial airlines and corporate jet owners are likely to end up paying more to fly to pay for a new generation of traffic control technology.

If approved, the proposed changes would take effect in 2009 and mark a major shift in how the Federal Aviation Administration is funded. Fees would be assessed for flights depending on how much traffic controllers are used to guide them through the skies. It isn't yet clear if these fees would show up on tickets.

The current system uses a mixture of ticket taxes, fuel taxes and other add-ons to pay for air-traffic control. Business jets represent more than 18% of all flights, but they pay just 5% of those FAA fees. Airlines, which represent some two-thirds of flights but pay more than 90% of the fees, have long complained they are overpaying. They see this proposal as a victory of sorts.

"Whether there are three or 300 passengers on an aircraft, to an air traffic controller, a blip is a blip on the radar screen," said James C. May, president of the Air Transport Association, the leading airline trade group.

A major obstacle to getting the plan off the ground, though, is that the chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, Rep. Jim Oberstar (D., Minn.), has argued that the current tax system doesn't need changing.

"The proposal is pretty sketchy at this point," said Mr. Oberstar's spokesman, Jim Berard. "Until they can provide convincing evidence to change the system, then he isn't going to change the system."

There are 7,836 commercial airplanes and approximately 16,658 corporate aircraft registered in the U.S., according to the FAA. While the number of corporate aircraft is higher, commercial jets are used much more frequently and often fly longer distances, which adds to the workload of air traffic controllers. President Bush says the new system will better assess costs for using the air-traffic-control system.

Under the budget proposal, corporate jets and perhaps private aircraft would still fund the FAA through fuel taxes, albeit higher ones. That worries corporate fliers.

"We will be in overdrive" to lobby against the proposal, said Steve Brown, senior vice president of operations for the National Business Aviation Association, a Washington-based lobbying group. "We will contact all our members and you name it we will be out there."

FAA Administrator Marion Blakey demurred on details such as how much more in user fees would be generated to pay for the system. She said that more details would come "as early as next week" when the Bush administration plans to submit its plans for the reauthorization of FAA funding, due to expire later this year.

Next week, the Transportation Department is likely to spell out how the user-fee system would work, whether it would count the number of planes in the sky, how long they stay in the air, or landings and takeoffs.

What is clear though is that these proposed changes side with public commercial airliners rather than private corporate jets fliers in their debate over which is the fairer way to pay for use of the air traffic control system.

Commercial airliners pay through ticket taxes, the ones that Bush proposes to eliminate, and to a lesser extent fuel taxes.

Corporate fliers pay higher fuel taxes than commercial airliners for use of the system. But because corporate jets don't have ticket-paying passengers, they aren't subject to that tax.

Ms. Blakey said that there would be an increase in the fuel tax under the proposed system. "I think we will see increase on the fuel tax. I am talking about shifting of costs, not increasing of costs" overall.

McConnell Focuses On Judges As GOP Defines Top Priorities (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 6, 2007

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) is signaling to colleagues that he will take a personal and leading role in pressuring Democrats to confirm President Bush's judicial nominees, an issue that has received little attention since the election.

Republican senators agreed to make judicial nominees one of their top priorities at a one-day retreat held Friday at the Library of Congress before a meeting with Bush at the White House. Other key concerns, which senators designated in questionnaires they submitted to the Republican leadership, are fiscal policy, taxes, budget, healthcare, energy security, immigration reform and national security.

While Bush has said he still wants to push Social Security reform, the senators did not include it in their broad agenda for the next two years, indicating a lack of support for the measure.

At the retreat, various committees' ranking members led discussions on the GOP's highest priorities for the 110th Congress. Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), the top Republican on the Budget panel, led the discussion on fiscal policy and the budget. Sen. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.), ranking Republican on the Health Committee, led the debate on healthcare, and Energy and Natural Resources ranking member Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) spearheaded the talk on energy security.

McConnell kicked off the private talk on judges and reiterated his expectations of Democrats on judges during a press conference Monday.

"Senate Republicans expect that Bush be treated the same way during the last two years of his presidency as each of the last three presidents were treated in the last two years of theirs when the Senate was controlled by the opposition party," McConnell said yesterday.

McConnell said that during the last two years of the Reagan, the first Bush, and the Clinton administrations, the Senate confirmed an average of 17 circuit court nominees, adding that conversations with Senate Majority Leader Reid (D-Nev.) have left him optimistic "that standard will be met."

But that baseline would set a slightly faster pace for judicial confirmations than what the Senate followed in the last Congress when it confirmed 16 circuit nominees, according to the Department of Justice.

"That's a recognition that the best leverage we have isn't on the committee but on the floor, the ability to use leverage on the floor to insist on an up-or-down vote for judges," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), vice chairman of the GOP conference and a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

With a one-seat advantage on Judiciary, Democrats could slow the pace of judicial nominations to a trickle. But Republicans can pressure the panel to move more quickly by holding up Democratic legislative priorities on the chamber floor.

"I'm very encouraged by Sen. McConnell's personal interest in the subject," Cornyn said. "The role of the retreat was to agree on an approach and priorities."

DOJ_NMG_0128526

With the conference priorities in hand, GOP leaders will begin working on specific policies. “The retreat helped us focus on the issues that most concern our constituents,” said Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), the Senate GOP conference chairman. “The next step is working with the Policy Committee and our ranking members to add legislative detail to the guiding principles the conference crafted at our retreat. This is an ongoing process that will give every member an opportunity to help shape our agenda.”

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the ranking Republican on Judiciary, said he was comfortable with McConnell’s role. Specter worked with McConnell on the presentation before the meeting.

“McConnell started the discussion as to the confirmation process and then he asked me to supplement his views, which I did,” Specter said. “He’s the leader and I’m the ranking member. That sequence gave appropriate consideration to my position.”

Specter said Democrats seem willing to approve Bush’s court picks at an acceptable rate, noting that the committee approved five district court judges for a vote last week.

“Chairman [Patrick] Leahy (D-Vt.) has been entirely cooperative in moving judges,” he said. “The indicators are that Democrats will be responsive to continuing the confirmation of judges. I’m anticipating a cooperative approach.”

Sen. Mel Martinez (Fla.), the only Hispanic member of the GOP conference, led the discussion on immigration reform, an issue that split Senate Republicans last year. Martinez was careful not to spark another clash, emphasizing Republican consensus on such issues as the need to enhance border security and to ensure “the rule of law,” an allusion to the blind eye that law enforcement sometimes turns to illegal immigration.

Specter, who is known for his outspokenness and independence, said Martinez has special expertise on the issue, but cautioned that all facets of the challenge must be addressed.

“While you have to deal with two subjects appropriately, you have to handle the 11 million and the guest worker program as well,” he said, referring to America’s estimated 11 million illegal immigrants.

On national security, Republican lawmakers have reached a consensus on the need to increase the size of the military, something Bush made a priority in the budget his administration made public Monday. Republicans have also reached a rough consensus on opposing Democratic plans to cut funds for base closings in the continuing funding resolution that will soon reach the floor. A GOP leadership aide said that Republicans will raise the issue repeatedly when the Senate considers that measure.

On the issue of fiscal discipline and taxes, Republican senators discussed the need to produce legislative proposals that give voters a better understanding of how GOP policies benefit their personal finances.

“One of the big points was that we have to explain our economic policy and how we feel about budgeting and taxes,” a retreat participant said.

9th Circuit Steps Up En Banc Reviews (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, February 6, 2007

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals appears bent on reining in potential conflicts between its precedents and those in other circuits before they catch the eye of the U.S. Supreme Court.

The nation's largest federal appellate court issued 25 orders to rehear appeals by 15-judge en banc panels in 2006, the highest number in decades, with a whopping nine orders in one five-week period between Dec. 21, 2006, and Jan. 23, 2007, according to court records.

The latest spate of nine orders all came in criminal or habeas petitions.

"This is a noteworthy flurry of activity," said Arthur Hellman, a professor at the University of Pittsburgh School of Law who has written a book about the circuit and follows it closely. "One thing it says is the court is being proactive in clarifying its law."

Judge Alex Kozinski, a 9th Circuit judge since 1985 and slated to be chief judge at the end of the year, agreed. "There seems to be a greater willingness on the part of judges to view the en banc process as a continuing part of our responsibility in shaping circuit law," he said.

Circuit rules provide that a majority of the court's 26 active judges may order a full court reconsideration of three-judge panel decisions in a process known as en banc review. Because of the impracticality of all 26 judges sitting for rehearing, the circuit adopted a system of limited en bancs with random selections of 15 judges to rehear cases.

The en banc process is intended to eliminate conflicting panel decisions within the circuit and conflicts with precedents in other circuits.

In three of the nine cases that the court most recently voted to review en banc, the lower court panel had yet to issue a ruling. That generally happens when the three judges find a conflict within the circuit and refer the case to the entire court, according to Kozinski. Under circuit rules, three judges can't resolve the internal split; it must be done by en banc review.

PRO-GOVERNMENT RULINGS

Significant public policy issues may also drive en banc sessions, as in the case of a challenge to California's gubernatorial recall election that was reviewed and approved by an en banc panel in a nationally televised hearing.

In the late 1990s, former Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor encouraged 9th Circuit judges to take more cases en banc as a means of cutting down on its high reversal rate at the Supreme Court. The worst year for reversals was the high court's 1996-97 term, when it overturned 27 of 28 cases from the 9th Circuit.

After 1996, which had a low of 12 en banc reviews, the numbers fluctuated, with the highest, 23 cases, coming in 2003, until a new high of 25 cases was set last year, circuit figures show.

Hellman said one thing that stands out among the most recent cases taken up for en banc review is that in five of the panel decisions, four were in favor of the government and against the defendant. "I don't think you would see that in any other circuit, four out of five cases taken in quick succession to reconsider a favorable government ruling," he said.

In one of those cases, the court will examine the question of whether a potential airline passenger who passes successfully through a metal detector can then prevent the secondary screening by telling agents he has decided not to fly. U.S. v. Aukai, No. 04-10226. The three-judge panel said screeners should be allowed to search the passenger.

Another case under review held as harmless error the government's failure to disclose to the defense in a bank robbery case that someone who looked like the defendant had been convicted of nearby bank robberies. U.S. v. Jernigan, No. 05-10086.

Kozinski said the en banc process is "very disruptive and takes lots of resources." A lot of judges tend to vote against granting en bancs automatically because they philosophically oppose the en banc process. "It is a big bother and inconvenience," he said. But among newer judges, "it is viewed as an integral part of our work," he said.

He did not comment on individual cases but said, in general, "we pay attention to what other circuits do and if we look like an outlier we may take the case en banc." The thought is that the full court should do the extra work rather than create disagreement with another circuit, he said.

Snow Faults Bush Stand On Private Accounts (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

NEW YORK -- Former Treasury Secretary John Snow said the Bush administration's first effort to overhaul Social Security failed because the administration was "intransigent" on private accounts.

Mr. Snow, Treasury secretary from 2003 to 2006, said the administration's insistence that a Social Security fix include private accounts carved out of the program shifted the focus from making the retirement program solvent. It would have been better, he said, to propose private accounts on top of the existing program, as some Democrats suggested. "You can't do health-care reform or Social Security reform ... without a bipartisan consensus," Mr. Snow said at the Private Equity Analyst Outlook conference last week, organized by Dow Jones & Co., publisher of The Wall Street Journal. "If we made a mistake, it was not approaching it in more of a bipartisan way." The administration's "condition for engaging" was private accounts carved out of the existing Social Security system, said Mr. Snow now chairman of private-equity firm Cerberus Capital Management.

Senate Seeks Intelligence Hub To Shield Satellites (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

Congress is calling for the creation of a new National Space Intelligence Center to better spy on space-based and other threats to U.S. military, intelligence and commercial satellites.

A provision of the Senate intelligence authorization bill for fiscal 2007 would require the Bush administration to set up the new center within the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (ODNI). The plan was disclosed in a little-noticed section of committee's report on the bill made public Jan. 24.

The report stated that threats to U.S. satellites are increasing, a fact highlighted by China's recent test of an anti-satellite (ASAT) missile interceptor that destroyed a Chinese weather satellite. U.S. reliance on satellites for both national security and commerce is increasing and "a loss of any or all of these assets could do tremendous harm to our economy and security," the report said.

Intelligence spending on spying "concerning threats to our interests in space has declined markedly," and only 10 percent of current intelligence resources are focused on threats to space systems, the report said.

"Recent international events have only served to highlight this problem," the report said in a reference to China's Jan. 11 anti-satellite weapon test, which has drawn international criticism, and an earlier incident involving a Chinese laser illumination of a U.S. satellite in what U.S. intelligence officials said was likely a ground-based laser ASAT test.

Further details about the new center are contained in the classified portions of the Senate bill.

DOJ_NMG_0128528

A congressional aide close to the issue said the proposal has good support from Republicans and Democrats in Congress, and gained support after China's recent anti-satellite weapon test.

"We haven't been doing a very good job identifying what the threats are in space across the government," the aide said. "The idea of the center is basically to try to network the existing analytical staff around one office."

The White House said it supports improving space intelligence but has concerns about lines of authority in the current draft legislation.

Gordon Johndroe, a White House National Security Council spokesman, said the administration was "encouraged" by the committee plan to improve space-related intelligence, "but [we] are concerned that the National Space Intelligence Center will not solve the problems they are trying to address," he said, noting the legislation as now drafted "blurs lines of accountability and responsibility for space systems" between the ODNI and the Pentagon's intelligence policy office.

The Chinese ASAT test last month involved the launch of a missile into space with a nonexplosive warhead that destroyed the Chinese satellite. U.S. officials said it was a "wake-up call" on the danger of space weapons. According to U.S. intelligence officials, U.S. satellites have little or no ability to report whether they are under attack, or even threatened.

According to the Senate report, the space intelligence center would be devoted solely to gathering and analyzing intelligence on space threats, and would work closely with similar Air Force and Defense Intelligence Agency centers in Ohio and Alabama. The director would be the national Intelligence officer for science and technology.

Air Force Gen. Kevin Chilton, commander of the Air Force Space Command, the lead military unit for space defense and warfare, said recently there is an growing need for better intelligence on space threats because the danger of attacks on satellites is increasing.

"The knowledge base you need [for space intelligence] is different than the knowledge base you need for air-breathing intelligence, land intelligence or naval intelligence," he told reporters in September.

Pelosi Catches Nonstop Flights Home (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

Amid rumblings from conservatives that she is seeking special treatment, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D) will receive use of an Air Force jet larger than the one used by her predecessor, Rep. J. Dennis Hastert, so she can fly nonstop to her home in San Francisco.

Ever since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the speaker, who is next in line for the presidency after the vice president, has been given use of a government plane for security reasons. Hastert (R-Ill.), who had flown commercially before the attacks, was the first to have use of a plane. But the one he traveled in was too small to make it to California without refueling.

Yesterday, the House sergeant-at-arms issued a statement saying that the leadership is awaiting word from the Air Force on the rules for using the plane. It is unclear, for example, who can travel with Pelosi and whether she can return home from a political event on the taxpayer-funded plane.

Pelosi's office requested the guidelines, triggering a story in the Washington Times in which sources questioned whether she was asking for more than the former speaker received.

Democratic aides sputtered about a "right-wing hatchet job" to make Pelosi look bad. But, said one involved in the negotiations, "this is about security, not about convenience."

An aide in Hastert's office said yesterday that the former speaker used the plane for official business but not for political travel. He did at times transport his wife and staff when he was flying to and from Illinois.

Brendan Daley, a spokesman for Pelosi, said that she will not use the plane for political travel.

Remember Reagan

Former President Ronald Reagan would have been 96 today. Rest assured, folks are celebrating -- and in splendid style.

Edwin I. Meese III, attorney general during the Reagan administration, will preside over activities at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library in Simi Valley, Calif., which include an Air Force flyover, a 21-gun salute, the 1st Marine Division Band, the U.S. Naval Academy Men's Glee Club, a wreath-laying -- and cake, of course.

Virginia-based Young America's Foundation, which operates an educational retreat for budding conservatives at Mr. Reagan's former ranch in the California foothills, will offer a daylong open house in the ranch conference center in Santa Barbara. The group also has begun a grass-roots effort to urge college professors across the nation to display the American flag in their classrooms.

"College conservatives can combat the lies their professors and administrators tell about Reagan. Students will distribute posters that highlight the success of the Reagan presidency, including a 5.1 percent increase each year in charitable giving, a 31 percent increase in the gross national product, an 18 percent increase in real disposable income per capita and 18.4 million new jobs created," the group said.

No surprise

"The only surprise about the Republican debacle in the 2006 congressional elections was that many conservatives found it surprising," Paul M. Weyrich and William S. Lind of the Free Congress Foundation write in the latest issue of the American Conservative.

"Conservatism has become so weak in ideas that during the presidency of George W. Bush, the word 'conservative' could be and was applied with scant objection to policies that were starkly anti-conservative," the authors write, adding: "The next conservative movement will not be credible if it is led by people and institutions that sold out to today's equivalent of Rockefeller Republicanism."

Bush bashers

Evan Thomas of Newsweek says it is the job of reporters to "bash" President Bush.

Friday on WETA-TV's "Inside Washington" program, the topic was "whether the media's been unfair to President Bush, given his abysmal approval ratings," Tim Graham reports at www.NewsBusters.org. "NPR reporter Nina Totenberg said Bush received a 'free ride' for years, so now the worm has turned and the coverage is fierce."

Host Gordon Peterson then asked for Mr. Thomas' opinion: "What do you think, Evan? Are the mainstream media bashing the president unfairly?"

Mr. Thomas: "Well, our job is to bash the president; that's what we do almost."

Mr. Peterson: "But unfairly?"

Mr. Thomas: "Mmmm -- I think when he rebuffed, I think when he just kissed off the Iraq Study Group, the Baker-Hamilton commission, there was a sense then that he was decoupling himself from public opinion and Congress and the mainstream media, going his own way. At that moment, he lost whatever support he had."

Uniform response

Inquiring on the matter of "allowing gays and lesbians to serve in the military," a Harris poll released yesterday found that political parties disagree. "There is a large partisan split on this issue," the findings stated.

When asked whether homosexuals should serve openly in the armed services, 37 percent of Republican respondents and 69 percent of Democratic respondents agreed. The nationwide average on the question was 55 percent.

If they served in the military but kept their homosexuality a secret, 30 percent of Republicans and 10 percent of Democrats would approve; nationwide, the number was 19 percent. Should homosexuals be barred altogether from military service? Among Republicans, 21 percent agreed with the idea, and among Democrats, 7 percent. Nationwide, 13 percent agreed.

Harris conducted the poll of 2,337 adults from Jan. 11 to 18, with a margin of error of two percentage points.

MoveOn.org is seeking donations to air a TV ad featuring fake video footage depicting President Bush, Russian President Vladimir Putin and French President Jacques Chirac snoozing in their jammies. The spot is meant to "wake up" world leaders to global warming and one day may be broadcast in Washington and other major cities. The footage shows Mr. Bush cradling a teddy bear, Mr. Putin a gun and Mr. Chirac a satin pillow.

"The leaders of the world's most polluting countries will be meeting in Germany this June. The priorities for this summit are being decided right now," MoveOn spokeswoman Eli Pariser said yesterday.

The group also has started a global warming advocacy division, which features the spot at its Web site, www.avaaz.org. Avaaz means "voice" in Hindi, Urdu and Farsi.

The Arnold tapes

Oh dear. Once again, the Los Angeles Times got a hold of some recordings of closed-door staff meetings of California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and four of his closest aides. Of course, the paper published the details, deeming the tapes "a rare window onto the governor's operation" and a "complex portrait."

In the latest recordings, he describes Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata, Oakland Democrat, as a "very sick man" and Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez, Los Angeles Democrat, as "a political operator coming from the union background" who evinces no real "passion" about issues.

Mr. Schwarzenegger called Mexico our "trading partner," but he also said that Hispanics -- because they are so close to their homeland -- have more trouble assimilating than, say, Poles, Germans and the French.

DOJ_NMG_0128530

"I made an effort," the Austrian-born governor said. "But the Mexicans don't make that effort."

Waiting for Hillary

The brewing rivalry between Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois presents a significant political moment as black Democrats gauge their loyalties.

"Barack Obama may be the emerging rock star of the 2008 presidential field, but Hillary Rodham Clinton still is the queen of the stage among Michigan Democrats -- and even more so among black Democrats," the Detroit Free Press said yesterday.

The newspaper polled 87 black Democratic voters to reveal that they prefer Mrs. Clinton over Mr. Obama, 59 percent to 23 percent. State Sen. Tupac Hunter called Mr. Obama "the best candidate we've ever been able to produce as a community."

But Beverly Bellamy of Farmington Hills said of Mr. Obama: "I like him -- don't get me wrong," but Mrs. Clinton gets her vote.

"I've been waiting for her. I just think she has a lot to bring to the table," Mrs. Bellamy said, adding that Mr. Obama's relative lack of experience on the national stage -- he is two years into his first federal term of office -- counts against him.

In Senate, Flip-flops Come Easy For Both Parties (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 6, 2007

Just as Republicans did in 1995, Democrats took over Congress this year pledging to change the way that Washington, D.C., works. But listening to debate on the Senate floor over the past month, it's clear that no matter who runs the place, the script is largely the same.

Consider this scenario: The Senate Majority Leader takes to the floor decrying the death of an ethics and lobbying reform bill, blaming the minority party for insisting on an amendment that is not germane to the underlying measure.

"This amendment has nothing to do with lobbying reform or ethics reform of this body — something that is important, something that is the business of the Senate right now on the floor," the Majority Leader said. He added, "We had a totally unrelated amendment injected, I believe, for partisan purposes."

That may sound a lot like what Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said during debate on a lobbying and ethics bill two weeks ago when Republicans demanded a vote on an amendment to give the president limited line-item veto authority.

But the quote is actually from former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) on March 8, 2006, when — during debate on the exact same ethics and lobbying bill — Democrats insisted on a vote on an amendment to stop a Middle Eastern-owned company from taking over management of many of the nation's ports.

While Frist pulled the bill to avoid a vote on the ports issue, Reid negotiated with Republicans to postpone the line-item veto debate. But Reid's rhetoric was no less accusatory.

"They hate this bill, and this is their excuse to kill it," Reid said at a press conference Jan. 18.

It seems that no matter who is in the majority in the Senate, the ruling party bemoans the "obstructionism" of the minority, while the minority bristles at the majority's efforts to limit the number of amendments and debate time.

The irony of this sudden and wholesale shift in rhetoric hasn't been completely lost on Senators of both parties, even as they swear they are doing things slightly differently than their predecessors.

"We sent them all our scripts, and they sent us all of theirs," joked Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), acknowledging that Democrats have adopted the same stances once held by Republicans on the issue of how many and what amendments should be offered to bills.

But he still defended the new majority, saying, "I like to think we are taking a more reasonable approach. We want to give them time to amend without allowing them to obstruct."

Noting that Senate Democrats pulled the same stunt last year on the lobbying and ethics bill, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) defended his party's adoption of the standard minority script. "In fairness to Senate Republicans, to portray an effort to get votes on this bill as something unusual is truly astonishing," he said at the press conference.

Still, the two parties were parroting their predecessors again last week during debate on the minimum-wage bill.

Sens. Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) and Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) complained Jan. 30 on the Senate floor that Republicans were dragging out debate on the bill and that the chamber had been debating it for seven days, or as Dorgan noted, "some long while."

It's a refrain Republicans often struck in the past 12 years — counting every day that a bill technically has been up for debate on the Senate floor, even if some of those days passed in silent quorum calls. But now, by their own admission, they're using minority math.

DOJ_NMG_0128531

"The minority will always count the days on a bill as those days we are allowed to vote. We only voted three out of seven," Sen. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) said on the Senate floor that same day. "We will insist we get votes on amendments as we proceed through this bill and other bills."

For the people who have to record what the parties are saying about each other, it has been a little surreal.

"It's hard for me to keep a straight face," one veteran Capitol Hill journalist said of listening to Republicans complain about the very practices they just months ago inflicted on Democrats.

Even aides who have to deal with the press acknowledge that their complaints are being ignored in large part.

"The arguments about unfairness mostly fall on deaf ears because Republicans had no problem running over Democrats when they were in the majority," said one GOP communications staffer.

Behind it all is a deep distrust between the parties about each other's motives for doing anything on the Senate floor.

"When Democrats were in the minority and were opposing things, we made no bones about it. We said, 'We're blocking this and this is why,'" said one senior Senate Democratic aide. "But the Republicans are being disingenuous. ... They don't want to vote for [the minimum-wage increase]. They do want to stall it."

Republicans, however, charged that the old Democratic minority actually wanted to kill legislation. The new GOP minority just wants to make it better.

"They did a lot of obstruction of getting things done," said Steering Committee Chairman Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), the author of several amendments Democrats have sought to avoid voting on this year. "But we've talked a lot in [the Republican] Conference about how not to do something just to obstruct, but to try to get some substantive changes through."

That sentiment was echoed by Chief Deputy Minority Whip John Thune (R-S.D.), who charged that Republicans filed motions to shut off debate on bills only 47 times during the entire 109th Congress, while Reid already has filed cloture eight times in four weeks.

"So far they're on a pace that totally eclipses us," Thune said. "We're simply asking for our prerogatives to offer amendments."

Still, if you ask DeMint about his ability to exercise his prerogatives, he estimates that things are slightly better for him given the minority's historic insistence on offering amendments.

"It's not a bad role. I've been able to get more amendments up and some passed than I did when I was in the majority," DeMint said. "So far, I like the role."

And Republicans continued to play their role Monday, causing Reid to grouse about GOP refusals to vote on a nonbinding Iraq resolution.

"Their excuse?" Reid asked. "A feeble claim that they haven't been guaranteed a vote on alternative amendments and resolutions."

Chief Justice Counsels Humility (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

Attention, Supreme Court practitioners! Absolutely free advice on how to make your briefs better-read, your arguments more closely followed, your justices more sympathetic, courtesy of the man who's been successful on both sides of the table, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.

First, pretend that you're not always right.

"We get hundreds and hundreds of briefs, and they're all the same," Roberts told a crowd of eager law students and faculty members last week at the Northwestern University School of Law in Chicago. "Somebody says, 'My client clearly deserves to win, the cases clearly do this, the language clearly reads this,' blah, blah blah. And you pick up the other side and, lo and behold, they think they clearly deserve to win."

How about a little recognition that it's a tough job? Roberts asked.

"I mean, if it was an easy case, we wouldn't have it."

He dispensed advice for lawyers, law students and law-school deans during a question-and-answer session that followed a more formal address.

Roberts built a reputation as a powerful Supreme Court litigator, arguing nearly 40 cases as a government attorney and private lawyer and winning about 70 percent of the time. He was known for anticipating hundreds of questions from the justices and carefully practicing each response.

But after 16 months as a justice, he advised that lawyers try to become more "attuned" to what judges are asking. "I would try today to be much more receptive, try to process more effectively, 'Now what does that question tell me about what that judge is thinking?' and respond rapidly rather than trying to stick to my script," Roberts said.

The chief justice said an acknowledgment that the justices face a complicated case can attract sympathy from the bench, while an argument that a case is a no-brainer is a challenge to start looking for holes.

And for the truly brave-hearted advocate, Roberts offered this:

"You don't see it very often and it can obviously be risky, but for somebody to get up and say, 'The biggest argument against us is' whatever, 'this precedent that you decided six years ago, and if you were going to follow it down the line, my client should probably lose. Here's why I think you shouldn't follow it in this case.' " He added: "I think that type of an approach could be very effective."

As for law students, Roberts said he thinks they are more impressive than they were when he graduated from Harvard nearly three decades ago. "People who apply to be clerks [for the justices], for example, it's not just that they did well in law school -- they've got other degrees, they've spent time working in a business, they've written books and cured diseases," he said to laughter.

But he's not sure whether law grads are always able to put their knowledge to work.

"I don't think they spend a great deal of time with what somebody like a Cicero might refer to as rhetoric, or the idea of taking their understanding of ideas and being able to communicate them in a particular way," Roberts said, adding that the ability to advocate or negotiate is "such a big part of what lawyers do no matter where you go."

If he were dean of a law school, Roberts said, looking at Northwestern Dean David E. Van Zandt, he might spend more time on that.

And he took one other stand, when a student asked whether judges' terms should be limited, adding: "Some of our professors say that."

"Um, you know, I'm not in favor of term limits for judges," Roberts deadpanned.

Service Sector Extends Advance But Signals Pace Might Slow (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

The service sector, whose strength fueled the nation's economic growth last year despite a housing slump and higher interest rates, extended its robust performance into 2007.

The Institute for Supply Management, an Arizona-based group of corporate purchasing managers, said its index of nonmanufacturing business activity in the U.S. rose to 59 in January from 56.7 in December. Readings over 50 indicate expansion, and January's surge marked the 46th consecutive month that the service sector, which includes everything from massage therapists to financial planners, has grown.

Steady growth in the service sector, which makes up roughly 80% of the U.S. economy, is particularly important now because the manufacturing sector is struggling with high inventories and soft demand for houses and cars.

In January, the ISM measure of manufacturing activity fell below 50 for the second time in three months, suggesting that business at American factories is flat or even contracting.

"The services juggernaut is steamrolling forward and will contribute to a solid economic expansion in 2007," said Brian Bethune, an economist at consulting firm Global Insight, in a note to clients.

Despite the service industry's uptick in January, the ISM's measures of new orders, employment and inventories in the service sector pointed to a slower rate of expansion in the months ahead. "I don't see substantial growth, but in the same respect, people are pretty positive that it's going to be stable over the next few months," said Anthony Nieves, who oversees the survey and also is purchasing manager for Hilton Hotels Corp.

Meanwhile, in Europe, the service sector in the 13 nations that share the euro currency grew unexpectedly in January at the fastest pace in six months, and private-sector companies raised their prices more aggressively than at any time since November 2000.

The headline measure of service-sector activity in the euro zone rose to 57.9 in January from 57.2 in December, with activity strengthening in Germany, France and Italy, according to a survey of corporate purchasing managers conducted by NTC Research. Economists surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires last week had expected the purchasing managers index to fall to 56.7.

Private-sector companies reported that they continued to hire new workers for the 17th straight month, which suggests domestic demand in the euro zone should continue picking up.

Expansion In Services Sector Set Strong Pace In January (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

Weakness in manufacturing, especially the auto industry, may be damping economic prospects, but the bigger services sector appears to be more than making up for it.

The Institute for Supply Management, which is based in Tempe, Ariz., said yesterday that its index of business activity in the nonmanufacturing sector advanced to 59.0 in January, from 56.7 in December. Wall Street analysts had expected a reading of 57 for January.

A reading above 50 indicates expansion, while one below that indicates contraction.

The trade group's report on the manufacturing sector last week indicated that it contracted in January, in contrast to the services sector, which grew for the 46th consecutive month.

"Manufacturing is weakening as domestic auto manufacturers cut back and as residential construction declines," said Mark Vitner, a senior economist with Wachovia Securities, but he noted that manufacturing made up only about a quarter of the economy. The services sector, which represents about three-quarters of the economy, continued to grow.

Scott Brown, chief economist with Raymond James & Associates in St. Petersburg, Fla., said the "headline figure was stronger than the details," suggesting that the survey — like other recent economic data — was not sending clear signals about the near term.

He said the economy was still expanding, and projected economic growth of 2.5 percent to 3 percent.

The new-orders index weakened slightly to 55.4 in January, from 55.6 in December, while the backlog of orders strengthened to 49.0, from 48.0 the previous month.

Prices increased at a slower rate, with the prices index registering 55.2 in January, down from 59.7 in December.

Some of the respondents told the trade group that "costs are starting to come down — especially petroleum-related costs," the study said. Crude oil prices were up yesterday in reaction to frigid weather in major United States markets.

The services employment index, meanwhile, moved down to 51.7 in January, from 53.2 in December.

Dow Edges Higher On H-P But Microsoft Hampers Rise (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

The Dow Jones Industrial Average crept higher, helped by Hewlett-Packard but hampered by Microsoft.

Both technology bellwethers are components of the Dow, which gained 8.25 points, or 0.7%, to end at 12661.74, up 1.6% on the year. That left the blue-chip average 11.94 points shy of its closing record, set Thursday.

Hewlett-Packard shares rallied 1.8% after it agreed to acquire business-software firm Bristol Technology. Microsoft shares slid 1.9% after Apple warned that iPod users might experience compatibility problems with Microsoft's new Vista operating system.

The trading session was muted, following a frenzied week that included the first meeting of Federal Reserve policy makers this year and release of various economic data.

In the absence of big economic news yesterday, deal making and other company-specific events moved a few bellwether names but had little influence on the broader market.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.1%, or 1.40 points, to 1446.99, up 2% on the year. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index fell 0.2%, or 5.28 points, to 2470.60, up 2.3% on the year.

"In a bull market like the one we've had, there have to be some days like this," said Michael Cuggino, president and portfolio manager for the Permanent Portfolio Family of Funds.

Oil prices seesawed, at first aided by frigid weather in the Northeast that seems likely to spur demand for heating fuel in the days ahead. But comments by Nigeria's oil minister eased supply concerns, and crude futures ended lower.

Contracts for March delivery slipped 28 cents, or 0.5%, to $58.74 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The Institute for Supply Management's nonmanufacturing survey, a measure of the U.S. economy's service sector, rose faster in January than Wall Street expected.

By contrast, ISM's more closely watched manufacturing survey, released last week, was surprisingly weak.

Many investing pros interpret such mixed economic signals as confirmation of a gradual, relatively harmless slowdown in economic growth that could still leave room for a stock rally in the months ahead.

Outside the U.S., stocks fell in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, fell 0.26%, or 0.64 point, to 247.11.

In major U.S. market action:

DOJ_NMG_0128534

Stocks were mixed1; bonds rose2. The 10-year note gained 5/32 point, or $1.56 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.81%. The 30-year bond rose 7/32 point to yield 4.91%.

The dollar was mixed3. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 120.41 yen, compared with 121.04 yen on Friday. The euro fell to $1.2928, compared with $1.2967.

Mixed News Produces Mixed Results (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, February 6, 2007

Mixed economic and corporate news Monday resulted in mixed and unexciting action on Wall Street.

The Dow Jones industrials gained 8.25 points to 12,661.74, while the Nasdaq composite index lost 5.28 points to 2470.60, and the Standard & Poor's 500 index lost 1.40 points to 1446.99.

On the plus side was Wal-Mart's report of stronger-than-expected sales in January at stores open at least a year. A burst of acquisitions underscored that big institutional investors see bargains in the market. Meanwhile, the Institute for Supply Management's (ISM) data showed stronger-than-anticipated growth by the service sector in January.

That good news was weighed down by more volatility in oil prices and the growing belief the economy may be too strong to allow the Federal Reserve to cut short-term interest rates soon.

But the fact the economy is growing should be viewed as a positive, says A.C. Moore, strategist at Dunvegan Associates. "The ISM reinforced the Goldilocks scenario (Fed Chairman Ben) Bernanke has been suggesting," Moore says. "That's a good combination for markets."

Investors, though, may have gotten too exuberant about stocks too quickly, perhaps setting them up for a fall, Moore says. "We're starting to correct from the flip up to new highs," he says. "That usually suggests markets could pull back."

This year, the Dow is up 1.6%, the S&P 500 2.0% and Nasdaq 2.3%.

What's cooling markets more than anything is that there's a lack of convincing news to keep bulls excited, says Michael Farr of Farr Miller & Washington. Corporate earnings seasons is a case in point.

While results "are coming in nicely," the growth has been shy of the double-digit-plus growth posted in the previous 18 quarters, he says. "We're looking for the next leg of the bull market, but we need a catalyst to get excited."

A.B.A. Panel Would Weaken Code Governing Judges' Conduct (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

A commission of the American Bar Association has recommended that the group weaken its code of judicial conduct by changing, from a mandatory rule to nonbinding advice, an instruction to judges to "avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety."

Supporters of the change say disciplining judges for violating a concept as vague as "the appearance of impropriety" is unfair. Opponents denounce any retreat from the longstanding and widely embraced standard, and one critic — Robert H. Tembeckjian, the administrator of the New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct — has resigned in protest as an adviser to the A.B.A. commission.

"At a time when the A.B.A. is defending judicial independence from relentless attack," Mr. Tembeckjian wrote in a resignation letter on Saturday, "I cannot imagine that either the judiciary or the public will applaud the A.B.A. for relegating the 'impropriety and appearance of impropriety' standard to a virtually meaningless phrase."

The change is part of what would be the first comprehensive revisions to the association's Model Code of Judicial Conduct since 1990; the revisions now go before the group's House of Delegates, which meets in Miami next week, before they can become formal policy. Individual states often look to the model code as a template for their own judicial ethics codes, violation of which can lead to punishment as severe as removal from the bench.

The change was a late-breaking development, coming more than three years after the commission began a periodic review of the code.

The very first canon of the proposed revisions continues to say that judges “shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety.”

But recently added language in the introduction to the code says that while that and other canons provide “important guidance,” judges cannot be disciplined for violating them. The canons are followed by rules that are more specific (judges may not, for instance, use the prestige of their offices for financial advantage), and the new introduction says that only those rules may serve as the basis for discipline.

Cynthia Gray, the director of the Center for Judicial Ethics of the American Judicature Society, a nonpartisan group promoting judicial independence and integrity, questioned the commission’s strategy.

“To leave it in the language and later say the language doesn’t count,” Ms. Gray said, “is strange and inexplicable to us.”

Mark I. Harrison, the chairman of the A.B.A. commission, said the “appearance of impropriety” standard was vague and added nothing to the rules prohibiting specific conduct that remain mandatory.

“We think it’s a step forward,” Mr. Harrison said of the commission’s decision. “It is important as a matter of due process and fairness to make clear what would be the basis for disciplinary enforcement without ambiguity and without confusion.”

Jonathan Lippman, New York’s chief administrative judge, disagreed, saying the “appearance of impropriety” standard was sensible and workable. “I don’t think this is nuclear science,” he said. “Judges overwhelmingly approve of that standard as a basis on which to go about their daily business.”

The association has urged judges since 1924 to avoid the appearance of impropriety, and returned to the subject in 1972 and 1990.

“Every time the A.B.A. addressed this standard, it was strengthened,” Mr. Tembeckjian wrote in his resignation letter. “Until now.”

Victoria Henley, the president of the Association of Judicial Disciplinary Counsel, whose members hear and consider complaints against judges, said the recent revisions were unlikely to gain wide acceptance. “If they basically gut the ‘appearance of impropriety’ standard,” Ms. Henley said, “it’s unlikely that the A.B.A. will continue to be responsible for drafting a model code that will be used by any state.”

Giuliani Nearing Full-fledged Candidacy (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, February 6, 2007

Rudy Giuliani, the former New York City mayor who became a national hero for his response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, suggested Monday that a formal presidential announcement was a matter of when, not if.

"Today we just took another step toward running for president," the Republican said, hours after filing a so-called "statement of candidacy" with the Federal Election Commission, which moved him closer to a full-fledged campaign.

"It's a big step, an important one. Quite honestly, we're probably ahead of schedule," Giuliani told reporters in Long Island while campaigning with a state Senate candidate. "We still have to think about a formal announcement and how to do it, but this is a pretty strong step."

Later, in an interview on Fox News' "Hannity & Colmes," Giuliani was more direct. "I'm in this to win," he said. "My campaign is going to be about the future."

Unlike chief GOP rivals Sen. John McCain and Mitt Romney, Giuliani had thus far been ambiguous about whether he would pursue the Republican nomination, even though he had taken the initial steps.

In recent weeks, Giuliani's cautious and noncommittal attitude caused some critics to question whether he would abandon his bid even before formally entering the race, as he did in 2000 when he was considering a Senate campaign against Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Fighting back, Giuliani started to sound and act like a strong contender lately, traveling to the early primary states of New Hampshire and South Carolina, and arguing that his vision for the future and performance in the past would make him a formidable GOP nominee.

Behind the scenes, he has been busy supplementing his cadre of New York loyalists with Washington-savvy political operatives, establishing a fundraising network and setting up a campaign headquarters — signs of a campaign moving forward.

Publicly, however, he had stopped short of committing to a run, insisting he had to decide whether he could make a "unique contribution" to help strengthen the country — his barometer for whether to run.

"There's a real good chance," Giuliani said Saturday in South Carolina, another coy answer to what had been a constant question on the campaign trail.

However slight, the shift in campaign organization — coupled with his public comments Monday — indicates Giuliani likes the response he's received as he gauges support while traveling the country.

DOJ_NMG_0128536

In November, Giuliani took the preliminary step of creating a committee to explore a candidacy but added the caveat that he was simply "testing the waters" — a provision that allows truly uncertain candidates to move forward with no commitment to seek a top spot on the ticket nor the need to identify donors. At the time, Giuliani also did not file an official statement declaring he was a presidential candidate and indicating he would seek the presidency as a Republican should he decide to go forward.

Monday's steps, including eliminating the phrase "testing the waters," put Giuliani on the same level legally as McCain and Romney, the other top-tier GOP candidates who have formed regular exploratory committees and filed statements of candidacy.

Despite being immensely popular in national polls, Giuliani faces hurdles to securing the Republican nomination state by state. His moderate stances on issues such as gun control, abortion and gay rights do not sit well with hard-core social conservatives who are a crucial voting group in the nominating contests. His two divorces could be obstacles as well.

But conservatives also aren't entirely sold on McCain, an Arizona senator, and Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, and that could even the playing field for Giuliani. He hopes primary and caucus voters look past his liabilities and consider his record of leadership in difficult times.

Giuliani was in his final months as New York City mayor when two planes crashed into the World Trade Center's towers on Sept. 11. Within hours of the attack, the mayor was visiting the site, caked in dust and walking through the chaos — a moment replayed repeatedly on television.

He was a former U.S. attorney, leading campaigns against organized crime and corruption. He spent two years as the Justice Department's No. 3 official, overseeing all U.S. attorneys, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the U.S. Marshals Service. The Brooklyn native was first elected New York's mayor in 1993.

Giuliani dropped his bid for the U.S. Senate in 2000 while battling prostate cancer and a made-for-tabloids divorce from Donna Hanover.

Giuliani Steps Closer To A Run In 2008 (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

Rudolph W. Giuliani took another step toward running for president by filing a “statement of candidacy” with the Federal Election Commission yesterday, declaring that he would seek the Republican nomination if he runs, according to his campaign.

Appearing last night on the Fox News Channel program “Hannity & Colmes,” Mr. Giuliani just skirted the line on declaring his candidacy. “We still have to formally announce it and do a few more things,” he said, but added that yesterday’s paperwork “is about as close as you’re going to get.”

When asked if he would beat Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton if he won the Republican nomination, he said, “I’m in this to win.” Then he added, “You do this because you believe that you can win the nomination of your party, and then you believe that you’re the strongest candidate to win the election for your party.”

Mr. Giuliani, the former New York City mayor, is also amending a document he already filed with the commission, dropping the phrase “testing the waters” from his application, officials on his campaigns said.

Compared with his top rivals in 2008 at this point, Senator John McCain of Arizona and former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, Mr. Giuliani has moved more slowly to hire staff members and build a state-by-state political organization.

An aide to Mr. Giuliani said the new filing with the election commission was mostly housekeeping work, bringing Mr. Giuliani’s paperwork into line with that of Mr. McCain’s and Mr. Romney’s.

Former NYC mayor files 'statement of candidacy'

WASHINGTON -- Rudolph Giuliani all but announced he is running for president Monday night, saying "I'm in this to win" and suggesting the only thing left to make it official is a formal declaration.

"We still have to formally announce it and do a few more things, but this is about as close as you're going to get," Giuliani said on Fox News Channel.

Giuliani's appearance was part of a carefully choreographed effort by his campaign to put to rest questions among Republicans about whether he is serious about running.

Newsday articles last week also raised questions, saying that Giuliani had failed to file a formal statement of candidacy that nearly every other presidential hopeful has submitted. He also omitted his party registration on another form.

Giuliani Monday filed the statement of candidacy listing himself as a Republican candidate for president and amended a second form, dropping the words "testing the waters."

DOJ_NMG_0128537

"Today, we just took another step toward running for president," Giuliani told reporters in Floral Park while campaigning with State Senate candidate Maureen O'Connell. "This is a pretty strong step."

Three people close to the campaign agreed, with one source saying Giuliani wouldn't have filed the papers if he didn't have every intention of running.

"There will be a time at some point when he makes a formal announcement, but ... he's moving in that direction," said another campaign source, who noted that Giuliani's communications and political staffs started work Monday.

But Giuliani's statements went further even than those of his aides, not merely signaling his seriousness but stopping just short of declaring.

"I'm in this to win," Giuliani said later when asked if he could beat New York Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton. "You do this because you believe that you can win the nomination of your party, and then you believe that you're the strongest candidate to win the election for your party."

Asked who was the bigger Yankee fan, he or Clinton, Giuliani joked, "Well, we could do a debate on Yankee trivia and find out."

If he entered the race today, Giuliani would come into the contest atop several national polls. But he would face trouble converting his national recognition after 9/11 into votes among conservatives who oppose his stances on social issues.

"Hannity & Colmes" host Sean Hannity pressed Giuliani on those positions, leading Giuliani to reiterate his support for abortion rights but edge away from his earlier support of a procedure known by opponents as partial-birth abortion. He also said he supported gun control in certain situations and a path to legalized immigration.

Doubts about Giuliani's intentions and stance on issues have put a crimp in early efforts to attract donors.

Giuliani Announces He's In '08 Presidential Race (WP)

By Dan Balz And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani jumped into the 2008 presidential race yesterday, filing a statement of candidacy with the Federal Election Commission and declaring on national television last night, "I'm in this to win."

Giuliani's actions were aimed at erasing any lingering doubts about whether he would enter the 2008 campaign and came after an intensive month of activity in which he has stepped up his political travels, broadened his political team and expanded his fundraising operation. A formal announcement will come later, Giuliani said.

Giuliani, 62, served two terms as mayor of New York and earned widespread praise for his leadership after terrorists struck the city on Sept. 11, 2001. He leads the field of declared and prospective Republican presidential candidates in national polls and, with Sen. John McCain of Arizona, ranks either first or second in most of the important early states.

But his support for abortion rights and gay rights puts him sharply at odds with the majority of his party, a situation that many GOP strategists think will present a substantial obstacle to his hopes of winning the nomination. Giuliani also remains well behind McCain and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney in building a state-by-state political organization that will be crucial to navigating through early contests in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

In an interview last night with commentator Sean Hannity on Fox News Channel, Giuliani sought to play down his differences with conservatives by pointing to his record of shrinking government, reducing taxes and fighting crime in New York and to his commitment to staying on "offense" against terrorists.

Giuliani restated his support for abortion rights and gay rights but said he believes marriage should remain a union between a man and a woman. He also defended his support for tough gun-control laws in New York, saying they helped reduce crime in the city while he was mayor.

Giuliani's challenge, aides believe, will be to convince Republican primary voters that, despite his disagreements with conservatives, he will not overturn what has been party orthodoxy on many social issues. One way of indicating that has been through his comments about judicial appointments, a topic he returned to last night.

"I think the appointment of judges that I would make would be very similar to, if not exactly the same as, the last two judges that were appointed" to the Supreme Court, he told Hannity.

Giuliani also believes that, in a time of global terrorism, personal attributes such as leadership, decisiveness and strength of character can win over conservative voters who may differ with him on social issues.

"The reality is you've got to be yourself," he said last night. "You've got to be who you are. You've got to be honest with people. If your views change on something, you've got to be willing to express it."

Giuliani has also moved aggressively to broaden what has been a largely New York-centered political team. Last week he announced that he was signing up the Tarrance Group, a respected Republican polling firm based in Alexandria. Earlier, he recruited Mike DuHaime, a former political director at the Republican National Committee, as campaign manager for his presidential exploratory committee and named former congressman Jim Nussle of Iowa to his national team.

On the fundraising front, he named Donna Henderson, who previously raised money for the National Rifle Association and other groups, as his national finance director. A detailed private strategy memo prepared last fall, which the New York Daily News obtained recently, outlined plans for Giuliani to raise $100 million this year for his bid.

Campaign officials called the release of the 140-page document a political dirty trick and said its contents were out of date. But the ambitiousness of the fundraising goal signaled an apparent serious intention to compete for the Republican nomination.

Skepticism about Giuliani's prospects of winning the party's nod remains high, particularly among Washington-based GOP strategists. "Inside Washington, I don't think anyone thinks he can get elected president," said a senior-level strategist not affiliated with a candidate.

Given his positions on abortion and gay rights, Giuliani would be likely to face heavy going in Iowa, whose caucuses are dominated by social and religious conservatives. He also could run into trouble with conservatives in South Carolina. He might be better positioned to compete in what could be a flurry of big-state contests on Feb. 5, 2008, particularly if he can raise the kind of money his leaked memo talks about.

Brent Seaborn, the campaign's strategy director, argued in a widely distributed memo that the polls accurately reflect voters' attitudes.

"Entering the 2008 primary season, Rudy Giuliani is uniquely positioned among Republican candidates because of his extremely high favorability ratings," he wrote, pointing to several national polls that show the former mayor winning the approval of more than six in 10 voters. Seaborn also argued that Giuliani is a recognized leader on key issues such as terrorism, the economy and fighting crime.

Giuliani Run Poses Conundrum (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani filed paperwork yesterday that virtually assures he will seek the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, begging a question: Can the moderate who leads in many early polls convince his own party that he deserves the job?

Abandoning months of coyness in which he refused to declare a definitive candidacy even as he acted like a candidate, Mr. Giuliani's filing with the Federal Election Commission essentially puts him on equal footing with Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney as the three major declared candidates for the Republican nomination. All three men have national organizations and early name recognition; all three men for different reasons are considered vulnerable to challenge, particularly from the more conservative wing of the Republican Party.

But perhaps no candidate faces more trouble in gaining the nomination than Mr. Giuliani, which is ironic, given his early lead in many polls. His long-shot status in the nomination sweepstakes is based on his well-known moderate stances on litmus-test social issues. Such positions, along with his two divorces, won't enamor him to social conservatives, who have maintained firm control of the party's nominating levers for decades.

Messrs. McCain and Romney have had their own run-ins with the conservative wing of the party as well, but none quite as significant as that awaiting Mr. Giuliani. These are problems that Mr. Giuliani's own campaign has publicly acknowledged, much to its own embarrassment, when a copy of its strategic political plan recently was leaked to the press. The plan noted that a moderate Republican who is viewed as liberal on abortion rights, gay rights and gun control is likely to have trouble with voters in the Republican primary.

Indeed, a Giuliani nomination would suggest a sea change has taken place within the Republican Party, where successful nominees traditionally have had to maintain allegiance to certain core social beliefs.

Demanding that allegiance isn't something that powerful conservatives such as Tony Perkins at the Family Research Council will likely concede without a fight. "I don't see anyone getting the Republican nomination who is not pro-life and a staunch defender of traditional marriage," Mr. Perkins said in a recent interview. "We may not be a large enough group to elect a president, but social conservatives can keep someone from getting the nomination."

Star Power

Does a two-time mayor have a shot at redefining the rules? Scott Reed, a Washington Republican who managed Bob Dole's 1996 presidential campaign, said he believes it possible. Mr. Giuliani starts with a measure of star power, which serves any politician well. He also comes to the scene in the wake of a bruising election for Republicans, who saw Democrats sweep not only the House but also take the Senate and governors' offices as well. The question, Mr. Reed said, will be what Mr. Giuliani does with his popularity: Can he step up from mayor to national political figure, retaining the image of steadiness that he cultivated in the wake of the September 2001 attacks, while successfully fending off any questions that might arise about his stewardship of the nation's largest city.

"A Giuliani candidacy is a chance to turn the whole nominating process on its head for the first time in 40 years," said Mr. Reed, who added that he made an early contribution to the mayor's campaign but hasn't decided to back any candidate exclusively.

Like other candidates, Mr. Giuliani has yet to see whether his record will hold up to the scrutiny of a national political campaign. As a former prosecutor and a mayor whose dirt-caked image practically personified the 9/11 response, Mr. Giuliani is likely to face relentless questioning from reporters and political rivals seeking to deconstruct his heroic legend. Potential embarrassments include his scandal-plagued police chief and former business partner, Bernard Kerik, who pleaded guilty last year to improperly accepting gifts from a construction firm with mob ties.

Potential to Change Race

Mr. Giuliani also may face questions about his lobbying and consulting firm, Giuliani Partners LLP, and his law firm, Bracewell & Giuliani, which have represented a number of business interests -- including gambling and energy companies -- that may not prove popular with voters.

But Mr. Reed says Mr. Giuliani has the potential to change the race even if he doesn't win the nomination, simply by taking a top share of the media spotlight. Mr. Giuliani "sucks the air out of the room," Mr. Reed said, making second-tier candidates compete for notice.

Mr. Giuliani's early test is likely to come in late March, when the first campaign-finance reports are due from presidential candidates. Getting out of the blocks later than either Mr. McCain or Mr. Romney and currently operating with a thinner national staff than either man, Mr. Giuliani will have to work to maintain a campaign war chest that is on par with the front-runners.

Romney To Add Names (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, February 6, 2007

House Republicans supporting former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) will hold a Capitol Hill press event today to unveil new additions to their team — additions that move him ahead of Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) in public Congressional endorsements as the battle for Member support continues at a torrid pace between two of the leading GOP presidential hopefuls.

McCain, viewed as the frontrunner for the GOP nod next year, named his six-person House whip team last week and also announced the support of three Cuban-American Members.

Members of Romney's team will appear at an afternoon news conference at the Republican National Committee. About half of Romney's Capitol Hill supporters previously have been announced.

Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.), who is Romney's liaison in the House chamber, said the Republicans now on board constitute the former governor's initial whip team.

"We'll be utilizing these 22 Members to bolster support for Romney here on Capitol Hill," he said.

Among the endorsements to be announced today are those of Reps. Rodney Alexander (La.), John Linder (Ga.), Ralph Regula (Ohio), Bill Shuster (Pa.) and Mike Simpson (Idaho).

Last week, McCain unveiled his House whip team and also announced the support of Florida GOP Reps. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Lincoln Diaz-Balart and Mario Diaz-Balart. His campaign is expected to announce the addition of Rep. Ric Keller (Fla.) today. Keller's Orlando-based district is sandwiched between those of Romney supporters — Reps. Ginny Brown-Waite and Tom Feeney.

Yesterday, McCain announced the support of two Michigan state lawmakers and named members of his Florida finance team.

The dueling for Member endorsements between Romney and McCain comes as former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani formally stepped into the Republican White House fray Monday by filing a statement of candidacy with the Federal Election Commission.

Giuliani has a quartet of Members supporting his candidacy but has yet to show he's been as aggressive as his two principal rivals in reaching out to Capitol Hill.

Romney's list thus far is a mix of the party's rising stars in the House — such as Reps. Marsha Blackburn (Tenn.), Mike Rogers (Ala.) and Feeney — and established veterans such as Regula, Rep. Hal Rogers (Ky.) and former Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.).

McCain, understandably, has more support within the Senate than Romney does and his House team also includes many veteran lawmakers — albeit most who are not particularly known as conservative firebrands.

DOJ_NMG_0128540

While about half of Romney's team thus far is made up of social conservatives from Southern states, McCrery said that was more a function of the Members who were involved in initial meetings with Romney rather than an indication of any endorsement strategy based on geography.

Romney visited Capitol Hill in January for meetings with Members, attending separate events set up by Rogers and Rep. Jack Kingston (Ga.).

"Almost half of the Members are not from the South," McCrery said. "We can say that we have a pretty good representation of all of the regions of the country for Gov. Romney."

Romney has been most apparent in his efforts to reach out to Capitol Hill, due in part to his need to counter McCain's natural advantages there and the Arizonan's status as the frontrunner.

Romney also is working to quell concerns among social conservatives about the evolution of his views on social issues such as abortion and gay marriage.

Romney was well-received at the Republican Study Committee's retreat Friday in Baltimore, where he addressed House conservatives.

"He has adequately addressed those issues in the private meetings," McCrery said, adding that the whip team will be spreading that message to their colleagues who have not had personal meetings with Romney.

He said that the endorsements should send the same message to Members' constituents.

"We're happy with his explanation of where he is now on those issues," McCrery said.

Obama, Clinton May Skip Early Debates (Pol)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, February 6, 2007

What if they gave a debate and nobody came?

What if the media-political complex announced a presidential debate, hired a hall, sent out invitations, lined up 200 folding chairs for the press, and then the major candidates said: "Stick it in your ear. We're not coming."

That could happen this year for one good reason: Major candidates are complaining that too many states are planning too many debates too early.

Nevada has two forums and three debates scheduled already. The first one is supposed to be in two weeks, and guess where it is going to be held?

If you were Nevada and trying to lure the national media to your state, what city would you choose that guaranteed glitz, glitter and good times?

That's right. It's going to be in Carson City.

(Me, I would have held it in Vegas at the Bellagio with the Cirque du Soleil swinging overhead and Wayne Newton as the moderator, but what do I know?)

Other states have already announced their own Democratic and Republican debates, but there are two developments that might alter things considerably.

First, the Democratic National Committee is soon going to call the campaigns together to try to limit the debates. But that may not work. "It will not stop other organizations from holding debates," a DNC source admitted.

More importantly, however, Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton may just say no. They might do the unthinkable and just refuse to show up.

Early debates are helpful to second- and third-tier candidates because those candidates need publicity.

But what do front-runners get from debates? Nothing but risk. They already have publicity. To the top tier, early debates are a negative, an ordeal, a chance for the rest of the pack to nip them in their rear ends.

Aren't debates the "music of democracy," however, a chance for the public to learn about important issues of our day?

Maybe they were once upon a time when the League of Women Voters ran them, but debates today must be good television and that means a snappy, quick-moving show with short answers -- not soliloquies on serious issues.

I went to a slew of primary debates during the 2004 presidential cycle - - the DNC tried and failed to control them - - and if any of the debates were memorable, I can't remember it.

The major candidates hated them. The debates not only screwed up their schedules, but took a ton of prep time that could have been better spent going out and actually meeting voters.

The stakes at debates are extremely high because reporters attend them for the same reason people attend the Indy 500: to see who crashes and burns.

DOJ_NMG_0128541

There is, therefore, an enormous priority on not screwing up. And the major candidates soon learn it is safer to stick to their stump speeches than to risk making news. The minor candidates, with nothing to lose, are free to go ballistic, play to the crowd and attack the top tier.

So why do the major candidates show up?

Debate organizers try to make the debates refusal-proof by co-sponsoring them with major media, labor unions, or organizations like the Congressional Black Caucus.

But guess what? Neither Hillary Clinton nor Barack Obama has accepted any debate or forum invitations as of yet.

"The two people who can blow up the debates are those two," an adviser to the Obama campaign told me. "All they have to do is say: 'Debate without me. Go ahead.'

"There will be some accusations that they are being arrogant, but where it is written that you have to debate this early?"

And Obama and Hillary have the perfect excuse for not showing up: They have day jobs.

"They should be voting in the Senate, not running around to the debates," the adviser said. "Hillary and Obama should band together and say, 'It is not in our interest to debate this early. We've got jobs to do. October is plenty early for debates.' "

Me, I like debates. I rack up frequent flier miles. I go to expense-account dinners. I whisper rude and juvenile things to other reporters while the debates are going on.

The debate sponsors - - and they include some very powerful people and organizations - - will howl like crazy if the top candidates refuse to show up. And those who refuse may be threatened with retaliation.

But just saying no always did take guts.

OnlyChance -- This is how politics works, in BOTH parties. Yes, it's only out of political expedience that the front-runner Dems may sit the early debates out. However, President George Bush Sr. blatantly refused several of then-Governor Bill Clinton's offers to debate in 1992. In fact, Bush almost refused to debate altogether, until Ross Perot got back in the race that year and Bush had to defend himself on two fronts. So, don't try and pull this high and mighty Republican crap. Both parties want to make themselves look good and sometimes NOT debating is the best to stay looking good. (So there haha)

by Show Me on 02.05.2007 at 11:05 PM

Calm down everybody. We will see debates. The Dems are smart . They know that the tide is with them and they don't want their canidates,who are all good canidates standing in a circular firing squad. They want them to stay strong and keep putting out their individual messages.

by kevinizon on 02.05.2007 at 10:33 PM

They're all so fearful, yet they want to run the country! Whats that all about?

by OnlyChance on 02.05.2007 at 09:18 PM

Didn't the democrats ask the Sen. Dole to give up his position in the Senate to campaign for president?

If all candidates running for the most powerful position in the world, shouldn't they dedicate their full attention on such.

I am calling for all candidate to resign their position and start debating.

It interesting the DNC wants to control the debates. So much for constitutional free speech. I think is shows what the DNC all about. Sensorship! OR is it the DNC doesn't believe the policies being set forth can withstand debate?

by Lacy in Texas on 02.05.2007 at 09:02 PM

If I have to choose between Barack and Hillary, I'll choose Barack. Not because he's black (and so am I), but because he inspires me. On that note, I would not vote for Condy!

Frankly, many people I speak with (both black and white) did not want Hillary to run because we (Democrats) know we're in for a long hard slog with the right-wing rehashing all the crap from the Clinton years. In contrast it's so divisive! However, if that becomes necessary I will defend her as vigorously as I defended Bill as an FOB!!!

It really pains me that the two of them running is already causing this divide!!!

The best of both worlds would be for them to run together! That's my hope for an absolute wining ticket; onne that could potentially bring us ALL together.

by kevinizon on 02.05.2007 at 08:55 PM

Yeah it would be real dumb at this point to play a game of 'I'm powerful and busy and I'm not showing up' as a candidate. You announced your candidacy, so act like a candidate, even if you're not up to the job.

DOJ_NMG_0128542

People want to know what these candidates are all about, and if they crash and burn now, that would be their destiny further up the line anyway. Not participating is so incredibly lame, so fake and phoney in so many ways, just the thought of it steams me.

You're running for president? Then talk about the issues with other candidates, and with America, and don't be wreaked with fear and uncertainty. You think you can win? Then go at it like you're going to win.

I can't believe that a candidate would stand away from a debate without people thinking that, in some way, said person thinks themselves above that particular meet-up; ie, too good for it.

You want my vote? Participate in debates, or else come up with a reallllll good reason that you stood one out. I mean a REAL good reason.

We've put up with too much with our current oligarch. Now its time for candidates to lay their cards down, not just with rhetoric, but with discussions of their plans.

My prediction? Hillary's probably not going to get the nomination, and Obama/Edwards will likely end up a team in some way. But this is 1.5 years ahead of all kinds of change and tussle... so hmm.

by GGPSmith on 02.05.2007 at 08:13 PM

Why should Senators Clinton and Obama debate each other now? They need to stand together to score a win for the Democrats in '08.

The real solution to all the real and pseudo-conflicts in the black community regarding Senator Obama's candidacy is the solution the Democrats as a whole need to come to terms with: Clinton-Obama in '08!

It's the only way to optimize Senator Clinton's experience in politics and ability to raise money with Senator Obama's incredible popularity and persuasive arguments to be hopeful about America's future.

Without each other, they run the real risk of third-party splinter groups forming that would make Ralph Nadar's past capture of Democratic voters look paltry by comparison. The GOP isn't going to have any of those problems. They'll be unified behind whomever they run against Senators Clinton & Obama with President Bush and Vice President Cheney permanently sidelined and blamed for all the country's and GOP's woes.

The real excitement will come in the Presidential and Vice Presidential debates!

by AH2 on 02.05.2007 at 08:12 PM

IF these various groups are SMART they will ALL place their debates LIVE on the Internet and publicize the fact ... THEN LET'S SEE WHO DOESN'T SHOW UP !! It's a NEW world here in the Age of the Internet. Candidates beware.

Obama Trying To Quit Smoking—again (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons And Manya Brachear

Chicago Tribune, February 6, 2007

After struggling to quit smoking in the past, Sen. Barack Obama is trying a cessation aid not available over the counter: public attention.

Obama (D-Ill.) resolved to quit his cigarette habit over the winter holidays, just weeks before his expected presidential campaign would make photographers and reporters an even more regular part of his life.

He said in a Monday interview that, although he has never been a heavy smoker, he has quit for periods over the last several years but then slipped back into the habit. On the cusp of a potential presidential bid seemed the right time to quit for good, he said.

"I've never been a heavy smoker," Obama said. "I've quit periodically over the last several years. I've got an ironclad demand from my wife that in the stresses of the campaign I don't succumb. I've been chewing Nicorette strenuously."

The incentive to quit is great for any office seeker, as increasingly negative attitudes about smoking translate into political pressure not to do it—or at least not to be caught doing it publicly. At a time when most willing public figures also are expected to serve as role models, those with unhealthy habits face intense pressure to leave them behind.

Americans haven't elected an open and unabashed cigarette smoking president since Franklin D. Roosevelt, though others such as Lyndon Johnson smoked on occasion. The rules seem also to extend to political spouses such as First Lady Laura Bush, who found it necessary to quash her habit, or at least take it underground.

In Obama's case, the pressure isn't just political. His wife has always been concerned about his smoking and, over the holidays, according to family friend Valerie Jarrett, the two of them agreed that he "should stop now."

"He began the process of quitting over Christmas," Jarrett said. "I have not heard of him smoking over the last several weeks."

DOJ_NMG_0128543

There's a little hedge room in the time frame, allowing for the possibility that Obama's resolve might have slipped a time or two. Obama didn't clarify the point.

Kicking the habit is good for just about any politician's image, said Irving Rein, a Northwestern University communications studies professor and author of "High Visibility," which examines the marketing of celebrities. Attitudes toward smokers have changed dramatically since FDR's triumphal display of his ivory cigarette holder in an era when smoking made a person seem elegant and powerful.

Back then, Hollywood glamorized cigarettes almost as fashion accessories. Attitudes had radically changed by the late 1990s, when First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton criticized actress Julia Roberts for portraying a movie character with a compulsive smoking habit.

For Obama, it's an especially smart play to grind out his last cigarette, Rein said.

"Brand has become so big with personalities. It includes the kind of suit he wears and the shoes he chooses," said Rein. "Smoking is part of that package. It doesn't go with the social, environmental message of reform he would like to project. His image would be impacted by it."

Regardless of whether his image has suffered, his lungs most likely have. Longtime friends say Obama was a smoker when he was in his first two years of college at Occidental College in California, from 1979 to 1981.

He said Monday that he has never smoked more than 10 cigarettes a day, and usually only four or five. He said the number usually went up when he was either writing or campaigning.

He said he isn't using the patch because he worries that they're too strong for him.

"I'm not somebody who's all that hooked," he said. "I didn't want more nicotine coming to me than I had been ingesting."

While quitting during such a stressful period as a presidential campaign may be difficult, public health advocates count it as a victory for them.

"I hope he makes it a public fight," said Mark Peysakhovich of the American Heart Association, who used to lobby Obama on anti-smoking policies and other public health issues when Obama was a member of the Illinois Senate. "If he's got a nic fit and he's in a bad mood, I hope some of that comes out. Maybe it will encourage other people to be brave enough to try."

It might even score some political points for Obama, he said.

"It could make him more human to people," said Peysakhovich, "if he's got the same kind of struggles the rest of us have."

Edwards Risks Tax Hike For Health Plan (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, February 6, 2007

Presidential candidate John Edwards is embracing a position that has been political suicide in the past — admitting he would raise taxes.

The 2004 vice presidential nominee is betting that voters will back the idea in exchange for the promise of quality health coverage for all, part of the first major domestic policy initiative from a Democratic White House hopeful.

The tax increase would pay for the plan's cost of up to $120 billion a year. Edwards' proposal would require that every business provide health care coverage for employees or help them pay for it and every American has insurance.

Edwards argues that it will be cheaper for families and businesses to have insurance coverage while providing health care to the nation's 47 million uninsured.

"I think that most Americans now believe that instead of small, incremental change, that we need transformational change that will strengthen this country," Edwards said in an interview with The Associated Press.

Edwards was setting an early marker in what is shaping up to be perhaps the top domestic policy issue in the Democratic race nearly a year before the first votes are cast. Several others are expected to offer competing ideas in the coming months.

"The whole idea for me on these big issues like Iraq and health care, I want to lead, not follow," said Edwards, who also has been pressuring his rivals to pull funding for President Bush's troop increase. "So I'm not waiting for other people to say where they stand. I'm saying what I believe."

The plan would free up money for health care coverage by abolishing President Bush's tax cuts for people who make more than $200,000 a year and by having the government collect more back taxes, Edwards said.

His idea immediately opened him to criticism that he's a tax-and-spender in the mold of Walter Mondale, the 1984 Democratic presidential nominee who said he would raise taxes. In the election, Mondale suffered a 49-state defeat, losing everything except his home state of Minnesota and the District of Columbia to President Reagan.

"Edwards' America Will Pay More Taxes," said a news release from the conservative Club for Growth.

DOJ_NMG_0128544

The idea is not new. Republican California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has proposed a universal plan in the nation's most populous state. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, also running for president, signed a law last year requiring universal coverage.

What Edwards is proposing is very different from what he offered four years ago when he was a North Carolina senator and first-time presidential candidate. In the 2004 race, Edwards proposed to cover all children but didn't have a broader plan for adult uninsured.

Since then, Edwards has had a very personal experience with the health care system as his wife successfully battled breast cancer. Edwards said they had excellent coverage, although the two of them — both former lawyers — struggled to wade through the insurance bureaucracy. He said his position was not changed by that experience but by the people he's met across the country who are struggling with rising health care costs.

Edwards plan aims to have universal coverage by 2012. A Democratic rival, Sen. Barack Obama, also has said that is his goal, but the Illinois senator has yet to provide more specifics about how he would get there. New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton also has said she will have a universal plan.

Edwards plan would first require employers to cover every worker or contribute 6 percent of each worker's income toward coverage they buy on their own.

It also would provide government-funded insurance to all adults under the poverty line and all children and parents under 250 percent of the poverty line, which is about $50,000 for a family of four. The Edwards campaign is still working on other cost estimates, but says the goal would be to keep the cost to 5 percent to 7 percent for middle-income Americans.

He would try to clamp down on rising costs with tax credits, expanded government programs like Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program, and changes to insurance laws to require coverage for all regardless of pre-existing conditions or other factors. And he would create nonprofit purchasing pools — across a small area or maybe even several states — so that consumers would have a way to buy an affordable and high quality plan.

Finally, he would require every citizen to get coverage, unless they have financial or religious exemptions. Those who don't would forfeit their personal exemption on their income tax return.

Opening Bid On Health Care (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- John Edwards's call for universal health care marks the opening volley in two debates facing Democrats running for president in 2008: How to provide health coverage to some 47 million uninsured people and what to do about President Bush's tax cuts.

Many of the party's White House hopefuls, including Sens. Hillary Clinton (D., N.Y.) and Barack Obama (D., Ill.), say extending coverage to all the uninsured is a priority. Their focus on relatively sweeping health-care proposals matches escalating concern among voters and employers about medical costs and coverage. (See related articles on Medicare1 and the ways that plans to expand health coverage could impact the insured2.)

So far, Mr. Edwards has provided the most detail about how he would accomplish this, with the release yesterday of a plan requiring the government, employers and individuals to contribute to the cost of extending coverage to the uninsured.

The former North Carolina senator and 2004 vice presidential nominee also has stated that tax increases for upper-income people would be needed to fund his plan, which aims to provide universal coverage by 2012. Specifically, he has proposed raising taxes for households with incomes of more than $200,000. That would essentially repeal some of the tax cuts shepherded by Mr. Bush. Mr. Edwards also would fund some of his health-care proposals by reducing the "tax gap," the amount of revenue the government is owed, but doesn't collect.

"Yes, we'll have to raise taxes," Mr. Edwards said Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press." He said it is "the only way you can pay for a health-care plan" estimated to cost the government $90 billion to $120 billion a year.

It remains to be seen whether voters will accept Mr. Edwards's vision of "shared responsibility," in which employers would have to help fund their workers' coverage and individuals would be required to purchase insurance, often with the help of new tax credits aimed at low-income and middle-class people. Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program, or SCHIP, would be expanded to cover more children and low-income parents. New regional "health markets" would offer comprehensive health-insurance plans to anyone who doesn't get insurance through their jobs or a government program.

Some Democrats expressed surprise at the bluntness of Mr. Edwards's remarks in favor of tax increases, but many health-policy experts believe higher taxes would be needed to fund any serious attempt at universal coverage.

DOJ_NMG_0128545

Mr. Edwards "realizes how unpopular anyone who says that can be," said Henry Simmons, president of the National Coalition on Health Care, a group of employers, labor unions and health-care providers advocating for universal coverage. "I suspect he's going to take a lot of time explaining that health care is one area where you have to invest."

Patrick Toomey, president of the Republican antitax group Club for Growth, said Mr. Edwards's plan wouldn't sit well with most voters, who, he said, "already think taxes are too high." The idea is "very good news for the Republican candidate, whoever that may be."

Many questions remain about Mr. Edwards's plan, in particular how much the various stakeholders would have to contribute and what the timing of the changes would be. Mr. Edwards's proposal assumes that the Bush tax cuts, most of which are set to expire in 2010, would be extended by Congress, even for the wealthiest recipients. Repealing the breaks for people earning more than $200,000 would supply about $100 billion a year, while reducing the "tax gap" would provide another $20 billion or so a year.

However, extending the tax cuts for the people at the top of the income scale is less likely with Democrats in control of Congress. If the tax breaks aren't there to repeal, Mr. Edwards would ostensibly have to look for another funding source.

The other 2008 presidential candidates have commented broadly on how they would tackle the problem of the uninsured, but haven't laid out their specific plans or how they would fund them. Mr. Obama, for example, has said he would provide universal coverage by 2012, and plans to put forward more details in coming weeks. In a health-focused speech last month, he questioned the profits made by drug makers and insurance companies and suggested that reducing paperwork and making sure all eligible children enroll in existing government programs would improve the current system.

"Washington no longer has an excuse for caution," Mr. Obama said. "Leaders no longer have a reason to be timid."

Mrs. Clinton knows better than most the political pitfalls of major health-care proposals, after she and her husband tried to move broad overhauls in the 1990s but failed. She recently has backed improvements in health-information technology and covering all uninsured children through SCHIP, but hasn't said how she would reach the bulk of the uninsured.

During an appearance in Davenport, Iowa, last week, a man told her that he had voted for her husband 14 years ago largely on his promise for universal health care. "With all due respect," he said, "I would like to know specifically" how Mrs. Clinton intends to provide the coverage "and how you intend to fund that."

Mrs. Clinton said it was a "fair question" but, rather than giving a specific answer, she said she wants to work toward a consensus.

She asked for a show of hands from the audience in reaction to a few methods of expanding health insurance. A single-payer, government-run system got the most hands, and it was the one Mrs. Clinton seemed to favor. But, she cautioned, imagine the ads that would spring up in opposition to such a plan. In her last attempt at health reform, ads starring an older couple, Harry and Louise, suggested that the government would dictate which doctors and treatments people could get in a single-payer plan. "All of a sudden people get real nervous," Mrs. Clinton said.

A solution has to "be politically feasible because at the end of the day we've got to get it through the Congress," she said.

"I'm not ready to be specific," she went on, "because I want to hear from people...This time we're going to build the consensus first so that when the Harry and Louise ad comes on, you'll say 'Turn that off!'"

CNN THE SITUATION ROOM, February 6, 2007

WOLF BLITZER, HOST: To our viewers, you're in THE SITUATION ROOM, and it's happening right now.

As violence rages in Iraq, the battle over the president's budget begins here in Washington today. It could and probably will pour billions more into the war.

Would it also hurt health care at home?

I'll speak about that with the Democratic presidential candidate, John Edwards.

And Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama may battle for the African- American voters. But some African-Americans are warning don't take our votes for granted. I'll speak about that with the Reverend Al Sharpton this hour.

And Arnold Schwarzenegger caught on tape with more stunning revelations.

What did he say this time?

I'm Wolf Blitzer.

You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

What can you buy for about $3 trillion?

The president's new budget is now out and it takes four hefty volumes to show you where your money is going. The president's budget would add billions to fight the war in Iraq.

Does that come at the expense of social programs here at home?

DOJ_NMG_0128546

Democrats say it's filled with debt and deception. And even some Republicans are betting against this budget's chances in a Democratic controlled Congress.

Let's go live to our White House correspondent, Suzanne Malveaux.

She's checking all the fine print -- Suzanne.

SUZANNE MALVEAUX, CNN WHITE HOUSE CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, it's a budget that the president and his top economic advisers say is more detailed and transparent when it comes to the costs of the war on terror.

But, again, it is a big question whether or not it is going to be able to pass Congressional leadership, a Democratically-controlled Congress. And, Wolf, the numbers are really staggering.

(BEGIN VIDEO TAPE)

MALVEAUX (voice-over): It's our money and President Bush wants to spend almost $3 trillion of it. It's a staggering figure that's hard for any of us to imagine. But consider this. After you crunch all of the numbers, it's estimated that the total cost for the war on terror will approach $800 billion within the next two years.

President Bush says the increases he's seeking in the new budget are justified.

GEORGE BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: And our priority is to make sure our troops have what it takes to do their jobs.

MALVEAUX: The breakdown -- more than $93 billion additional for this year's war operations in Afghanistan and Iraq, on top of $70 billion already approved. More than $140 billion for 2008. And an 11 percent increase in the Pentagon budget.

Mr. Bush insists the country can afford to boost military spending, while balancing the budget in five years without raising taxes, a claim members of Congress, now controlled by the Democrats, quickly dismissed.

SEN. HARRY REID (D-NV), MAJORITY LEADER: That's why I say this budget is a combination of deception and debt in a way that's disconnected from reality.

REP. NANCY PELOSI (D-CA), SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE: The day of the blank check for the president and the war is over.

MALVEAUX: The president's budget aims at paying for the military increases by cutting out more than $95 billion in other areas over the next five years, including sharply reducing or eliminating more than 140 government programs, for a savings of $12 billion; and squeezing $78 billion out of Medicare and Medicaid, health programs for the elderly and poor.

ROB PORTMAN, WHITE HOUSE BUDGET DIRECTOR: Medicare, Social Security and Medicaid, they are now more than half of the budget. And what the president proposes is actually less than a 1 percentage point reduction in Medicare over five or 10 years.

(END VIDEO TAPE)

MALVEAUX: And the president's budget, of course, asks for less war costs, considerably, in 2009, just $50 billion, and asks for no money the following year. But the president says this is no indication of a timetable for the end of the war or for bringing American troops home -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Numbers so huge it's amazing.

Suzanne, thank you.

Meanwhile, a series of bloody bombings ripped through Baghdad today, killing at least 35 people and wounding more than 120 others. One of the blasts went off near a children's hospital, killing nine people.

And this follows a truck bombing which took a terrible toll this weekend.

As Iraqis clean up and try to cope, some are saying it's America's fault.

And joining us now, our correspondent in Baghdad, Michael Ware -- Michael, they seem to be blaming, at least some elements in the Iraqi government, the United States for this massacre over the weekend that killed more than 100 Iraqis, wounded more than 300 others, horrendous pictures. It looks like the worst suicide bombing over the past three and-a-half years.

What's going on?

MICHAEL WARE, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Yes, Wolf, I mean this was a massive truck bomb in a crowded marketplace on Saturday evening that killed at least 128, and, as you say, wounded more than 300.

Now, the great irony is that there's elements, Shia elements within the government, that are blaming the U.S. for creating this security situation or poor security situation that they say has created an environment that is allowing al Qaeda and others to launch these attacks.

This feeds a common conspiracy, particularly among Shia, that says America is so all powerful and all pervasive, al Qaeda could not conduct these bombings if America was not complicit.

We're not hearing that echoed in the wake of this bombing by elements of this government.

DOJ_NMG_0128547

BLITZER: Because what they're saying is by the United States pressuring the Iraqi government to clamp down on Muqtada al-Sadr's Shiite militia, the Mahdi Army, in effect, that's making the Shiites in these marketplace areas and elsewhere in Baghdad, even more vulnerable.

WARE: Yes, they're arguing that this has increased the Shia public's exposure. I mean the government has never been able to underwrite people's security, nor has the U.S. military. So more and more in these days of civil war, they've turned to their own neighborhood or to the local militias.

Now, what these people are saying is that on the eve of what's perceived as a massive American led operation, which, indeed, it is not, many of these militias have evaporated, or their leadership has taken its troops or its fighters off the streets, thereby creating a vacuum which is being filled by these bombers.

Hence, they ultimately blame America for these deaths.

BLITZER: Michael Ware reporting for us from Baghdad.

Michael, thanks.

WARE: Thank you, Wolf.

BLITZER: And as opposition to the war intensifies among the American public, there's a stunning new development within the U.S. military. A court-martial began today for a U.S. Army officer who refused to ship out with his unit to Iraq.

Let's get some details from our Brian Todd -- Brian.

BRIAN TODD, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, First Lieutenant Ehren Watada took a stand about seven months ago. He's now facing a jury likely to comprise young officers like himself in a case that even his family doesn't expect to go well for him.

(BEGIN VIDEO TAPE)

TODD (voice-over): As his former unit takes casualties in Iraq, Ehren Watada puts his freedom on the line at Fort Lewis, Washington. Watada, considered an exemplary soldier until last June, when he became the first commissioned officer to refuse to go to Iraq.

The reason?

1ST LT. EHREN WATADA, U.S. ARMY: It is my conclusion that war is not only morally wrong, but is, in fact, illegal.

TODD: Watada is not a so-called conscientious objector. While he believes the Iraq War is illegal, he did say he was willing to fight in Afghanistan.

The Army declined and Watada is now being court-martialed for failing to deploy with his unit, conduct unbecoming an officer and contempt toward officials. That last charge, for all the public statements he's made against the Bush administration since last June.

WATADA: I felt betrayed by my leadership.

TODD: But the judge has already ruled that Watada's central defense, that the war is illegal, is a political question and can't be ruled on by this military court. Then there's the challenge of jury selection. By rule, it has to be a panel of peers, likely Army lieutenants.

EUGENE FIDELL, NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF MILITARY JUSTICE: It's highly improbable that this jury will include no one who's been there. So I think the jury selection is going to be an interesting exercise because obviously it's a concern if you have people who have had the actual experience to go to Iraq. TODD: The case has made Watada a poster boy for the anti-war movement, some of whom are protesting near Fort Lewis as his trial gets underway.

(END VIDEO TAPE)

TODD: But Watada is said to be resented by some inside Fort Lewis, where he held a desk job until recently. His family tells CNN they expect this court-martial to be over by Thursday. If convicted, he could face four years in a military prison -- Wolf.

BLITZER: We'll watch it together with you, Brian.

Thanks very much.

Let's go to New York and Jack Cafferty -- this is going to be a big case at Fort Lewis up in Washington.

CAFFERTY: I don't think it's going to be that big a deal. When you're wearing the uniform, you're not allowed to decide whether the war you're ordered to fight in is moral or not. You follow your orders and you go where your unit goes and that's just the way the military -- I mean how would it be if every soldier was allowed to say well, I'll fight in Afghanistan, but I won't fight in Iraq, or I'll go here but I don't think I should go there, because I don't like the way those people -- I mean that's nonsense.

He's dead.

Senate rebuke on Iraq is loud and unclear. That's how one newspaper headline put the story today. The Senate spending all of this time talking about these resolutions criticizing President Bush's plans to escalate the war in Iraq.

Republicans are threatening to block the vote. One Democrat calls that threat obstructionism and they just blather on and on and on.

But when it comes right down to it, all this debate and fussing are about non-binding resolutions. They really don't mean anything in terms of the conduct of the war. They're just sort of a way to register a complaint.

President Bush is the commander-in-chief. The country is at war. He's probably within his rights to do pretty much whatever he wants in terms of adding troops, withdrawing troops, moving troops, whatever. He is the commander-in-chief.

In the meantime, the hopes of a new Congress coming in, getting right to work on this nation's problems, are being held captive by these resolutions, just like the entire country has been held captive by this war for almost four years now.

Nothing that's important to our citizens here is being addressed. Instead, we get posturing and speechifying and bloviating or, as Shakespeare so eloquently put it, a tale told by an idiot full of sound and fury signifying nothing.

The question is this -- how important is it for the Senate to pass a resolution opposing President Bush's troop increase plan in Iraq?

E-mail your thoughts to caffertyfile@cnn.com or go to cnn.com/caffertyfile -- Wolf, whatever they're going to do, I wish they would just get on with it.

BLITZER: Usually they don't do it that quickly here in Washington. It takes a lot of time.

CAFFERTY: All right. We'll wait.

BLITZER: Jack, thank you.

CAFFERTY: All right.

BLITZER: Still to come, my interview with Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards. I'll ask him about his call for pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq, his ambitious health care plan and raising your taxes. That's coming up.

Also, with a growing roster of Democratic candidates, are African-Americans facing a growing divide, especially when it comes to frontrunners like Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama?

Former presidential candidate Al Sharpton, he's stopping by live right here in THE SITUATION ROOM to talk about it.

And a massive slaughter underway right now as Britain tries to contain Europe's huge outbreak of bird flu.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: While many White House wannabes are dipping their toes in the water, one former contender has already plunged back in and he's making a splash on issues like Iraq, raising taxes for the wealthy to pay for health care.

And joining us now, Democratic presidential candidate in his home state of North Carolina.

Senator, thanks very much for coming in.

Let's get to Iraq first.

If you had your way, how long would it take to pull out U.S. forces from Iraq?

FORMER SENATOR JOHN EDWARDS, PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE: About a year. It could take a little more -- a little longer than that. But roughly a year, Wolf -- combat troops.

BLITZER: And what about the support personnel, because there's a lot of support personnel in Iraq, as well?

EDWARDS: Well, the support personnel that are there for the purpose of supporting the combat effort, most of them can leave. But the people who are there for logistical support, to help train the Iraqis, we will need to keep some presence there for a period of time.

BLITZER: Here's what the National Intelligence Estimate said the other day, this compilation, a summary of the 16 U.S. intelligence agencies: "A rapid withdrawal from Iraq would result in these -- in this nightmare scenario. The Iraqi security forces would be unlikely to survive. Iraq's neighbors might intervene openly. There probably would be massive civilian casualties. There would be a Kurdish play for autonomy in the north and that could prompt Turkey to launch a military incursion."

In other words, what they are saying is that as bad as the situation is right now -- and it is horrendous -- it could be even worse if there were a rapid withdrawal.

EDWARDS: It could be even worse no matter what happens, and I think they acknowledge that, too, Wolf, in the same report.

What the NIE tells us is the situation on the ground is very bad, the security situation. The political situation is bad. But the one thing everyone agrees on is the only potential solution in Iraq is a political reconciliation and the threshold question is how do you create the incentives for Maliki and the Shia led government by relatively disorganized Sunni leadership to reach that political reconciliation?

And I think -- others, too -- including the -- those -- some of the people in the Iraq Study Group -- believe that the best way to do it, do that, is to not continue to enable them by keeping our combat troops there for a period -- for a long period of time, or by doing what the president wants to do in escalating the war.

BLITZER: You've said -- you've apologized for your vote back in 2002 when you were in the Senate in favor of the resolution authorizing the president to go to war against Saddam Hussein. Senator Clinton, on the other hand, has not formally apologized.

Does she have credibility on this issue, as far as you're concerned?

EDWARDS: This is an issue between her -- not just for her, but for anyone who voted for this -- for this war -- this is an issue between them and their own conscience. If they believe their vote was right, they should defend it. If they believe their vote was wrong, then they ought to tell the truth about it. It's a pretty simple choice and I think it'll be for voters to evaluate.

BLITZER: Let me rephrase the question.

As far as Hillary Clinton is concerned, does she have credibility when she says that if she were elected president, she would end the war? EDWARDS: You mean do I believe she's telling the truth about it?

BLITZER: Do you believe that she has the credibility, the ability to do what she says she would do, given her track record in the Senate?

EDWARDS: Well, there's no way for me to get inside her mind and heart, Wolf. I mean, she's like everyone else who voted for the war, she has a responsibility, a moral responsibility, to make a decision about whether her vote was wrong or right. This was a question of a war or not. And I think for anyone who wants to be the president of the United States, they need to be honest with the American people.

Senator Clinton is the only one who knows the answer to that question and I think the public will evaluate her, as they will me, Senator Obama and all of the others, on the basis of what they -- what we say and what they see.

BLITZER: Yesterday, you were on "Meet The Press" and you acknowledged -- you said very candidly that if elected president, in order to pay for your health care initiative that you've announced today, to put forward, that you've put forward today, you would have to raising taxes on families making $200,000 a year or more.

Is that right?

EDWARDS: That is correct.

BLITZER: You're -- it brought to my mind this famous comment from Walter Mondale in the presidential debates back in 1984.

Listen. You'll remember this sound bite from the then Democratic presidential nominee.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

WALTER MONDALE, FORMER PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE: Mr. Reagan will raising taxes. And so will I. He won't tell you. I just did.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: All right, so you've just told everyone you'll raising taxes if you're elected president.

Is that a smart political move, given the opportunity now that your opponents will have to hammer you on this sensitive issue?

EDWARDS: My view is that the single most important characteristic of the next president of the United States is somebody who's decent and honest with the country. No one can propose universal health care and say they can pay for it without doing anything to the tax structure. That is not the truth.

And I think the American people deserve and are entitled to the truth, that I suspect the will be other Democratic candidates as we go forward who will follow the lead that I've put out there today and will come forward with their own universal health care plan. And if they contend that they can pay for it leaving the tax cuts and the tax structure exactly as it is, I don't believe that's true. And we'll have to hear what they have to say.

BLITZER: But you're convinced that your health care plan, in effect, will be able to be paid for by this increase in taxes?

EDWARDS: For people who earn over $200,000 a year -- families that earn over $200,000 a year -- they -- they will lose the tax cuts they had under George Bush and go back to what the tax system that existed under Bill Clinton.

But in exchange, we're going to have a more efficient health care system, a less costly health care system. We're going to get rid of a lot of the administrative costs. Every single American will have health care coverage and every -- we'll bring down the costs of the entire system as a whole.

So this is -- this kind of political -- I mean health care reform, which I think is desperately needed and I think the country knows is desperately needed, is the kind of transformation, not small steps, but big steps, that I think we need to take to strengthen this country.

BLITZER: Senator Edwards, thanks very much for coming in.

EDWARDS: Thanks, Wolf.

Thanks for having me.

DOJ_NMG_0128550

BLITZER: And you just heard Senator Edwards say he'd raise taxes on the wealthiest Americans to pay for universal health care.

Across the United States, by the way, just 3 percent of all U.S. households make $200,000 a year or more. Here are the top five locations where wealthy Americans could take a hit.

In the District of Columbia, 6.8 percent of households reached that $200,000 threshold. It's 6 percent or more in Connecticut and New Jersey. And in both Maryland and California, almost 5 percent of households might have to pay more under Senator Edwards' plan.

Coming up, Arnold Schwarzenegger unplugged -- find out what he had to say about a key political rival and his own wife in newly released recordings.

And a massive bird flu outbreak in Britain. We're going to show you why it's raising fears the virus could land, potentially, right here in the United States.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Let's check back with Carol Costello.

She's monitoring all the developments coming in from around the world.

What's the latest -- Carol?

CAROL COSTELLO, CNN CORRESPONDENT: I have it right here, Wolf.

There is a multi-million dollar settlement in last week's bomb scares in Boston. Turner Broadcasting System, which is CNN's parent company, and the advertising agency Interference, Inc. will pay $2 million. The money will go to city and state agencies to reimburse them for their response. This comes after electronic light boards used in a cartoon promotion set off a terrorism scare last Wednesday and brought in the bomb squads. The agreement resolves any potential civil or criminal claims.

Talks aimed at ending the deadly fighting between rival Palestinian factions get underway in Saudi Arabia tomorrow. A fragile cease-fire appears to be holding, for the most part, in Gaza. But Hamas militants reportedly stormed a Presidential Guard post in northern Gaza today and kidnapped five Fatah security officials. Hamas says the men will be released soon.

The fighting has killed more than 130 people in Gaza since May.

The British government is urging the public not to panic about an outbreak of the deadly bird flu virus. The country's largest poultry producer is destroying tens of thousands of infected turkeys at its farm, but the largest bird flu outbreak to hit Europe. But a British health official says it's very unlikely people could get the disease.

Ireland, Russia, Macedonia and Japan have banned British poultry imports for now.

That's a look at the headlines right now -- Wolf.

BLITZER: All right, Carol.

Bird flu -- let's get a little bit more now. It was first detected in Southeast Asia and you can see on this map how it spread across the continent, through the Middle East into Africa and Europe. It's now confirmed in almost 40 countries. And the virus has now been detected in humans in 11 countries, including Turkey.

The fear is that migratory birds will bring the virus to North America. You can see the routes those birds take on the map behind me. Right now, the virus doesn't pass easily between people, but there is the fear it could mutate and spread from person to person like other forms of the failure.

Coming up, do African-Americans owe loyalty to Senator Hillary Clinton?

A key supporter of potential rival Senator Barack Obama says no. I'll talk about the growing divide, what's coming up on that front with the Reverend Al Sharpton. He's standing by live.

Plus, frigid weather gripping much of the northern part of the United States right now. We'll have the latest on the Arctic blast that has millions of people shivering today.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: To our viewers, you're in THE SITUATION ROOM, where new pictures and information are arriving all the time. Happening now, President Bush submitting a $2.9 trillion budget to Congress. It includes more than $240 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, 90 percent of that sum going to Iraq. And it comes as we're awaiting a key Senate vote on a resolution opposing the president's troop increase for Iraq.

Also, the former New York mayor, Rudy Giuliani, now another step closer to becoming an official Republican candidate for president.

On the Democratic side, African-Americans facing a growing divide -- will they support Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton, someone else?

DOJ_NMG_0128551

I'll talk about that. That's coming up. The Reverend Al Sharpton, himself a former presidential candidate, he's standing by live.

And Arnold Schwarzenegger unplugged. Newly released recordings capturing some candid conversation about his wife Maria Shriver, his political opponents, and a lot more. Some of them very unflattering.

I'm Wolf Blitzer. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

African-American Democrats are increasingly being torn between their party's two front-runners in the race for the White House. That would be senators Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama. And now underscoring the divide, controversial remarks by one of Senator Obama's key supporters.

Let's turn to CNN's Mary Snow. She's in New York with the story -- Mary?

MARY SNOW, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, those comments came during a meeting last Friday. One person who was present at that meeting said what was being talked about in public is something many black political operatives have been talking about privately.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SNOW (voice over): It's a tug-of-war among black voters being asked to choose between supporting Senator Barack Obama and Senator Hillary Clinton. And comments late last week from Illinois state senator Emil Jones tug even further when he called on support for Senator Obama and made a veiled reference against the Clintons.

EMIL JONES (D), ILLINOIS STATE SENATE: I don't feel that we have to pay a debt to someone. How long are we going to pay this debt when our son is running? And our son deserves their support. That was my message to them. SNOW: Jones made his comments during a meeting at the Democratic National Committee's Black Caucus, making it clear his loyalty to Obama.

JONES: We should be united. And African-Americans understand what I say when I say united. He is our son, and I'm behind him because he's our son.

JAMAL SIMMONS (D), POLITICAL STRATEGIST: No one was prepared for this conversation to take place in that room, and once it did, it sparked some questions among people in the room about where their loyalties should lie.

SNOW: Some political strategists say black voters feel caught between loyalty to President Clinton, who was dubbed by many the first African-American president. At the same time, Senator Obama has the potential to make history. So far, Senator Clinton has been leading in polls, but some say the black vote will be critical.

RONALD WALTERS, UNIVERSITY OF MARYLAND: The nagging question about where Barack Obama stands on issues relative to the black vote, if that's cleared up, then I would expect that his favorability numbers would skyrocket.

SNOW: New York congressman Charles Rangel in January said Obama's lack of experience would hold him back, adding that black voters weren't divided.

REP. CHARLES RANGEL (D), NEW YORK: You compare what you know about Hillary Clinton today and what you know about Obama today and it's not a contest.

SNOW (on camera): What do you mean?

RANGEL: One has to prove himself that he is mature enough, understanding enough, has the intellect to guide the entire country. And, of course, Hillary has proven that.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

SNOW: Now, another political strategist who attended last week's caucus meeting said the black vote is wide open, like the entire Democratic vote.

BLITZER: All right, Mary. Thanks very much.

Let's get some analysis from the Reverend Al Sharpton. He's joining us now from New York. He's president of the National Action Network, also himself a former presidential candidate.

Reverend Sharpton, thanks very much for coming in.

REV. AL SHARPTON, NATIONAL ACTION NETWORK: Thank you, Wolf.

BLITZER: Before we get specifically to what Mary was just reporting, are you planning on running again this time? SHARPTON: I've said I'm not interested in trying to run, unless we get in to the season and I don't see someone really championing the cause of social justice and some of the things I did in the last cycle. I'm very happy doing what I'm doing from National Action Network in trying to add to the debate, but we'll see.

I haven't finally ruled it out. I've met with four of the candidates, I'll be meeting with the rest. And I'm really trying to see who will have a message for those who have been marginalized. So far I've not heard that clear message.

BLITZER: So you're not ready to endorse anyone right now, whether it would be Hillary Clinton or Barack Obama or someone else?

SHARPTON: No, I'm not ready to do that as of yet, no.

BLITZER: Well, do you agree with Charlie Rangel, the congressman from Harlem, when he says that Hillary Clinton has already proven herself and Barack Obama still has not?

SHARPTON: Well, I agree that we know her record better. And we have had agreements and disagreements with that record. But we know it better.

That does not mean we should not come to know Senator Obama's record or, for that matter, any of the other contestants. And I've met with him, I've met with her, and I'm meeting with others. But I agree with him that she has the advantage of being known and having taken some positions. Some we have disagreed with.

I think the big problem that Senator Obama has is that he is not as known, and his track record is not as established as hers. But, again, he has time to try and correct that, if, in fact, he can.

I agree more with Professor Ron Walters when he says it is the issues and positions that are taken that I think is going to determine where the majority of the African-American vote ultimately goes.

BLITZER: And you heard Emil Jones, that politician from Illinois, make that statement that Mary -- that Mary included in her piece, saying that, you know, the African-American community really doesn't owe the Clintons anything else, and right now it's a time to unify around Barack Obama.

SHARPTON: Well, I think the problem with that is that you can offend people by saying that you've got to unite just because someone is your race and, therefore, not address the issues. I think that the better way is for Senator Obama or anyone else to stand up on the issues and say, let's unite around the issues. Not unite around who is someone kindred to us, because you really don't want to set that kind of scenario up.

For example, right in Chicago, where there's a mayor race, Senator Obama's endorsed the incumbent white mayor against two black candidates. So you really don't want to nationally say that blacks should do something for Obama that he himself is not doing at home. That is not a debate you want to raise, because then you can name any number of races where people didn't support blacks against whites. I think what is intelligent and respectful to our community, as in any community, is to talk our interests and our issues. Don't raise an issue that you may not want to come home and have to answer.

BLITZER: Let me pick your brain on two other issues.

First of all, Senator Joe Biden, I know he was on your radio show after he made those controversial comments about Senator Barack Obama. Are you over that issue now? Is it time to move on? Or is there still a problem you sense Senator Biden has?

SHARPTON: I mean, well, Senator Biden said what he said, and as I told him on the show, it offended a lot of people. I certainly did not think that it was a thing that was not offensive.

I know Senator Biden, and he said his intention was not to in any way desecrate those of us that ran for president before, being Shirley Chisholm or Reverend Jackson, me, or whoever. But the suggestion that people that, because they may not have a certain style, is not articulate or even clean, I thought was a bit much.

I said it, but, again, I think that the debate must be around the issues. The disparity in income in income in this country based on race, the disparity in how the criminal justice system is used -- it just came out over the weekend in New York that blacks, who are a third of the city, are stopped 55 percent of the time in stopping and frisked by police.

These are the things that people want to know, as president, what will you do to even the playing field? And that's going to be a little deeper than someone's gender or race or comments. And if we don't get to that level, then it won't be in the interests of not only African-Americans, but any Americans united around the candidates.

BLITZER: One final question on Rudy Giuliani. He took another step toward a run for the White House today. You were quoted in "The Times," "The New York Times" on Sunday, as saying, "So right now, he can lead all the media and the national pundits on the yellow brick road. He'd better never let us get near that veil. I know what's back there. I've pieced it before."

What are you alluding to?

SHARPTON: Well, I think that Rudy Giuliani had one of the most polarizing and divisive terms of mayor in the history of the city of New York. Anyone knows that.

His confrontations with the communities of African-Americans and Latinos, his problems in terms of dividing the city, and many other issues will come to light. I think that as soon as the honeymoon is over with the media and he jumps in the ring, he becomes fair game, and I think that a lot of the title of "America's mayor," people are going to have to examine what that mayor (ph) was, and it will not be as flattering as it has been up until now. BLITZER: I don't think the Reverend Sharpton is going to vote for Rudy Giuliani.

Hey, Reverend Sharpton...

SHARPTON: You've got a good guess.

BLITZER: Yes. Thanks very much.

SHARPTON: You also think the Colts are going to win the Super Bowl. Don't you?

BLITZER: Maybe. Maybe.

Thanks very much, Reverend Sharpton, for coming in.

And up ahead, California governor Arnold Schwarzenegger making some unflattering remarks about a political rival. We're going to have details of some newly released recordings, what he did say, he didn't say. He didn't want these recording, though, made public.

Plus, the Senate heading to a showdown over the president's handling of the war in Iraq. We're awaiting a crucial vote. It could come up soon. We'll tell you what's going on in the Senate.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Dangerously cold weather has much of the northern United States in a deep freeze this afternoon. And lake effect snow is piling up in upstate New York. As much as two feet falling in some areas, closing roads, including parts of Interstate 81, earlier.

Law enforcement, by the way, warning people to stay off the roads.

In Chicago, no snow right now, but bitter cold temperatures. The high today was only a few degrees above zero.

The CNN forecast does call for snow in the Windy City tomorrow and a high -- get this -- of only 10 degrees. And the cold snap is even catching the breath of Minnesotans. It hit 8 degrees below zero in Minneapolis this morning, making conditions miserable for a lot of people, including these firefighters.

Images of the arctic blast are coming in from around the country through CNN's I-Report. Let's go to our Internet reporter, Jacki Schechner. She has the latest look on the frigid weather -- Jacki.

JACKI SCHECHNER, CNN INTERNET REPORTER: Wolf, we've got bold I- Reporters trying to stay warm and sending us photos.

This is Francisco Roque in Ann Arbor, Michigan. He says he rode his bike six miles to work this morning and this is what he looked like when he got there. This is a self portrait. He says he wears a helmet, he was bundled up. But still, the moisture from his breath froze, and you can see that right there on his beard.

We have another I-Reporter named Dorte Jones who took this for us in Cavalier, North Dakota. This is the thermometer outside her garage.

You can see right here it is 30 degrees below zero. She says this is the first time she's seen it this cold in the 12 years she's lived in the area. She thinks that this is why the crime rate in the area is so low, because it's too cold for anyone to go outside.

And this photograph comes to us from Suzanne Velonis, who is in Chicago, Illinois. Took this photograph last night after watching the Bears unfortunately lose the Super Bowl.

She says it was negative 4 degrees. That was cold, but it was even colder this morning. She got up and it was negative 10.

Again, this one in Chicago.

If you want to calculate the wind-chill in your area for yourself, you can do that online from the National Weather Service. They have a wind-chill calculator. For example, if it's 20 outside, the wind's 21, that gives you a wind-chill of 4 degrees -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Jacki, thanks very much.

Jacki reporting.

They just started voting on the floor of the U.S. Senate on an important resolution that could set the stage for a showdown over the war in Iraq.

Dana Bash, you're watching all of this. Explain to our viewers what's happening right now.

DANA BASH, CNN CONGRESSIONAL CORRESPONDENT: Well, what's happening now is you're about to see the latest proof that Senate Democrats may have a majority here in Congress, but it does not mean they have the votes to guarantee they're going to get their way, because what you're seeing is what Democrats hoped would be the beginning of a full-scale debate on Iraq, on a resolution opposing the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq, but that is not going to happen at the end of this vote, because anything in the Senate really needs 60 votes to pass. And Republicans are using the Senate rules to their advantage, and they're making it clear that they are going to block this vote to proceed to a major debate on Iraq.

Why? Because Republicans say that they want to have some of their resolutions passed. Democrats say that is purely obstructionism. So you're going to see this vote, it's going to fail, and then Democrats and Republicans are going to go behind closed doors and try to figure how to get some kind of agreement.

BLITZER: And where they go next.

All right. Thanks very much, Dana, for that.

Let's check in with Lou Dobbs to see what's coming up right at the top of the hour.

Lou, what are you working on?

LOU DOBBS, HOST, "LOU DOBBS TONIGHT": Wolf, thank you.

Coming up at 6:00 p.m. Eastern here on CNN, we're reporting on the Bush administration's determination to push forward with what is being called a North American union without the consent of Congress or the American people. The Bush administration defended its plan in, you guessed it, Mexico City. Imagine that.

We'll have that special report.

Also tonight, some local law enforcement agencies are helping to remove criminal illegal aliens from the streets of this country, despite protests by the illegal alien open border lobby.

We'll have that story and tell you what we can expect in the months ahead.

And a new warning that our public education system is failing an entire generation of our students.

We'll have that special report. And I'll be talking with the head of the educational testing service that issued the warning. Kurt Landgraf is among our guests here tonight.

Senator Byron Dorgan also joins us tonight to tell us why he opposes the president's efforts to negotiate trade deals without congressional approval to have Fast-Track Authority returned to him.

We hope you'll join us for all of that and a great deal more, all the day's news.

Wolf, back to you.

BLITZER: We'll be watching in a few minutes. Thanks very much, Lou, for that.

And coming up in our 7:00 p.m. Eastern hour right here in THE SITUATION ROOM, it's the hottest title in Washington, at least today, President Bush's almost $3 trillion budget. CNN's Jeanne Moos is going to be taking a special Jeanne Moos kind of look at the new budget.

Plus, what California governor Arnold Schwarzenegger says about his wife, as well as a political rival. We're going to have details of some newly released recordings.

We'll be right back.

BLITZER: There are some new recordings out from meetings between Arnold Schwarzenegger and his aides, and they reveal some very candid and unflattering comments by the California governor about some of his opponents.

Let's go back to CNN's Carol Costello. She's following the story for us -- Carol.

CAROL COSTELLO, CNN ANCHOR: Wolf, the recordings were made in 2006 for a Schwarzenegger speechwriter with full knowledge of the governor. The hope was that listening to the governor's casual conversation would help write a better speech. The problem is, they were mistakenly put on the governor's Web site and lifted by political rivals.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

COSTELLO (voice over): The recordings are very much Arnold unplugged, backroom conversations, a window into what he really thinks.

GOV. ARNOLD SCHWARZENEGGER (R), CALIFORNIA: Please, Senator.

COSTELLO: Schwarzenegger, who is heard talking with his aides about his political opponents, dishes about Democratic state senator Don Perata.

SCHWARZENEGGER: Perata is a very sick man.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Really?

SCHWARZENEGGER: Yes, absolutely.

COSTELLO: Quite a revelation from a politician who prides himself on his bipartisanship.

The question is, will that bipartisan cooperation continue?

PETER NICHOLAS, "LOS ANGELES TIMES": The governor's staff told me last night that Schwarzenegger had apologized, but I spoke to Senator Perata's office this morning, and they said the senator had gotten no apology from the governor and described the senator as being not in a particular happy mood this morning.

COSTELLO: The governor also discusses another hot-button issue -- immigration. He calls the idea of a fence between Mexico and the United States ridiculous. And when it comes to the subject of assimilation, he says Mexican immigrants do need to work harder to assimilate in the United States.

SCHWARZENEGGER: We love Mexico and we go there on vacation. We love to hear the mariachi music and all that stuff. But up here, for us to feel sympathetic towards you, you have to carry the American flag, and you have to say, "We want to be part of you. We love you."

(END VIDEOTAPE)

COSTELLO: The governor's office released the tapes in their entirety today, saying it did that to prove Mr. Schwarzenegger's comments are part of a long and thoughtful dialogue.

BLITZER: Carol, what are the governor's political rivals saying about this?

COSTELLO: Well, I called state senator Don Perata's office myself today, and his press person told us he's a little upset, but he can't start a war over this. As a politician, he says there have been worse things said about him.

BLITZER: And finally, Carol, what did we learn about Maria Shriver from these recordings?

COSTELLO: She likes detail. She's very involved in speechwriting. In fact, she reviews the governor's speeches.

He says on this tape -- and I quote -- "She is relentless. She will not stop. You know with a speech, like, for a convention or something like that? She goes until the last day. I said, 'Maria it's over, it's locked in. It's in the teleprompter.'"

I'll have more at 7:00.

BLITZER: All right. Thank you. We're going to be watching that.

Carol doing good reporting for us.

Up next, Jack Cafferty wants to know, how important is it for the Senate to pass a resolution opposing President Bush's troop increase plan in Iraq? Jack with your e-mail when we come back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Let's go to New York and Jack Cafferty for "The Cafferty File" -- Jack.

JACK CAFFERTY, CNN ANCHOR: Wolf, the question this hour is: How important is it for the Senate to pass a resolution opposing President Bush's troop increase plan in Iraq?

Ron in San Francisco writes, "We need resolutions that are as binding as the deaths of our kids over there. Not some chicken little, no-confidence resolution like this. The American people spoke loud and clear last November to end the war, not fight over condemning a Bush escalation of it. Wake up guys, or we'll muck out the barn again in two years."

Aaron in Pennsylvania, "Very important. If no one goes on record opposing the war, the President Bush will say, 'Nobody said they were against my plan when this all started.' I hope the politicians learned an important lesson from the vote that they took that got us in to this mess four years ago." Bernie in Binghamton, New York, "It's of no importance, Jack. It's merely grandstanding. If the Congress wanted to oppose this stupid, unwinnable war, it should do two things -- deny Bush the funds to continue the war, impeach both Bush and Cheney. The time has come for serious action, not for political posturing."

Armin in Litchfield, Connecticut, writes, "If they do nothing else for the rest of the year except vote against a troop increase, they have saved us poor taxpayers trillions in future expenses, and most likely a few thousand American lives. Maybe that's asking too much of our senators."

Barbara writes from Niles, Michigan, "The sad truth is the Republicans cannot seem to accept they are no longer the majority in the Senate. They're now trying to filibuster the Iraq debate and the Iraq resolution. I think they'd better get on the side the people, or I predict there'll be fewer Republicans in Congress after the next election."

Luzma, Lewiston, Maine, "I have two nephews in Iraq right now. I don't want to see them come home in coffins. Therefore, this vote against the surge is crucial on how I will vote for Senator Susan Collins in 2008."

"Any Republican who votes with the president is ignoring a powerful voice in our democracy -- our vote. We voted in November for change, and we demand it."

John writes from Delaware Water Gap in Pennsylvania, "A non- binding resolution? Spineless comes to mind. If those yo-yos are serious about their disagreement with the president, they ought to cut off funding and force a withdrawal in six months. Damn, it sucks being helpless and represented by these idiots. Maybe we need to be liberated."

And Joseph, finally, in Norman, Oklahoma, "Jack, the Senate's fighting for the best way to do nothing. As usual."

If you didn't see your e-mail here, you can go to cnn.com/caffertyfile, where you can read more of these online -- Wolf.

BLITZER: You k now, a lot hovering over this whole debate. There are 20 Republicans senators who are up for re-election next year, and they're all very worried about how this vote might play. We'll talk a little bit more about that in an hour, Jack.

Thanks very much.

Edwards Details His Health Care Proposal (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5 — John Edwards proposed a detailed plan on Monday to provide health care coverage to the 47 million Americans who now go without, becoming the first major presidential candidate to do so.

Mr. Edwards's plan is ambitious and expensive, adding as much as $120 billion a year to the nation's health care bill. Money for the proposal would come from increased taxes on well-to-do families, from new fees to be paid by companies that refuse to provide health insurance for their workers and through steps to streamline the delivery of health services.

Mr. Edwards, a former senator from North Carolina, was the Democrats' vice-presidential nominee in 2004.

The Edwards plan is a pastiche of ideas that have been introduced at the state and federal levels, including some that have been derailed by opposition from business groups, doctors and health insurers.

DOJ_NMG_0128556

Mr. Edwards, in an interview on Monday, described the American health care delivery system as dysfunctional and said that incremental steps would not cure it. “This proposal embraces the concept of shared responsibility to provide universal health care,” he said.

The plan would be partly financed by eliminating tax cuts for households earning more than $200,000 a year, cuts that Congress approved in the Bush administration. Mr. Edwards said he would also offset the program’s cost by using the estimated $15 billion in capital gains taxes that go uncollected each year by requiring brokerage houses to report capital gains from taxpayers’ stock sales to the Internal Revenue Service, just as interest and dividend income is reported now.

Mr. Edwards also said that billions of dollars could be saved by making the health system more efficient and investing more in preventive care. The Edwards plan would provide tax credits or subsidies to low-income families who cannot afford health insurance, expand Medicare and the federal program of health care for children, and create a federal health insurance agency that could become the basis for a single-payer system that would eventually do away with private health insurance.

Drew Altman, president of the Kaiser Family Foundation, which studies the American health care system, praised Mr. Edwards, saying he was the first candidate in the 2008 presidential race to offer a credible and comprehensive plan to cover the uninsured. But Mr. Altman also said the plan faced high practical and political hurdles.

“This is a plan that borrows from different approaches in an attempt to cut through the paralysis in Washington between left and right for many years,” he said. “None of these plans are easy or without issues that others can attack you on.”

Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, Mr. Edwards’s two most prominent rivals for the Democratic presidential nomination, have not yet released detailed health care plans and declined to comment on the Edwards proposal.

One provision of the Edwards proposal certain to draw fire is a requirement that companies provide health insurance for all workers or pay 6 percent of their payrolls into a government fund to buy insurance for them. This type of “play or pay” program was an element of former President Bill Clinton’s failed 1994 health care plan that was shaped in large part by Mrs. Clinton.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger included a similar mandate for employers in his universal health care proposal for California residents. The plan by Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, calls for employers who do not provide health coverage to pay 4 percent of their payrolls into a government health insurance fund.

The National Federation of Independent Business, a powerful lobby that represents small-business owners, said such mandates amounted to a job-killing tax on small companies. “Health care mandates are a nonstarter for our members,” said Stephanie Cathcart, a spokeswoman for the federation.

Mr. Edwards also proposed creation of regional health insurance markets, to use the purchasing power of millions of consumers to drive down health insurance premiums. The concept is similar to that in Mrs. Clinton’s 1994 plan to create health insurance purchasing alliances.

Mr. Edwards’s proposal would also strengthen the Food and Drug Administration’s ability to monitor new drugs after they reach the market, a provision generally welcomed by experts. But it also includes restrictions on drug companies’ advertising directly to consumers, which is vigorously opposed by the pharmaceutical industry.

Edwards Introduces Plan For Health-Care Coverage (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards yesterday issued a blueprint aimed at providing health-care coverage for all Americans and said he would raise taxes to help pay the roughly $100 billion annual bill.

The plan would require employers to provide health insurance for employees or pay a portion of their payroll into a fund that would help individuals buy their own insurance. Edwards said the plan would demand that people take responsibility for obtaining insurance, either from employers or on their own.

The federal government would provide tax credits to help underwrite the cost of insurance and, through the states, would establish state or regional health-care markets, or purchasing pools, that would offer competing health plans to individuals.

"This is the shared-responsibility approach to reforming our health-care system," Edwards said in an interview. "I think it's a dramatic change in the health-care system, the kind of transformation it needs. It's a truly universal system."

Edwards said the cost of the plan would be $90 billion to $120 billion once it is fully implemented. He said the major share of the cost could be paid for by eliminating President Bush's tax cuts for families with incomes of more than $200,000. More revenue could come through more aggressive efforts by the Internal Revenue Service to collect some taxes now going unpaid.

Edwards said the plan bears some resemblance to the new health-care program enacted in Massachusetts, but he said it would require employers that do not provide health insurance to pay a greater share of their revenue into a government fund to help individuals buy insurance.

DOJ_NMG_0128557

He called the plan less complicated than that proposed by Bill Clinton and Hillary Rodham Clinton when they were in the White House.

Edwards' Stiff Healthcare Medicine: Taxes (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

Betting that voter concern over healthcare outweighs disdain for higher taxes, Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards on Monday proposed repealing President Bush's tax cuts on high-income Americans to finance a universal healthcare plan.

The plan would cover all 47 million of the nation's uninsured by 2012, the former North Carolina senator said. The annual cost to taxpayers would be $90 billion to $120 billion, most of it covered by a tax increase on families making more than $200,000 a year.

The plan would require employers to provide health coverage to workers or help them buy insurance. To hold down the cost of premiums for millions of Americans, it would allow employers and consumers to join regional insurance pools that purchased coverage in bulk. The plan would also expand Medicaid and other public health programs.

Edwards' explicit call for a tax increase to broaden access to healthcare could carry wide appeal among Democratic primary voters. But if he wins the nomination, it risks exposing him to Republican attacks in a general election race, just as Walter Mondale, President Reagan's Democratic challenger in 1984, was pilloried for proposing higher taxes.

The Edwards plan comes as he is trying to sharpen distinctions between himself and rivals for the Democratic nomination, particularly Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Like Edwards, both support universal healthcare, but neither has released a specific plan. Last week, Clinton said she hoped to build consensus on politically feasible elements of a plan before releasing one; Obama said he was working with experts to develop his own proposal.

Other Democratic White House contenders who have vowed to broaden access to health coverage include New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and Sens. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware.

But Edwards is the first to provide details. In a telephone interview, he said he did not expect his plan to draw any storm of opposition, as the Clinton White House did with its failed effort, led by Hillary Clinton, to overhaul health coverage in the 1990s. "I think it's appealing across the ideological and political spectrum," he said.

The Edwards proposal would set up regional coverage-purchasing pools that would offer competing insurance plans. The nonprofit pools would be available to consumers who did not get coverage through their jobs, and to employers that decided to join rather than offer their own insurance plans. The idea would be for the pools to negotiate lower premiums through economies of scale. One of the insurance plans offered by each pool would be a public program modeled after Medicare.

The proposal would also make more people eligible for taxpayer-subsidized healthcare under Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program, and it would create a new tax credit to offset insurance costs for some middle-class families. Once those steps were taken, Americans would be required to have insurance.

Edwards Latest To Decline Public Funds For Presidential Campaign (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence And Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democrat John Edwards on Monday joined New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton in saying he will not use public money for the presidential primary campaign or, if he wins his party's nomination, for the general election.

The move by the former North Carolina senator is the latest sign of trouble for the public campaign funding system, created after the Watergate scandal to set limits and disclosure rules on contributions to presidential campaigns.

Edwards said in an interview that he expects major candidates in both parties to raise unlimited private dollars rather than participate in the public system. He said he needs to do the same "to have the funds to be competitive."

Edwards plans to start soliciting contributions for the general election soon, spokeswoman Jennifer Palmieri said. Clinton has been raising money for both the primary and general elections since she got into the race last month.

Another strong Democratic contender, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, is not disclosing his financial plans until after a formal announcement Saturday in Springfield, Ill.

DOJ_NMG_0128558

On the Republican side, an aide to former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney said Monday that Romney will not take public money in the primaries. "Our focus right now is on securing the nomination. Decisions on the general election haven't been made yet," Kevin Madden said in an e-mail.

Two other top GOP prospects, Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani, have not said yet whether they will use public money at any stage of the race.

Withdrawing from the public financing system allows candidates to raise money for the primary and general elections at the same time, lowering the cost of fundraising.

"You rent the same ballroom, serve the same stale hamburgers, but you double the potential take," said Michael Toner, a member of the Federal Election Commission. Candidates would refund money if they don't win the nomination.

Toner predicts "record-breaking presidential fundraising," with each nominee amassing as much as $500 million. The Edwards and Clinton decisions also set the stage for a two-tiered nomination process: well-known candidates raising unlimited dollars and less familiar candidates relying on public money.

The public-financing system has been used by every president elected since 1976. The money also helps pay for the Democratic and Republican national conventions.

Taxpayers can direct $3 of their tax each year to underwrite the system. Last year, 9% of taxpayers — nearly 11.7 million people — checked the contribute box on their income tax form. "I don't think it encourages people to check the box when the only people who take the money have no realistic chance of winning," Toner said.

President Bush and Democrat John Kerry declined public money during the 2004 primaries because that would have required them to limit their spending in each primary state. However, they accepted nearly $75 million apiece in public financing after their parties' nominating conventions for their general-election campaigns.

Federal law now caps campaign donations from individuals at $4,600 — $2,300 each for a primary and a general election. The political action committees of unions and companies are limited to $5,000 per election, or $10,000 total.

The Other Democrats Weigh In (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

The good news for the nation's Democrats is that neither of the supposed front-runners for the party's 2008 presidential nomination, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama, stole the show when all 10 of the likely contenders spoke last weekend to the Democratic National Committee.

Clinton and Obama got good receptions from the crowd at the Washington Hilton, having filled many of the spectator seats with their young supporters. But they didn't blow away the field, which will help keep things loose for a while, allowing more grass-roots activists time to weigh the strengths and weaknesses of all the entrants.

This campaign is starting ridiculously early, for both Democrats and Republicans. The only thing worse would be to have it end early because all but one or two people have been eliminated on each side.

That is now less likely to happen to the Democrats. The stars of the weekend, judging from reactions in the ballroom and the lobby, were not Obama and Clinton but former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina and Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico.

Both of them played to the antiwar sentiments of this liberal-leaning audience by demanding that those now in Congress do more than pass resolutions decrying President Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq. Edwards wants to pull out 40,000 soldiers now; Richardson said that Iraq "is not worthy of one more lost American life."

Their view, which was echoed by former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, left Obama, Clinton and Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware -- who have to deal with the realities of a 51-49 Senate where nothing can pass without significant Republican support -- in the uncomfortable position of seeming to be less fervent about the war. Only Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut and Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio, among those with votes to cast, joined the call for early withdrawal.

Edwards combined his Iraq message with a version of his stump speech from the last presidential campaign, evoking the plight of anonymous forgotten Americans like the "8-year-old little girl [who] will go to bed hungry . . . because her father lost his job." Edwards almost never mentions his own political history -- especially not his 2004 race as John Kerry's running mate. This time around, he is even more a populist, and he closed his speech with a vow of solidarity with organized labor that drew thunderous applause.

Unlike Edwards, Richardson dwells on his varied experience as a member of Congress, ambassador to the United Nations, energy secretary, diplomatic troubleshooter and now a reelected governor. Others may talk about extending health care, improving schools, creating jobs; he says he's already done it. Vilsack made a similar claim about his eight years as governor of Iowa, but Richardson could give him lessons in speech-making.

One of the losers in the weekend oratorical marathon was retired Gen. Wesley Clark, who repeatedly invoked the West Point motto of "Duty, Honor, Country," forgetting that few in this particular audience have much experience with, or sympathy for, the military. The larger disaster was the long harangue of former Alaska senator Mike Gravel, a strident critic of almost everything and promoter of a folly -- a national initiative process -- that not even a deranged blogger could love. Someone has to give him the hook before the real debates begin.

Obama delivered a lofty address, decrying negative campaigning -- a speech that put him squarely on the record against cynicism and in favor of hope. People listened intently, but at some point, the man from Illinois is going to have to put some policy meat on the bones of that compelling personality, lest he feed the suspicion that he doesn't have much to say.

By comparison, Hillary Clinton looked like what she is -- an old pro, maybe a bit hesitant at the start of her first national campaign for herself but someone who draws confidence from giving voice to her own ideas. She stole the headlines for the weekend by pledging that if the current Congress does not find a way to end the war in Iraq, "as president, I will." Of course, she also said that if she had been president in 2002, she wouldn't have started the war in the first place -- a statement that invites Obama and others to ask, "Well, then, why did you vote for it as senator?"

Oh, it's going to be fun, and, with luck, it will keep going for a long time.

Slip Sliding Away (NYT)

By Stacy Schiff

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

Football season is over, but there is no cause for despair. We are smack in the middle of an all-star backpedaling tournament.

Last week Joe Biden announced his candidacy with that loaded line about Barack Obama, “the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy.” Forget what Mr. Biden really meant to say. Think instead about where he went next, which was where Michael Richards and Mel Gibson had gone before him. Not only did Mr. Obama understand what he meant, insisted Mr. Biden, but “I have no doubt that Jesse Jackson and every other black leader — Al Sharpton and the rest — will know exactly what I meant.”

Indeed they did. The day ended with Mr. Sharpton assuring Mr. Biden that he bathed regularly. Rehabilitation came that evening on Jon Stewart; this is why television was invented.

Rule No. 1: Blame the context.

Rule No. 2: Blame the English language. (Punctuation is also fair game. Mr. Biden later enlisted an exculpatory comma.)

Rule No. 3: Go scattershot. Blame your humor-impaired audience (as Senator Kerry did); your ignorance (former Senator Allen, when asked to define “macaca”); your childhood (former Congressman Foley); in a pinch, but only in a pinch, your mother (Mr. Biden, again).

Rule No. 4, particularly useful if you can’t blame the English language and your own is unforgivingly precise: blame the microphone.

That was the route Jacques Chirac took after his nuclear remark about a nuclear Iran. “Having one or perhaps a second bomb a little later, well, that’s not very dangerous,” Mr. Chirac said with a shrug. The press was summoned back, for a retake. “I should rather have paid attention to what I was saying and understood that perhaps I was on the record,” Mr. Chirac offered, as if the record rather than the remark were the issue. Then there was that little fillip about obliterating Tehran. “I retract it, of course,” Mr. Chirac added.

Which brings us to O. J. Is reconstructing a supposedly hypothetical version of a supposedly half-remembered crime backpedaling? I think I’ll opt for plain old delusional. Locking that farce away in a vault is corporate (and commendable) backpedaling, however.

Backpedaling is not apologizing. Apologizing is what you do when you have an affair with your campaign manager’s wife and are found out. Or after you have had a homosexual tryst in your living room while your wife is having a baby in the hospital. It is what you once did when you accidentally shot your hunting buddy in the face.

As anyone with a marriage license knows, there are apologies and apologies. To apologize for your philandering to the public but not your spouse is — just to pick a random example — the height of disingenuousness. Apologies can be easy, also cheap and common. Saddam Hussein apologized for invading Kuwait, after all.

Backpedaling, on the other hand, is subtle and strategic. The trick is to deflect adroitly without landing in an undignified puddle of overwrought remorse. There are no woodsheds or waterworks in this league. It is instead all artful insouciance. The backpedaler distances himself from his actions; the two are but dimly acquainted. He has essentially suffered an out-of-body experience, a brief abduction by bad judgment. It can happen to the best of us. Just ask Larry Summers. Backpedaling is apology in the passive voice, like suddenly acknowledging those secret C.I.A. prisons that we were unable to locate for a while there. It is to half-assume responsibility, to smoke but not inhale. Perhaps it's imperfect, but we are grading on a curve these days.

As with most sports, technology has transformed this one. Jon Stewart and Oprah are its umpires, YouTube its steroids. Never have we and our words had to live in such tight quarters. Blurting just isn't what it used to be in the days of Daniel Webster or William Jennings Bryan.

Nor is backpedaling for everyone. Some people, like some bikes, are just not capable of it. Let's say that you have sunk your country into an unpopular war. Against expert judgment and a groundswell of opinion, you opt for escalation. Queried as to how you would answer a pollster who asked if you approved of that war, you reply, "You can put me down as a no." That is unsporting, and a travesty.

Super Sunday may be behind us, but Super Tuesday is a year away. May the best backpedaler win.

House Bill Eases Union Sign-ups (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

Labor groups are hoping that the new Democratic majority in Congress will push through a measure that would make it easier for workers to join unions.

The bill, scheduled to be introduced today by Rep. George Miller, California Democrat, is prompting labor activists and union foes to square off in an intense and high-profile lobbying campaign.

The Employee Free Choice Act would allow workers to unionize by simply signing a card or petition stating their interest in joining the union, as opposed to the decades-old practice of secret-ballot elections.

If a majority of employees sign, the employer would be required by law to recognize and bargain with the workers' union.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, will introduce the Senate version of the act later this year, his office said yesterday.

Labor activists say the bill is crucial for helping defend them from anti-union companies and lawmakers, which they blame in part for decades of decline.

Overall union membership was 12 percent nationally last year -- down from 12.5 percent in 2005.

"America's middle class is shrinking fast, and unions are a key to bridging our nation's growing economic divide," AFL-CIO President John J. Sweeney said.

Labor analysts say unions will survive if the bill is defeated, because unions have strong support in the public sector -- about 40 percent in 2006.

Mr. Miller sponsored an almost-identical version of the free-choice act last year, which didn't come to a vote in the Republican-dominated House. Many labor analysts say the bill will pass the House, but have a difficult time in the Senate, where Democrats have only a slight numerical edge.

"The Senate has always been the graveyard of labor law," said Bill Gould, a Stanford University law professor.

Many expect President Bush to veto the bill, if it survives the Senate.

Unions say the card-signing -- or "card check" -- method is more fair than the secret ballot because it's a simpler, more-direct approach for workers to decide if they want to unionize.

And because card-check organizing is considerably quicker than conducting secret-ballot elections, which typically take weeks, proponents say it reduces the potential for employers to harass and intimidate workers against joining a union.

"People should be able to choose whether to form a union free from employer intimidation and coercion," Mr. Sweeney said. "Our current labor law is broken."

The bill also would allow for arbitration to settle contract disputes for newly organized union chapters and impose stronger penalties on employers who violate labor laws.

But opponents say the bill is a desperate attempt by organized labor to stay relevant.

"Basically, what [labor leaders] are trying to do is accomplish through legislation what they have not been able to accomplish in the marketplace, and that is to make themselves attractive institutions to ordinary workers," said Peter Morici, a University of Maryland business professor and a former chief economist at the U.S. International Trade Commission.

The bill would curtail -- not enhance -- workers' rights by denying them the opportunity of an election to determine whether or not to unionize.

"This bill is a ruse," Mr. Morici said.

The Center for Union Facts, an anti-union group vigorously fighting the bill, says card-check organizing in an unreliable method of gauging an employee's true interest in joining a union. Union organizers often mislead employees -- either intentionally or unintentionally -- and pressure them to sign.

DOJ_NMG_0128561

The group, which has been running full-page anti-card-check advertisements in The Washington Times, The Washington Post and other major U.S. newspapers, says card-check organizing is "undemocratic" and highly susceptible to fraud by union organizers.

"Voting by secret ballot protects coercion from all sides," said Sarah Longwell, a spokeswoman for the group. "When you vote in secret, no one knows how you voted. There's no way to intimidate you."

Although secret-ballot elections are desirable for deciding political campaigns, they're ineffective in the workplace, Mr. Gould said.

"The secret-ballot-box initiative has been perverted, and it has been manipulated by employers," said Mr. Gould, who served as chairman of the National Labor Relations Board in the Clinton administration from 1994 to 1998.

Still, the bill isn't perfect, Mr. Gould added. He said he would like to see a provision requiring employees to pay or pledge to pay union dues or initiation fees before signing a card or petition to unionize.

A Vaccine To Save Women's Lives (NYT)

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

Congratulations to Texas for becoming the first state to require vaccinating young schoolgirls — ages 11 and 12 — against a sexually transmitted virus that causes cervical cancer and genital warts. Other states would be wise to follow the same path.

There is no doubt that Merck's vaccine against the human papillomavirus, given in three shots over eight months, is highly effective. It provides nearly perfect protection against two strains that cause 70 percent of all cases of cervical cancer, and against two other strains that cause 90 percent of genital warts cases. (That still leaves 30 percent of the cervical cancer cases to worry about, so women are urged to keep getting regular Pap tests to screen for signs of the cancer.) The side effects are generally mild: pain or tenderness at the site of the injection.

Many parents are appalled at the notion of vaccinating such young girls against a sexually transmitted disease. But the medical reality is that the vaccine will generally not work after a woman has been infected, so it is best for girls to be vaccinated well before they become sexually active. The nation's top advisory committee of immunization experts has recommended that the vaccine be routinely given to girls 11 and 12 years old.

The most contentious issue is whether the shots should be required or simply recommended to parents through a strong educational campaign. Those opposed to compulsory vaccination complain that there are already a slew of required vaccinations, so why heap on another, especially for a disease that is spread only through sexual contact? Critics also fear that HPV vaccination may lead some students to wrongly assume that they are protected against all sexually transmitted diseases, perhaps encouraging them to engage in risky behavior.

None of these objections seem strong enough to forgo the protection against a devastating disease. The United States records some 10,000 new cases of cervical cancer each year, and 3,700 cervical cancer deaths. Gov. Rick Perry of Texas, a conservative Republican, has taken an "opt out" approach, in which vaccination is required but parents can seek an exemption for reasons of conscience or religious beliefs.

That makes sense to us. All students deserve protection against HPV infection, and the presumption should be that they will get it.

Can The CBO Spell IRA? (WSJ)

By Alan Reynolds And David R. Henderson

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

Is the share of income of the top 1% in the United States high and rising? Those who say it is usually base their belief on statistics from one of two sources. One, a paper by Thomas Piketty and Emmanuel Saez, was discussed by Alan Reynolds in the Journal on Dec. 14, 20061. The other source is the Congressional Budget Office (CBO). It, too, is wrong.

The CBO's measure, "comprehensive income," is vastly larger than our benchmark of personal income and nearly double the Piketty and Saez total of $6.4 trillion for 2004. The CBO adds transfer payments -- but it also assigns corporate profits to households, and includes the taxable portion of capital gains. Although that fixes a few statistical headaches, it adds fatal complications.

The CBO's allocation of most corporate profits to the top 1% implies an average income of $1,259,700, compared to an average income of $940,441 in the most similar Piketty and Saez series (which includes capital gains). As the lower line in the nearby graph shows, the CBO estimate of income among the top 1% was just 21% larger than the figure from Piketty and Saez in 1980, then 26% larger in 1990, 30% larger in 2000 and 38% larger in 2004. The gap widened because of the CBO's flawed methodology.

The top line in the graph shows that the CBO assigned a high and rising share of capital ownership to the top 1%. Thus Lawrence Mishel and Jared Bernstein of the Economic Policy Institute write that this "shows that those in the top 1% of the income scale received 59.4% of all the capital income in 2004, up from 49.1% in 2000, 39.1% in 1989 and just 37.8% in 1979." Actually, it shows that if you make goofy assumptions, you get goofy results. Those who measure wealth directly find no such growth in the share of the top 1%.

At the IRS Statistics of Income (SOI) division, Barry Johnson and Brian Raub examined 28,000 estate tax returns to calculate wealth shares. "In 2001," they noted, "1.0% of the U.S. adult population [2.1 million people] . . . owned approximately 22.3% of total U.S. individual wealth, a 1.0% decrease since 1998 but virtually identical to the shares of wealth held in 1995 and 1992."

Federal Reserve Board economist Arthur Kennickell added the Forbes 400 list of wealthiest Americans to the Fed's Survey of Consumer Finances. He concluded that the top 1%'s share of wealth declined slightly from 34.6% in 1995 to 33.4% in 2004. Yet the CBO says that share rose from 43.2% to 59.4% in those same years. The difference is huge and it has a huge effect. For 2004, the CBO assigned 59.4% of $1.1 trillion in corporate profits to the top 1.2 million households, which added more than a half-million dollars to each of their incomes. That improbable figure has been rising rapidly, pushing the top 1%'s share of "comprehensive" income much higher than otherwise.

How does the CBO get its results? By assumption. Gary Burtless of the Brookings Institution notes that the CBO, unlike SOI and Fed economists, does not actually look at who owns capital. If your tax return shows no income from capital, then, according to the CBO, you own no capital. Can the CBO spell IRA? A huge and growing portion of capital owners in the U.S. earns dividends, interest and capital gains that never show up on tax returns because it is tax-sheltered. And the middle class owns a much higher fraction of its wealth in tax-sheltered assets than does the top 1%.

Andrew Bershadker of the Treasury Department and Paul A. Smith of the Fed compared the interest, dividends and capital gains reported by taxpayers aged 50 or more in 1990 and 2002. They found that "for all ages, the share of [taxable] income arising from assets is strikingly [as much as 36%] lower in the 2002 cross section than in the 1990 cross section."

In short, taxpayers are moving savings out of the grip of tax collectors. But high-income taxpayers are not allowed to contribute to an IRA or tax-free Roth account, and their contributions to other accounts are tightly limited. As a result, about 95% of the top 1%'s assets are still potentially taxable. And that causes the CBO's method to show an increase in wealth of the top 1%. As noted, direct studies of wealth show no such increase.

Economist James Poterba of MIT estimated that among those with assets in a tax-deferred account in 1998, the middle 36% (those in a 28% tax bracket) held nearly a third of their assets in tax-deferred accounts. By contrast, the top 1% of wealth holders held just 5.5% of their assets in tax-deferred accounts in 2001, according to Federal Reserve economist Arthur Kennickell.

Jonathan Chait of the New Republic speculates that 401(k) accounts "mostly replaced defined benefit pensions" and that money from 401(k)s does appear on tax returns when the accounts are withdrawn. Nice try, but no cigar. Capital income accruing inside Roth IRA, Roth 401(k) and 529 college-savings plans will never appear on tax returns, nor will up to $500,000 of capital gains on the sale of family homes since 1997.

Moreover, few of those now retired had much opportunity to build such accounts during their prime earning years. James Poterba, Dartmouth economist Steven Venti and Harvard's David Wise found that in 1984 fewer than 12% of those aged 45 were participating in a 401(k) plan, compared with 57% by 2003. Even the 12% who turned 65 in 2004 cannot be compared with those in defined benefit plans, since such plans would pay only 30% of your salary after 20 years. A 401(k) invested in a mediocre mutual fund from 1984 to 2004 did much better than that.

Those with a defined (fixed) pension must pay taxes at age 65, but the rest of us delay the tax collector. Messrs. Bershadker and Smith found that "roughly half the sample waits until required [at age 70 years, six months] to take the first withdrawal" from an IRA. The required distribution rises slowly to 10% at age 80, and so the untaxed account often keeps growing. Many will die before most funds are depleted, leaving the balance to heirs. Withdrawals from tax-deferred plans (unlike Roth and 529 plans) will eventually appear in tax return data. To say such invisible income is "implicitly" included in recent tax data, as Messrs. Piketty and Saez do, is to admit it is explicitly excluded from such data.

Like most other data, the CBO estimates show a clear increase in income inequality between the stagflation of 1980-81 (which depressed stocks, bonds and business) and the Tax Reform Act of 1986-88 (which encouraged reporting more income on individual tax forms). However, the CBO data show that the top 1%'s share of disposable income, after taxes, was unchanged between 1988 (12%) and 2003 (12.2%). That number picked up in 2004, with more dividends and capital gains being reported at the 15% rate. But defining a trend by one year is nearly as foolhardy as defining a nation's income distribution by 1%.

DOJ_NMG_0128563

The CBO has incorrectly added a huge and rising share of corporate profits to the estimated incomes of the top 1%. Without that, CBO estimates of the top 1%'s share of income would have fallen substantially since 1988. If there is evidence of increased inequality since then, the CBO has not presented it.

Experts: Mideast Meeting Key For Peace (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

AP, February 6, 2007

For the rival Palestinian factions, Hamas and Fatah, a reconciliation meeting this week in Saudi Arabia may be a last chance to avoid civil war.

If Saudi prestige, money and discussions in Islam's holy city of Mecca don't produce a power-sharing agreement, it's unlikely anything will, analysts said.

In recent months, Egypt, Syria and Qatar have tried in vain to end the bloody power struggle between the Islamic militant Hamas and the Fatah movement of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. "If this meeting fails, then no one will try to mediate again," warned Palestinian analyst Ali Jerbawi.

The talks, set to begin Tuesday, will be held in a guest palace overlooking the Kaaba, the huge cube-like shrine toward which all Muslims pray. Abbas and his bitter rival, Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal, each will be accompanied by large delegations.

The negotiations follow the bloodiest round yet in months of Hamas-Fatah fighting in Gaza, with 29 killed over four days before a new truce took hold Sunday.

The clashes have deepened resentment and suspicion between the sides, making agreement on a coalition government seem more elusive than ever. But the fighting also served as a reminder that neither side can win by force without causing massive destruction, and that failure in Mecca could be followed by an even deadlier round of violence.

"Both parties, Fatah and Hamas, know that not having an agreement in this round of talks means catastrophe," said Kadoura Fares, a former Fatah Cabinet minister who met with Mashaal last week on behalf of jailed Palestinian leader Marwan Barghouti.

The sides have been deadlocked since Hamas won elections in January 2006 and took control of the Cabinet and legislature. Abbas, a moderate who was elected separately a year earlier, still wields considerable power.

Hamas and Fatah held talks last fall on forming a coalition that Abbas hoped would end the economic boycott the West imposed on the government after the victory by Hamas, which Israel, the U.S. and the European Union list as a terror group.

Talks have broken down repeatedly, and increasingly bloody battles broke out in Gaza. The disputes focus on the proposed coalition platform and who would have control over security forces.

Ostensibly, the gaps are small — in the case of the program only a single word. Abbas has insisted Hamas promise to "commit" to previous PLO agreements, including interim peace deals with Israel. Hamas is only willing to say it "respects" such agreements.

The underlying problem appears to be deep mistrust and an unwillingness to share power.

Yet both sides might have a hard time saying no to the Saudis, particularly in a venue heavy with religious symbolism.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas said Monday that the atmosphere might be tense at first because of the recent fighting, but he is heading to Mecca with a "sincere will" to reach a deal.

A key militant in Gaza, Kamal al-Neirab, warned that a failure of the talks "will be considered a decision to go to civil war." Al-Neirab leads the Popular Resistance Committees, a small violent group that holds an Israeli soldier hostage and has shifted its allegiance between Hamas and Fatah.

"The Palestinian issue is at a critical juncture," he told reporters Monday. "The meeting tomorrow either brings us to safe shore or it will be the beginning of a crushing war."

Yasser Abed Rabbo, an Abbas aide, said the Saudi umbrella might make it easier for Hamas to moderate its views. "Otherwise, this last chance will be wasted," he said.

In that case, Abbas would go ahead with early elections — a recipe for more fighting, since Hamas has said it would block a new vote as an attempted coup.

In Public View, Saudis Counter Iran In Region (NYT)

By Michael Slackman And Hassan M. Fattah

DOJ_NMG_0128564

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

JIDDA, Saudi Arabia, Feb. 5 — With the prospect of three civil wars looming over the Middle East — and Iran poised to gain from them all — Saudi Arabia has abandoned its behind-the-scenes checkbook diplomacy and taken on a central, aggressive role in reshaping the region's conflicts.

On Tuesday, the kingdom is playing host in Mecca to the leaders of Hamas and Fatah, the two feuding Palestinian factions, in what both sides say could lead to a national unity government and reduced bloodshed. Last fall, senior Saudi officials met secretly with Israeli leaders about how to establish a Palestinian state.

In recent months, Saudi Arabia has also increased its public involvement in Iraq and its support of the Sunni-led government in Lebanon. The process is shaping up as a counteroffensive to efforts by Iran to establish itself as the regional superpower, according to diplomats, analysts and officials here and throughout the region. Some even say that the recent Saudi commitment to temper the price of oil is aimed at undermining Iran's economy, although officials here deny that.

"We realized that we have to wake up," said a high-ranking Saudi diplomat who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the news media. "Someone rang the bell, 'Be careful, something is moving.' "

The shift is occurring with encouragement from the Bush administration. Its goal is to see an American-backed alliance of Sunni Arab states including Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Lebanon and Egypt, along with a Fatah-led Palestine and Israel, opposing Iran, Syria and the radical groups they support.

Yet Riyadh's goals may not always be in alignment with those of the White House, and could complicate American interests.

The Saudi effort has been taken in collaboration with its traditional Persian Gulf allies and Egypt and Jordan, but it also represents another significant shift in a region undergoing a profound reshuffling. The changes are linked to the toppling of Saddam Hussein and the transfer of power from Sunni Muslims to Shiites in Iraq, analysts said. They also reach back many years to the gradual decline in influence of Cairo and the collapse of a pan-Arab agenda, analysts and diplomats said.

"The Saudis felt that the Iranian role in the region has become influential, especially in Iraq, Palestine and Lebanon, and that the Iranian role was undermining their role in the region," said Muhammad al-Sakr, head of the foreign affairs committee in the Kuwaiti Parliament. "Usually the Saudis prefer to maneuver behind the scenes. Lately they've been noticeably active."

Saudi Arabia has taken public initiatives in the past, including one in 2002, when at an Arab League meeting it proposed a regional peace agreement with Israel in exchange for Israel's withdrawing to its 1967 boundaries. But it prefers to work quietly, and has not recently taken such a sustained public posture.

"This is not leadership by choice; it is leadership by necessity," said Gamal Abdel Gawad, an expert at the Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo. "There is a leadership vacuum in the region, and they have to step forward, or Iran will."

The United States, which is pushing the Saudis to take on this role, is alarmed at rising Iranian influence in Iraq and Lebanon, and with the Palestinian government of Hamas.

But the two countries, though sharing broad goals, have different views of the players in each conflict. For example, while the Bush administration sees the conflict in Iraq as one between allies and terrorists, the Saudis tend to see it as Sunnis versus Shiites — and they favor the Sunnis, while the Americans back the Shiite-led government. And while Saudi Arabia wants to lure Hamas away from Iran's influence and back into the Arab fold, the United States views Hamas as a terrorist organization.

Nonetheless, both Washington and Riyadh believe that one important way to block Iran and calm the many fires in the region is to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict — or at least appear to be trying to.

On the surface, the effort by Saudi Arabia to establish itself as a counterpoint to Tehran is a contest between the main sects of Islam: Shiites, led by Iran, and Sunnis, led by Riyadh. Iran, which is Persian and not Arab, is the only state that is led by Shiite religious figures. Saudi Arabia is the birthplace of Islam, and its king draws legitimacy as the Custodian of the Two Holy Mosques, in Mecca and Medina.

The kingdom has been accused of stoking sectarian tensions as a way to drain popular support from Iran and its proxies, like Hezbollah — a charge officials here deny but for which there is some evidence.

In an interview on Jan. 27 that appeared in the daily Saudi newspaper Al Seyassa, King Abdullah was asked about widespread rumors that Shiites were trying to convert Sunnis. Iranian officials have dismissed such reports as a disinformation campaign aimed at inciting sectarian tensions.

"We are following up this matter and are aware of the Shiite proselytism and what point it has reached," the king was quoted as saying. "This majority will not abandon its beliefs. At the end of the day it is the decision of the majority of Muslims that counts. Other creeds do not appear able to infiltrate the Sunni majority or undermine its historical authority."

DOJ_NMG_0128565

Sectarian overtones aside, the battle is also about political power, national interests and preserving the status quo. Riyadh and its allies see a threat to their own power and security in the rise of Iran and the Shiite revival. They have expressed fear at Iran's insistence on pursuing a nuclear program, and anxiety over the rise in popularity of Hezbollah, the Shiite militia in Lebanon.

The Saudi shift, many here say, dates from last summer, when Israel failed to crush Hezbollah during 34 days of bombing, shocking officials here and throughout the region at the strength of Hezbollah, seen as Iran's regional proxy army.

In the interview with Al Seyassa, the king advised Iranian leaders "to know their limits."

Saudi analysts said another key moment came after the midterm elections in the United States when the Republicans lost control of Congress. That was read here as a sign that the United States might soon withdraw its troops from Iraq, leaving an open field to the Iranians.

"The outcome confirmed our worst fears," said Awadh al-Badi, director of the department of research and studies at the King Faisal Center for Research and Islamic Studies in Riyadh. "It said that we could no longer be sure of the Americans."

In January, the kingdom initiated talks with the Iranians to mediate the growing stalemate in Lebanon, where Hezbollah has faced off with the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora in sometimes violent confrontations. King Abdullah then held a surprise meeting with leaders of Hezbollah.

The kingdom has played host to numerous meetings of Sunni and Shiite leaders as well as of so-called moderate Muslim leaders in recent months, possibly to emphasize its custodianship of Islam's holiest sites. And it has decided that it will be the host of the next meeting of the Arab League, in Riyadh.

Officials said they hoped at that meeting to smooth relations with Syria after its president, Bashar al-Assad, insulted the Saudi king and President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt in a speech last summer. Officials believe that Syria had moved closer to Iran because of its isolation, and that that shift has given Iran a bridge to the Arab world.

"Politically speaking, Syria is not in the fold," said an Egyptian diplomat who spoke on the condition he not be identified. "Maybe the goal is to bring Syria back to the Arab world."

If so, that, too, could antagonize Washington, which wants to isolate Syria further.

Saudi Arabia's more pronounced public posture to counter Iran's rise also reflects realities that, while not new, have been underscored by the crises in the region. In particular, Arab officials and analysts say, the Arab world is not unified by a common social, political and economic agenda, and the traditional center of influence in Cairo has shifted to the oil-rich gulf.

In his recent newspaper interview, King Abdullah made that point, lamenting the failure of Arab countries to unite, while alluding to Iran's efforts to exploit the inability of Arabs to solve their own problems.

"We do not want any other party to manipulate our causes, profiteer from them, and draw strength from them," he said. "We do not want any other country to exploit our causes to bolster its position in its global conflicts."

Rivals Iran And Saudi Arabia Now Talking (AP)

By Scheherezade Faramarzi And Donna Abu-nasr

AP, February 6, 2007

Relations between Iran and Saudi Arabia are bumpy at the best of times, but violence between Shiites and Sunnis in Lebanon and Iraq is prompting the two Mideast heavyweights to engage in new talks seeking to head off a regional crisis.

The clearest sign of the new diplomacy has been in Lebanon, where a joint Saudi-Iranian effort defused a general strike called by the pro-Iranian Shiite militant group Hezbollah after the country erupted into violence two weeks ago, according to state-guided Saudi media.

Saudi Foreign Minister Saud Al-Faisal has said the two nations began working together after Iran approached his country to "cooperate in averting strife between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq and Lebanon" — an apparent reference to the joint intervention that calmed the strike unrest.

Saudi Arabia sent a high-profile envoy, Prince Bandar, to Tehran to study efforts being made there to defuse the unrest in Iraq and Lebanon and "explore what Iran can contribute," Al-Faisal said.

Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani made a visit to Saudi Arabia in mid-January that Arab media reports said sought Saudi help in easing tensions between his country and the United States and other Western nations over Tehran's nuclear program.

After Larijani's visit, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said the envoy proposed that Iran and Saudi Arabia cooperate on Iraq, Lebanon and other issues and that Riyadh's response had been "positive."

One Saudi official told The Associated Press last week that Iran asked the kingdom to get Washington to tone down its verbal attacks on Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0128566

Saudi Arabia, in turn, asked Iran to pressure its allies in Lebanon to work with Western-backed Prime Minister Fuad Saniora and to rein in Shiite militias in Iraq, according to the official, who agreed to discuss the talks only on condition of anonymity because of the matter's sensitivity.

It is unclear what the U.S. thinks of the diplomacy. Washington has tried to isolate Iran diplomatically and says it won't talk to Tehran unless the Iranians suspend uranium enrichment. The Bush administration also is beefing up U.S. military forces in the Persian Gulf in what it says is a signal to Iran.

But it is unlikely Saudi Arabia would risk its key relationship with the United States by entering talks with Iran without first consulting America.

"I'm sure the Saudis are getting the green light from the Americans to talk to the Iranians," said Saudi professor Khaled al-Dakhil.

Western diplomats in Saudi Arabia said there are no indications that the U.S. or other countries that decline to talk to Iran are unhappy about the Iranian-Saudi talks.

"Even governments that are very cautious about directly engaging Iran are happy that Saudi Arabia and Iran are talking," said one Western diplomat, who agreed to discuss the efforts only if not quoted by name because of their sensitive nature.

Saudi Arabia has a strong stake in calming the region. It is worried that Shiite-Sunni fighting in Iraq and Lebanon could explode out of control and damage its own interests or even lead the U.S. to attack Iran, which would have repercussions across the Middle East.

The Saudis have taken a large new role in mediating in the Palestinian power struggle between President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah movement and the Islamic militant group Hamas, which runs the Palestinian government. Observers say one of Saudi Arabia's main concerns — and that of the U.S. — is that Hamas has turned to Iran for money.

Saudi Arabia, whose predominant population is conservative Sunni Muslim, sees Shiite Iran as a danger to the region and to the monarchy's power, especially as money and weapons are channeled from Tehran to Hezbollah in Lebanon and to Shiite militias in Iraq.

More broadly, most Arabs are Sunnis and they are exhibiting strong anti-Shiite and anti-Iran sentiments amid suspicions about Iranian intentions in the region — including rumors of a campaign to convert Sunnis to Shiism.

More and more Arabs have been highlighting Iran's non-Arab roots, with some, like the editor of the Saudi newspaper Al-Riyadh, even insinuating recently that what is good for Iran is also good for Israel — the Arab world's traditional foe.

Tensions heightened even more last month after Saudi King Abdullah referred to the rumors that Iran is backing a drive to convert the Middle East to Shiism.

"We are following up on this matter and we are aware of the dimensions of spreading Shiism and where it has reached," Abdullah told the Kuwaiti newspaper Al-Siyassah. "The majority of Sunni Muslims will never change their faith."

Iranians, for their part, accuse Saudi Arabia and other U.S.-allied Arab states of misconstruing Iran's aims and they allege Saudis support Iraq's Sunni-dominated insurgency that targets Shiites in daily car bombings and other attacks.

Oil-rich Iran and Saudi Arabia have been at loggerheads — off and on — for decades, especially since the 1979 Shiite revolution toppled Iran's shah and swept Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini to power. But their leaders apparently felt the need to try to calm the situation, diplomats and analysts said.

"Sitting and talking is a good start for defusing tensions," said Mohammad Mohtadi, director of the Center for Middle East Strategic Studies in Tehran.

Tiny Qatar Vies For Big Regional Role (CSM)

By Danna Harman

The Christian Science Monitor, February 6, 2007

DOHA, QATAR

Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres touched down in Qatar last week – the highest-level visit by an Israeli to the Gulf in more than a decade. He debated local students, met the emir, toured the Iranian market, and then got his Israeli passport stamped at the airport and flew home.

While Mr. Peres's visit passed somewhat quietly, and peace didn't break out in its wake, the 40-hour voyage did, however, highlight a key aspect of Qatar's foreign policy – it is original.

Whether it's visionary – or merely iconoclastic – is another question altogether.

DOJ_NMG_0128567

Until 1995, Qatar did not have a distinguishable foreign policy to speak of, and instead took cues from Saudi Arabia and stayed on the sidelines of world affairs. But ever since reformist Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani deposed his father in 1995, Qatar has been charting an increasingly distinctive path.

"Qatar is a player now," says Chase Untermeyer, the US ambassador to Qatar. "You don't have to be a very big to be a player if you have talented team members – with the desire to play and ability to do so."

A desert of 4,500 flat square miles jutting into the Persian Gulf and controlling the third-largest gas reserve in the world, Qatar seems to be involved in everything lately. It has presided over OPEC (three times), is bidding for the Olympics, and bankrolls Al Jazeera, the controversial satellite TV channel.

Controversy seems to be the order of the day here. Qatar is the only Gulf country to maintain any sort of official relations with the Jewish state, allowing a "trade representation office" to remain open in Doha since 1996 and dismissing complaints by neighboring countries.

But this relative openness to Israel does not stop Qatar from funding the militant group Hamas, which controls the Palestinian government and calls for the destruction of Israel.

The emir recently transferred $22 million to Hamas as the first installment of a promised monthly assistance. And, in his meeting with Peres on Jan. 29, the emir asked Israel to be "pragmatic" and start talking with Hamas, according to Peres's office. Peres responded that negotiations would be impossible as long as Hamas continued to deny Israeli's right to exist.

Qatar's support of Hamas, meanwhile, does not mean that he isn't closely allied with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas's Fatah Party, which is engaged in a bitter power struggle with Hamas. Mr. Abbas owns a home in Doha and is said to be personally close to the emir. Hamas political leader Khalad Mashaal also owns a home here and is a palace friend.

The Israeli-Palestinian story is not the only one in which Qatar is playing a multiple hand. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Syrian leader Bashar al-Assad are welcome guests here. Saddam Hussein's wife was offered political asylum. Still, this does not interfere with the extensive economic ties between Qatar and the US, or the close coordination between the two countries on regional diplomatic and security initiatives. Qatar has, since the spring of 2003, allowed the US to make use of bases here for its central command and control of the Iraq war.

But some foreign diplomats here make light of Qatar's arguably undiscerning diplomacy – saying that having money to throw around does not translate into influence and being daring and different is a far cry from being mature. No officials, however, will say this on the record.

"Qatar is like a pendulum when it comes to foreign policy. It swings drastically and you never know what you are going to get. They seem to enjoy poking in the eyes of everyone," says one Western diplomat, asking not to be identified.

"Provoking everyone is a method of survival," adds another, speaking with the same condition of anonymity. "Basically, they are holding the stick on both sides. They would hold it on more sides if there were any."

Egypt's ambassador to Qatar is skeptical that Doha can mediate the Palestinian-Israeli crisis. "These are problems that have been going on for 60 years and are not going to be resolved in a moment," says Abdel Aziz Dawoud.

Egypt, he says, has a "long involvement" in the Israeli-Palestinian story. "Qatar's leadership is smart and active and believes it has a legitimate role to play. Well, that is legitimate. We know our role. Maybe they can be a complimentary force."

Sadiq al-Rikai, Iraq's ambassador to Qatar, suggests looking at the matter in a more positive way. "When nothing seems to be working, why not try something new?" he asks.

In the case of Iraq, Qatar has been supportive of both Sunnis and Shiites and is close to many other players in the Iraq field. All of which has potential, argues Mr. Rikai, to help broker positive change. "The Qataris can be a bridge for all of us. We all respect them. So, why not? "

In January, Qatar, in cooperation with Georgetown's School of Diplomacy, hosted a regional model UN. There was discussion of Iran's nuclear ambitions and an emergency session on the Lebanon crisis. And here, unlike many other model UN programs in the region, Israeli students were invited and Israel was represented amongst the nations in the debates.

Furthermore, moving from make-believe to real life, Roi Rosenblit, head of the Israeli trade mission in Doha, was welcome to observe the student exercises along with the rest of the diplomatic corps. He took the opportunity to talk with Arab youngsters who had never before seen, let alone spoken to, an Israeli.

"You did a great job portraying Venezuela," Mr. Rosenblit complimented a young Kuwaiti named Faris during a model UN buffet dinner.

"Wow! Are you really an Israeli?" responded the teenager. "You don't look like an Israeli."

"It sounds cheesy to say that you can change the world one conversation at a time, but it's sort of true," observed Kendell Brothers, a teacher at Faris's Kuwaiti school and a model UN chaperon.

"Qatar has a special place in being the only country to host an Israeli delegation in the region," Rosenblit explained later. "I would like to see Qatar use this leverage and special position to further the peace process and bring sides together."

U.S. Says North Korea Must Abandon Nukes (AP)

By Hiroko Tabuchi

AP, February 6, 2007

North Korea must get out of the nuclear business if it wants energy or economic aid, the chief U.S. negotiator said Monday, adding he believed the North was prepared to negotiate at the coming arms talks in Beijing.

However, he refused to speak on news reports that Pyongyang is prepared to freeze a key reactor and accept inspectors in exchange for 500,000 tons of heavy oil and other conditions.

"The DPRK (North Korea) must get out of the nuclear business entirely," Christopher Hill told reporters in Tokyo.

"Of course, it is envisioned there'll be some economic assistance and energy assistance," he said. "But the purpose of the exercise is to stop the North Koreans from operating this terrible nuclear reactor."

Hill added he believed Pyongyang "would come prepared to negotiate" after more than a year of stalled talks, but refused to elaborate.

Hill was to meet with Japanese officials before leaving for Beijing on Wednesday. The next round of talks is to start in the Chinese capital on Thursday among delegates of the two Koreas, Japan, the U.S., China and Russia.

Later Monday, Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Tokyo would not consider giving North Korea energy aid unless the communist also came clean on its past abduction of Japanese nationals.

Pyongyang claims it has returned all surviving victims who were kidnapped to train its spies in the Japanese language and culture. But Tokyo believes more Japanese are held.

"Japan will not be offering anything unless North Korea acts sincerely on the abduction problem," Abe told reporters late Monday.

Abe and Hill were responding to press reports that Pyongyang has said it could freeze the reactor at its nuclear complex in Yongbyon and accept international Atomic Energy Agency inspections in exchange for light-water reactors and oil until the reactors are completed.

Japanese media reported Sunday that in exchange for closing the Yongbyon nuclear reactor and allowing limited inspections, North Korea plans to demand more oil than the 500,000 tons it was promised under a 1994 deal.

The daily Asahi Shimbun and public broadcaster NHK cited Joel Wit, a former U.S. State Department official who met chief North Korean arms negotiator Kim Kye Gwan and other senior officials in Pyongyang.

"They want energy assistance, and the topic that came up the most was heavy oil," Wit said in an interview aired by NHK on Monday. "They really desperately need that."

North Korea was promised two light-water reactors under the 1994 deal to freeze its nuclear program, along with an annual supply of 500,000 tons of heavy fuel oil until the reactors were built

The deal was scrapped in 2002 when the nuclear crisis re-emerged and North Korea expelled IAEA inspectors.

U.S. Calls For End To 'Nuclear Business' (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

The top U.S. negotiator on North Korea said yesterday that Pyongyang must abandon its nuclear-weapons programs if it hopes to see the economic and energy aid promised in a September 2005 deal to resolve the Korean nuclear crisis.

With another round of multilateral talks set to begin in Beijing on Thursday, State Department envoy Christopher Hill dismissed a possible diplomatic feeler from the North offering to re-create the 1994 deal with the Clinton administration in which Pyongyang merely "suspended" its nuclear programs in exchange for massive energy subsidies.

North Korea "must get out of the nuclear business entirely," Mr. Hill told reporters in Tokyo yesterday en route to the Chinese capital.

"Of course, it is envisioned there'll be some economic assistance and energy assistance," said Mr. Hill, noting that both are promised to the North in the 2005 statement. "But the purpose of the exercise is to stop the North Koreans from operating this terrible nuclear reactor."

The six-party talks on the Korean crisis involve the two Koreas, the United States, Japan, Russia and host China.

A Japanese newspaper close to the Pyongyang regime reported over the weekend that the North had offered to suspend operations at its Yongbyon nuclear reactor and permit U.N. inspectors back to the site in exchange for more than 500,000 tons in fuel oil and help in constructing a nuclear reactor that could be used only for civilian power needs.

The "freeze-for-fuel" formula closely mirrors the Clinton administration's 1994 Agreed Framework deal designed to halt the North's nuclear-weapons program in exchange for U.S. and allied promises of energy aid.

DOJ_NMG_0128569

The 1994 deal broke down after the Bush administration said in 2002 that it found evidence the North had cheated on the accord almost from the start.

For its part, North Korea said the United States failed to deliver on its promises to help build two civilian nuclear-power plants promised in the agreement or to supply large quantities of fuel oil while the plants were being constructed.

The September 2005 statement of principles went far beyond a suspension of nuclear-weapons activity, calling for a "verifiable denuclearization" of both North Korea and South Korea, with the North's negotiating partners promising "economic cooperation" and "energy assistance" in return.

Mr. Hill said yesterday that he had not received any formal proposal from the North relating to the new fuel-aid request, but he said the U.S. bottom line has not changed.

Japan, which is demanding that North Korea release Japanese citizens kidnapped in the 1970s and '80s, would not consider offering Pyongyang any energy aid until the abduction issue is resolved, Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said yesterday.

Although demanding a total end to the North's nuclear weapons programs, Mr. Hill acknowledged that the six-party negotiators will make only partial progress in the latest round of talks. But U.S. officials have expressed cautious hope for progress after a meeting last month in Berlin involving Mr. Hill and North Korean negotiator Kim Kye-gwan.

N. Korea Aims To Improve On Clinton-Era Nuclear Deal (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

North Korea has set tough terms for a freeze of one of its nuclear facilities, demanding that the United States exceed commitments made under a Clinton-era deal that the Bush administration previously derided as inadequate.

North Korea's top nuclear negotiator, Kim Gye Gwan, and other officials outlined Pyongyang's position in meetings last week with two American nuclear experts, saying they would be presented when six-nation disarmament talks resume in Beijing on Thursday. In exchange for a freeze of the Yongbyon facility and a return of international inspectors, Pyongyang wants a substantial supply of heavy fuel oil, an end to a Treasury Department action that froze North Korean accounts at a Macau bank, an international commitment to build civilian nuclear reactors in North Korea and, most important, normalization of relations with Washington.

David Albright, president of the Institute for Science and International Security in Washington and one of the experts, said yesterday that the North Koreans appeared interested in a solution that would calm international concerns about Pyongyang's nuclear programs, provided it was tied to an improving relationship with the United States. But North Korea appeared initially willing to take only partial or temporary steps to keep the option of restarting its programs if the process fell apart. North Korea would also retain its stockpile of plutonium, which could fuel as many as 10 nuclear weapons.

"They are willing to take the first step," Albright said. "This may be the only step."

U.S. and Asian officials have said that in recent weeks North Korea has indicated a renewed interest in striking at least an initial agreement. But the North Korean demands are likely to complicate the diplomacy this week because the Bush administration does not want any agreement it strikes to compare unfavorably with that of the Clinton era.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, saying he did not want to discuss details of the U.S. position, said: "We believe we need to get on with the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula. Ultimately, that means the dismantlement of the North Korean nuclear weapons programs."

The North Koreans are demanding more than they received under the Clinton deal, known as the Agreed Framework, because they want compensation for the fact that, in their view, the Bush administration terminated it without cause in 2002, Albright said.

Under the 1994 Agreed Framework -- in which North Korea pledged to freeze and "eventually dismantle" its plutonium-producing nuclear facilities -- the United States was to provide 500,000 tons of heavy fuel oil every year while a consortium, largely funded by Japan and South Korea, built light-water reactors. At the time, North Korea was believed to have only a small supply of plutonium, for perhaps one or two weapons.

In 2002, the Bush administration accused North Korea of secretly building a highly enriched uranium facility in violation of the accord and terminated the deliveries of fuel oil. Pyongyang responded by evicting international inspectors and restarting the Yongbyon facility, allowing it to rapidly build up a stockpile of plutonium. It detonated its first nuclear device in October, adding to the international urgency in reaching a settlement.

U.S. intelligence analysts have closely tracked suspect purchases by North Korea that they believed were intended for use in a uranium facility, but the United States has never pinpointed its location. North Korea has adamantly denied it has a uranium program. In June 2004, U.S. negotiators presented the North Koreans with a lengthy list of items that U.S. intelligence believed North Korea had acquired overseas for the suspected uranium program. North Korea responded that U.S. intelligence was wrong -- a stance that officials maintained in conversations last week with Albright and Joel Wit, a former State Department official. "The intelligence has not held up from their point of view," Albright said.

North Korea is now demanding that the United States supply fuel oil in excess of 500,000 tons as part of any freeze deal, because that was the level set in the 1994 agreement. "That's the benchmark," Albright said. "They want more than that."

The freeze would only cover the increasingly decrepit Yongbyon facility, not other North Korean nuclear sites.

The North Korean officials also maintained that no freeze will take place until the U.S. side resolves the Treasury action against Banco Delta Asia, a Macau bank that allegedly served as a conduit for counterfeit U.S. currency. The case has resulted in the freezing of about $24 million in North Korean accounts and led other banks around the world to curtail dealings with North Korea. In recent talks with Treasury, North Korea identified a portion of the accounts that could be deemed legitimate in an effort to resolve the case.

"BDA is the tip of the iceberg," said Michael J. Green, a former White House official in charge of Asia policy and now at Georgetown University and the Center for Strategic and International Studies. He said ending the case would unleash tens of millions of dollars in commercial transactions that had been curtailed since Treasury moved against the bank.

Green said the North Koreans were asking for "basically the Agreed Framework," which he said would be a "hard sell back in Washington." Bush for four years has called for a "complete, verifiable, irreversible dismantlement," so U.S. negotiators have sought to disable the Yongbyon facility in such a way that it could not be quickly restarted.

But Kim indicated to the visiting Americans that, in the initial phase, North Korea at most would accept a "temporary disablement that would be probably reversible pretty quickly," Albright said.

U.S. Embassy Warns Of Sudan Threats (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou

AP, February 6, 2007

The U.S. Embassy warned Americans on Monday of a heightened terrorist threat against Westerners in Sudan.

"The U.S. Embassy advises all U.S. citizens in Sudan that the United Nations mission in Sudan has received new information that an extremist group based in the country is likely to target Western interests," it said.

The U.S. message followed a similar warning that the United Nations sent its staff in Sudan last week, said a U.N. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the issue with journalists.

The U.S. message warned of the danger of bombings, kidnappings and assassinations. It said the primary target of the threat might be the United Nations, but added that "terrorists do not distinguish between official and civilian targets."

U.S. Embassy spokesman Joel Maybury said the warning was standard procedure when a threat was perceived. "In places like Sudan, where you have instability and conflict, we may have half a dozen such messages a year," he said.

Maybury noted there is anger among some Sudanese against the U.N. mission in Sudan, which is promoting the peace process in the south of the country as well as running humanitarian operations in the conflict-ridden region of Darfur in western Sudan.

The United Nations says it has 10,000 peacekeepers in southern Sudan and about 2,500 civilian staff in the whole country. About 1,000 civilian personnel are based in Khartoum.

A U.N. official, who also insisted on not being quoted by name, said the warning stemmed from the tense situation in Darfur, where ethnic fighting has escalated in recent months and U.N. leaders have pressured Sudan's government to allow in a big U.N. peacekeeping force.

The government rejected that demand, but appears to be edging toward permitting small numbers of U.N. forces to deploy in Darfur as part of an 8,000-man African Union peacekeeping mission in the region.

U.S., Malaysia Resume Trade Talks (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

KUALA LUMPUR, Malaysia -- The U.S. and Malaysia yesterday began a fresh round of free-trade talks, bogged down by differences over opening two tightly protected sectors, and a controversy over a major gas deal with Iran.

The fifth round of meeting in Malaysia's Sabah state is crucial to determine if negotiators can bridge differences and conclude the pact before a July 1 deadline, officials said.

Details of the talks weren't disclosed. However, a telephone news conference was planned for Friday when the talks are scheduled to end.

Deputy U.S. Trade Representative Karan Bhatia warned last week that the proposed pact may falter if negotiators fail to make firm progress this week over opening up Malaysia's services and government contracts -- two top hurdles to a deal. Labor and environmental issues also are holding up talks, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0128571

Negotiators are under time pressure because U.S. President George W. Bush wants to get a congressional vote on the pact before his so-called fast-track trade authority expires July 1. That allows him to submit a deal to Congress for a straight up or down vote without amendments. But the proposed free-trade agreement, or FTA, must wrap up by the end of March so U.S. lawmakers have time to review it before a vote.

This week's talks also come amid new tensions over Malaysia's $16 billion deal to develop gas fields in southern Iran. U.S. House of Representatives' Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos last week urged the suspension of free-trade negotiations until Malaysia halts the deal, citing Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Malaysian Trade Minister Rafidah Aziz warned Washington that she would drop the free-trade talks if asked to scrap the deal with Iran. The free-trade negotiations began with the "full understanding that there would be no political agenda and no interference into domestic policies," Ms. Rafidah said.

Indonesia Withholds Vital Bird Flu Data (FT)

By John Aglionby, Andrew Jack

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

Indonesia, the country worst hit by the deadly H5N1 bird flu virus, has stopped sharing human genetic samples of the highly pathogenic illness with foreign laboratories, raising fears it could slow international efforts to prepare for a pandemic.

Officials say Indonesia stopped providing samples internationally last month, hindering efforts to confirm whether the virus killing its citizens is H5N1 and limiting production of vaccines to help prevent its spread.

Dr Triono Soendoro, director-general of Indonesia's National Institute of Health Research and Development, said the step to withhold samples was taken because the government wanted to keep control of the intellectual property rights of the deadly strain of the virus.

He declined to give further details but said "all will be revealed" on Wednesday, when Indonesian officials are due to announce they are collaborating with Baxter International, the world's biggest maker of blood-disease products, on a vaccine.

The move comes as Britain battles its worst outbreak of H5N1 bird flu, which yesterday led to several countries banning UK poultry imports, including Japan and South Korea. Defra, the UK's food, agriculture and rural affairs ministry, said it expected the restrictions to last until the UK had achieved "disease-free status".

The UK exports 270,000 tonnes of poultry meat annually, worth about £300m, according to the British Poultry Council.

Analysts say Indonesia hopes to offer exclusive rights to the strain to one company and cut a deal on cheaper products once they are developed.

One official warned that withholding samples could be counterproductive, since there was no guarantee the final human pandemic strain would derive from the current virus killing people in Indonesia. One bird flu expert in Jakarta said the move would not matter if Indonesia was able to do a full sequencing of its strain to detect mutations. "But given the country doesn't yet have the capability, this is now a very internationally worrying decision," the expert said. "If you reduce your chances of detecting whether a pandemic is about to occur, then a pandemic becomes more likely."

Bird flu has killed 63 out of the 81 people infected in Indonesia since testing started in 2005, according to the World Health Organisation.

Baxter confirmed last night that it expected to conclude a "framework for future collaboration" with Indonesia this week, which could involve intellectual property issues, but stressed that it would continue to comply with World Health Organisation rules on the sharing of virus samples.

India Steps Onto Tightrope As Talks Resume With Iran (LAT)

By Henry Chu

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

NEW DELHI — Amid mounting tension between Washington and Tehran, Indian and Iranian officials plan to meet today for their second round of high-level talks in less than three months, signaling the eagerness of the two countries to patch up differences that recently have clouded their historically close ties.

Despite American misgivings over the relationship, Indian Foreign Minister Pranab Mukherjee is expected to land in Tehran for discussions on Iran's nuclear program and on boosting cooperation over energy issues. As India's economy continues to boom, the Indian government is increasingly preoccupied with securing reliable sources of energy, including access to Iran's abundant natural gas reserves.

But its relations with Tehran have put New Delhi in a delicate position. The government of Prime Minister Manmohan Singh has staked much of its foreign policy on a growing partnership with Washington, antagonizing both Iran and the Indian left, which has long been distrustful of the U.S. but whose support Singh needs to stay in power.

India is now engaged in a difficult balancing act as it tries to reassure an old friend while cozying up to a new, more powerful and potentially more important one.

In play could be a historic agreement between Washington and New Delhi allowing India access to American nuclear fuel and technology and ending decades of international isolation for New Delhi as it pursued its own nuclear path.

The pact, which has already been ratified by U.S. lawmakers, awaits Indian approval. But one provision of the deal requires the U.S. president to report to Congress each year on whether New Delhi is participating in global efforts to restrain Tehran's nuclear ambitions, which critics here see as an affront to India's sovereignty and its long-standing relationship with Iran.

The White House also has warned New Delhi against going forward on a controversial $7-billion pipeline that would move gas from Iran to India through Pakistan.

With its economy expanding by about 8% a year, India is busy casting about for energy sources to fuel that growth. Officials say they cannot afford to turn their back on the potential lying in Iran's oil and gas fields, especially since China, Asia's other rapidly expanding behemoth, is a major competitor for such resources.

Tata Steel, one of India's corporate giants, announced last week that it had signed a deal to build a $1.4-billion plant in Iran on the Strait of Hormuz. India also wants to take advantage of a highway being built between Iran and Afghanistan to send its exports to the latter; overland access to Afghanistan from the east is blocked by India's longtime nemesis, Pakistan.

Besides economic concerns, deep cultural and political affinities bind India and Iran, whose ties stretch back into the mists of history.

"The relationship goes back 5,000 years," said Gulshan Dietl, an expert on Indo-Iranian relations at Jawaharlal Nehru University here. She noted that 10% of India's sizable Muslim population is Shiite, as is most of Iran, and that linguistic similarities link the two peoples.

More recently, in the latter half of the last century, New Delhi and Tehran joined hands as nonaligned Third World countries in favor of greater regional autonomy.

During the Cold War, India and, in the latter years, Iran regarded Washington with suspicion or hostility. So it is somewhat ironic that the U.S. is increasingly becoming a wedge between them.

As a result of India's economic liberalization, U.S.-Indian trade has shot up. In addition, New Delhi and Washington cast a wary eye at China's burgeoning political and economic clout, making them natural allies in the effort to contain Beijing.

At the time President Bush proposed the civilian nuclear cooperation accord during a visit by Singh to Washington in July 2005, the measure was celebrated as putting a seal on the rapprochement between the world's most powerful democracy and its most populous one.

Almost immediately, however, the Indian government found itself in a diplomatic pickle, under pressure from Washington to join in voting against Iran's nuclear program at the United Nations. New Delhi acceded, declaring that a nuclear-armed Tehran was not in India's interest, which represented "absolutely the nadir" in Indo-Iranian ties, Dietl said.

"Iran felt it had lost a valuable friend and potential interlocutor, while the U.S. — which saw how easily India buckled — began to take New Delhi's support for granted," commentator Siddharth Varadarajan wrote in Monday's edition of the Hindu newspaper.

Last November, after months of coolness, Tehran signaled its willingness to restore ties with a stop in New Delhi by Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki.

Today's reciprocal visit could help India regain some influence over its longtime friend, Varadarajan wrote, which could in turn allow New Delhi to play a mediating role in bringing the U.S. and Iran back from the brink of open confrontation.

Companies Urged To Push For Easing Cuba Restrictions (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, February 6, 2007

Congressional supporters of easing restrictions on travel and agricultural trade to Cuba say business supporters need to offer stronger backing for several measures introduced this year if they are to become law.

With Democrats in control of the House, Reps. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and Sam Farr (D-Calif.) said Cuba legislation has a great chance of moving this year, but Farr emphasized that the business community must become more engaged. Things get done in Washington “when there’s a stick upside your head,” Farr said, and business needs to increase pressure on members of Congress on Cuba.

Flake said business and farm groups should talk to more members about how lifting trade and travel restrictions will help the U.S. and Cuba. He spoke following a rally sponsored by USA Engage, an umbrella organization for business and agriculture groups that favors lifting Cuba trade and travel bans.

DOJ_NMG_0128573

USA Engage Director Jake Colvin acknowledged that companies have not been especially active on Cuba, partly because they saw it as a lost cause given the Bush administration's active efforts to tighten Cuba trade and travel bans. Yet while individual companies are reluctant to speak publicly, Colvin said more business representatives are willing to engage in private discussions on the issue because of the improving political climate.

"As business groups see the prospects for change, they'll be willing to do more," Colvin said.

Groups that support lifting the travel ban and restrictions on agricultural trade include the National Foreign Trade Council and several agriculture groups, including the American Farm Bureau Federation, USA Rice Federation and groups representing wheat and soybean producers.

Of the several Cuba bills that have been introduced this year, legislation introduced last week by Rep. Bill Delahunt (D-Mass.) easing restrictions on travel to Cuba by Cuban-Americans is considered to have the most momentum. Under rules imposed by the administration in 2004, Cuban-Americans may visit family members in Cuba once every three years. In addition, they only may visit "close relatives," which, under the administration's rules, does not include aunts and uncles.

If Delahunt's bill is approved by Congress, Flake said he would be "very surprised" if President Bush vetoed legislation easing these rules. "From a humanitarian point of view, it's hard to argue about allowing Cuban-Americans to go home and see their grandmother," agreed Rep. Jerry Moran (R-Kan.), who supports the legislation.

Some Democrats also see the Delahunt legislation as a way to make inroads with Cuban-Americans, who tend to vote Republican. New Democrat Network Hispanic Strategy Center Director Joe Garcia, who opposes lifting the ban on Americans traveling to Cuba, is supporting Delahunt's legislation and calls it a political opportunity for Democrats.

Garcia said Democrats need to find common ground with Cuban-Americans, noting that easing travel restrictions is a way to do that. Lifting the entire travel ban would be overreaching, he said. "We've got to do this incrementally," he said.

President Clinton won about 38 percent of the Cuban-American vote in Florida in 1996, but Vice President Al Gore won only about 10 percent in 2000 because of opposition to the Clinton administration's handling of the Elian Gonzalez case, in which a Cuban child forcibly was returned to his father in Cuba, Garcia said. With 38 percent of the Cuban vote, it would be difficult for a Democratic presidential candidate to lose Florida, he said.

Flake has reintroduced legislation co-sponsored by Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) to lift the overall travel ban. In an interview, Rangel said he would push hard for a vote on the bill, adding that while he has yet to speak with Democratic leaders, he does not anticipate a problem.

Rangel acknowledged that President Bush may veto the legislation for political reasons. "The president will probably veto it," Rangel said. "For the president, you know, it's not a trade thing, it's a Miami thing."

Supporters said the legislation could face an uphill climb in the Senate, as Sens. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) and Robert Menendez (D-N.J.), who are both of Cuban descent, are on record as supporting the travel ban.

The executive director of the Cuban American Commission for Family Rights, Sylvia Wilhelm, anticipated that House International Relations Committee ranking member Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.) and other members of the Florida congressional delegation will oppose lifting any travel restrictions. Wilhelm said she was hopeful, however, that key senators such as Martinez and Menendez would at least support lifting the restrictions on travel by Cuban-Americans.

Separately, Moran has introduced legislation easing restrictions on exports of food and agricultural commodities to Cuba. The key provision in Moran's bill allows sales of agricultural goods to Cuba once shipments leave U.S. ports. Current rules do not allow U.S. shipments to leave U.S. ports until a payment is received, which critics say thwarts efforts to increase agricultural exports to Cuba.

Moran's bill would also allow visas to be issued to Cuban officials and U.S. citizens to travel between the U.S. and Cuba to conduct agricultural sales, and would let U.S. banks participate in transactions, although they could not finance sales.

In an interview, Moran said Martinez would be a key in the Senate. He said he was hopeful Martinez would choose not to block the legislation, and noted the senator has expressed support for some level of agricultural trade to Cuba.

Post-Fidel Cuba (WT)

By Vicki Huddleston

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

In the spring of 2002, I picked up a group of young Cubans along Quinta Avenida headed toward central Havana to hang out and treat themselves to ice cream and cakes. When they asked me where I got the beautiful black Crown Victoria sedan I was driving, I told them that I was the chief of the U.S. Interests Section, our diplomatic mission in Cuba. Delighted, they exclaimed, "Be our mother and take us to Miami!"

Forty-five years ago on Feb. 3, 1962, 10 months after the Bay of Pigs and eight months before the Cuban missile crisis, President Kennedy announced a total embargo on trade with Cuba. President Eisenhower, fearing Communists were gaining the upper hand, had already put in place sanctions in retaliation for the seizure of American properties shortly after Fidel Castro took power on Jan. 1, 1959.

Now, almost a half-century later, the long era of Mr. Castro is over. The brief era of his brother, Raul, who at 75 cannot rule Cuba for long, has begun. But very little change will take place in Cuba as long as the Cuban people are isolated from their loved ones and from the ideas and influences of the outside world. If we want to give those kids a chance to build a prosperous and democratic future in Havana -- not Miami -- we will have to change tactics.

To start the ball rolling, President Bush should reinstitute the "People-to-People" program and the annual Cuban American family visits that were in place during the first two years of his administration. These policies were opening doors in Cuba.

Under the People-to-People program, licensed groups from churches, universities and theaters throughout the United States were carrying out their own brand of grass-roots diplomacy by connecting with Cuban doctors, teachers and religious leaders. They were helping Cubans live better lives and to begin preparing for a better future. Cuban Americans were visiting their families in Cuba, bringing much need medicines and giving their children a chance to hug their grandparents and learn firsthand about what happened in Cuba.

Cubans from Santiago de Cuba in the East to Pinar del Rio in the West were beginning to believe that freedom was not a distant dream. They were learning firsthand about life in our country by listening to AM-FM shortwave radios and reading books handed out by an intrepid band of diplomats assigned to the U.S. Interests Section in Havana.

Mr. Bush can make these changes now. No congressional action is needed and they will make a difference as they did five years ago, when they helped create a "Cuban Spring."

But more needs to be done, it isn't all up to Mr. Bush. Congress will have to act if the president is to have the flexibility he needs in the coming months and years to respond to the challenges and opportunities Fidel Castro's death and Raul Castro's succession will bring. Until the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity legislation, known as Helms-Burton, is revised or abrogated the president cannot lift the embargo unless both both Castros are out of power and a new Cuban government is well on its way toward a multiparty democracy.

Congressional action does not end the embargo. The president by executive action can keep the embargo in place. But if Congress abrogates or revises Helms-Burton, the president will have the opportunity to respond should Raul Castro begin to carry out reforms. For example, should Raul Castro allow Cubans to open their own businesses, in order to meet the pent up expectations of Cuba's youth for jobs and better pay, Mr. Bush could remove restrictions that block the sale of computers, televisions and radios, thereby enhancing the flow of information and ideas that would prompt more and faster political as well as economic reform.

Forty-five years later, isn't it time to clear the way for a new relationship?

Ambassador Vicki Huddleston, a non-resident senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, served as principal officer of the U.S. Interests Section in Havana (1999-2002) and as director and deputy director of the State Department's Office of Cuban Affairs (1989-1993).

U.S. Wants Nicaragua Missiles Destroyed (AP)

By Filadelfo Aleman

AP, February 6, 2007

The United States insisted Monday that Nicaragua destroy hundreds of Soviet-made surface-to-air missiles after President Daniel Ortega said the weapons were needed for the country's defense.

Ortega, a former revolutionary who returned to the presidency on Jan. 10, said Friday it would be "absurd" to destroy Nicaragua's SAM-7 missiles while neighboring Honduras is adding U.S. planes to its military fleet. Nicaragua has been in a dispute with Honduras since 1999 over its territory in the Caribbean Sea.

The U.S. Embassy said in a media statement released Monday that Honduras is buying eight small planes from the U.S. to be used in the fight against drug trafficking and not offensive military aircraft.

"The U.S. government expects that Nicaragua will continue its already established path of disarmament and destruction of all SAM-7 missiles," it said.

Nicaraguan officials have destroyed half of their initial stock of about 2,000 missiles and Ortega's predecessor offered to destroy 651 more.

The Soviet Union supplied the missiles at a time when Ortega's former leftist Sandinista government was an ally in Cold War-era struggles against the United States. The U.S. supported Contra rebels trying to overthrow the Sandinistas.

U.S. officials say they fear the weapons could fall into the hands of terrorists.

Ortega's Sandinista party insists that the United States compensate Nicaragua for the missile destruction.

U.N. Chief Returns To Headquarters, Where Battles Await Him (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Feb. 5 — Ban Ki-moon, the new United Nations secretary general, returned to his headquarters on Monday after a two-week working trip to Africa and Europe and ran into dissension over restructuring changes he has proposed and concern at the slow pace of his appointing top officials since taking office on Jan. 1.

"Today is probably his first reality check," Dan Gillerman, the ambassador from Israel, said after a two-hour closed-door session in which members of the 192-member General Assembly raised questions about Mr. Ban's reform proposals.

"To make any change at the U.N. is something which involves a lot of negotiation, a lot of compromise, and whatever proposal you bring will look totally different after everybody has had a go at it, and we saw the first signs of that today," Mr. Gillerman said.

At issue are Mr. Ban's proposals to divide peacekeeping, the fastest growing activity at the United Nations, into two departments, and to reshape the disarmament department in a way that many envoys believe downgrades it.

The changes would strike a layman as bureaucratic nuance. But at the United Nations, they fuel a continuing competition between the great powers — which exercise commanding power through the 15-member Security Council — and the General Assembly, where the developing world feels its authority is threatened when its elaborate deliberative procedures are not respected.

Mr. Ban angered many ambassadors by saying that he expected to gain rapid approval of his proposals and would delay filling the ranks of top-level management until agreement was reached on his restructuring plan. The approach raised questions about whether Mr. Ban, a former South Korean foreign minister, understood the easily offended sensitivities of the world he has entered.

"We do not think there should be arbitrary deadlines," said Munir Akram, the Pakistani ambassador, who is the chairman of the 133-nation group that speaks for the developing world. "We also believe that established procedures should be followed."

Many at the United Nations are unhappy over the delay in top appointments, especially since Mr. Ban is the first secretary general whose selection by the Security Council came early enough to give him three months of planning time before he took over.

"People had expected that team to be in place by now," said Mr. Gillerman. "The longer he puts it off, the longer the anticipation and the longer the disappointment."

Alejandro D. Wolff, the acting American ambassador, said that Mr. Ban had now decided to "delink" the appointments of new officials and the agreement on structural changes, and that appointments would be announced within days. Mr. Wolff declined, however, to confirm the widespread rumor that B. Lynn Pascoe, the American ambassador to Indonesia, would be the new undersecretary general for political affairs.

Mr. Ban used Monday's meeting to introduce the new deputy secretary general, Asha-Rose Mtengeti-Migiro, the former foreign minister of Tanzania. The secretary general has said that Ms. Migiro will be in charge of the management overhaul that he has pledged.

Asked how she reacted to critics who have noted the absence of extensive management experience on her resume, Ms. Migiro said she had run two government ministries. "So I believe I have enough capability to do the managerial work that the secretary general envisages," she said, "and maybe I should emphasize that, yes, the United Nations is a big organization, but management does not always have to do with the size of the organization."

If Mr. Ban has run into early turbulence at the United Nations, he has succeeded off-premises in combating his reputation for being a wooden public presence. He has leavened his appearances with jokes about the proper pronunciation of his surname, which he says is "bahn" not "ban." "I don't want to ban anything," he said at a breakfast meeting of leaders of the New York City business community.

He charmed guests at a December dinner of the United Nations Correspondents' Association by singing "Ban Ki-moon is coming to town" to the familiar melody about Santa Claus. And he mixed with Bush administration officials and members of Congress gamely wearing a gift cowboy hat at a dinner given in his honor in Washington last month.

The United States, which was frequently at odds with Kofi Annan, the former secretary general, was a strong backer of Mr. Ban's candidacy, and Mr. Wolff, the American envoy, said it backs his proposals.

"You'll have a lot of different views on the details, whether this is the best one or a different approach might be better," he said, "but you have 192 members and consensus is not easy to get, so support for the secretary general is the principle that we stand by."

Ban's U.N. Peacekeeping Reforms Rejected (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon faced one of his first tests Monday when developing nations sent him back to the drawing board with his plan to restructure the U.N.'s peacekeeping department.

The setback could foretell troubles for the new secretary-general, who faces the task of reforming the U.N. at a time when its peacekeeping demands are growing in nations such as Sudan and perhaps Somalia.

But his desire to do it quickly, without the ritual rounds of consultations, has revived long-standing tensions between rich and poor countries on a topic that is vital to developing nations, where most of the world's conflicts are occurring.

The developing countries fear that Ban's changes could endanger peacekeeping troops and make disarmament affairs less of a priority.

Pakistan's U.N. ambassador, Munir Akram, who represents a group of 114 developing nations, said Ban would have to win consent from two committees and submit to more consultations before his group could approve the proposal. His statement served as a warning to Ban, as well as to nations such as the United States and Russia, that reform will not be quick.

"He must understand: The ambassadors are not his staff," Akram said. "When he asks for our opinion, he must show that he is listening."

Akram said that the way Ban handled his first high-profile restructuring would set the tone for the rest of his reform program. "If he pushes hard and he fails, then the rest of his agenda goes off the rails," he said.

Ban's predecessor, Kofi Annan, faced similar resistance from developing countries and from the United States, which had its own vision for changing the world body. Ban, a self-described "harmonizer," had hoped to avoid divisions and jockeying.

Stung by the initial rejection, Ban pleaded for the cooperation of all 192 member nations during a closed-door General Assembly session. "Every one of you has the right to be listened to, whatever the size of your country or budget, whichever hemisphere you call home," he said.

Ban singled out peacekeeping and disarmament as the U.N.'s most fundamental and urgent areas of activity, and said they must be updated swiftly. The U.N. has 18 peacekeeping operations, with about 100,000 personnel in the field.

The U.N. peacekeeping apparatus "is dramatically strained and overstretched," Ban said. Improving peacekeeping, he added, is "a matter of life and death to millions of people who depend on us."

Ban's proposed reforms would lower the rank of disarmament affairs, but make it more directly accountable to the secretary-general through a Department of Political Affairs post expected to go to the U.S. Ambassador to Indonesia, B. Lynn Pascoe. Ban also would separate the policy and planning of peacekeeping from the side that supplies troops and equipment.

Acting U.S. Ambassador Alejandro D. Wolff said that Washington supported Ban's efforts and wanted to avoid debating the issue "indefinitely."

"It is his responsibility to deliver a Secretariat that is responsive, that does its work well, that is efficient, that is transparent," Wolff said. "We hold him accountable for that and therefore we ought to give him the authority to do the necessary changes."

Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said he hoped the process did not stall in endless meetings. "Various views were expressed, but I think there is a general feeling that we want to support the secretary-general," he said.

FLASH POINT Corruption Crackdown Targets Shanghai Inc. (WSJ)

By James T. Areddy

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

SHANGHAI -- With its gleaming towers and explosive growth, this city has helped inspire dreams of a China century. Governed for four years by a British-educated architect named Chen Liangyu, Shanghai exuded a can-do attitude that welcomed foreign investment and showcased China's emergence on the world stage.

But underneath the boom and glitter, Communist Party leaders in Beijing say, lay a secret: massive corruption.

Last fall, the party fired Mr. Chen, alleging mismanagement and theft at a city pension fund, influence peddling and other misdeeds. It detained him at an undisclosed location. There, he has made no public comment.

The fall of Mr. Chen, who not only ran the city but sat in China's ruling Politburo, was China's biggest political shakeup in a generation. But more than the ouster of one official, it amounted to an indictment of the business model known as Shanghai Inc.

Key to that model, according to company and government statements: Giant construction projects got funded from public coffers; choice assets moved out of state hands in elaborate transactions; and plum contracts went to the well-connected.

DOJ_NMG_0128577

The crackdown is a reminder that China's system leaves great power in the hands of local Communist leaders, whose decisions can ripple unchecked through the economy. Now that the party has stepped in to take its Shanghai leader out of action, approval for the flashy big development projects for which Shanghai is famed has slowed to a crawl.

ONLINE TODAY

See some of the buildings involved1 in the pension fund mismanagement in Shanghai over the past several years.

The party, which says its biggest threat is corruption within its ranks, has sent investigators sniffing for official graft in other Chinese cities as well. The Chinese have a saying: Kill a chicken to scare the monkeys. Mr. Chen's ouster is a reminder to local leaders, as well as to foreign investors, that roaring Shanghai-style growth is no longer Beijing's priority. If officials elsewhere take Mr. Chen's fate as a warning, one result could be to tap the brakes on China's booming economy. That would bolster a goal of moderation that Beijing has so far pursued to limited success by jawboning and curbing bank lending.

Mr. Chen's post as party secretary for Shanghai gave him vast power: control over 45% of the city's industry, from manufacturers to banks and property developers. The portfolio reflects the Communist Party's core position in Chinese business. A party-appointed secretary sits at the helm of many business groups in the country, including some joint ventures with foreigners.

In Shanghai, party officials all answered to Mr. Chen. After his September ouster, dozens fell along with him, from a pension-system chief to a mutual-fund executive to Mr. Chen's son and brother-in-law. The detentions have placed power in the hands of officials who are extra-careful in granting licenses and making other approvals needed to do business in Shanghai, say investors.

A subway expansion under way has been called into doubt, as has privatization of a water utility. Museum projects, including a Shanghai branch of France's Centre Georges Pompidou, are held up, as is approval for a Saks Inc. store on the classy waterfront district known as the Bund. The city has put on ice a campaign to lure a Walt Disney Co. theme park and a plan for the world's tallest Ferris wheel, officials say. Saks says it has pushed back the planned opening of its store to 2009 from 2008, while Disney says its China strategy is broader than a Shanghai theme park.

The 60-year-old Mr. Chen was fond of tennis, and a few years ago, Shanghai spent $300 million to build an arena to host the Tennis Masters Cup. Future tournaments are uncertain without their No. 1 fan: Mr. Chen.

Shanghai still has plenty of sizzle. For 2006, it reported its 15th straight year of double-digit economic growth, 12%. But expansion in fixed-asset investment such as property development, while still robust at 11%, was far below the rate of two years ago.

And there are some signs the city is losing its legendary magnetism. The government recently gave permission to the northern city of Tianjin to adopt looser foreign-exchange regulations, not to the traditional banking center of Shanghai. Some foreign developers say it makes sense now to seek opportunities in other Chinese cities rather than Shanghai.

The scandal is a reminder of the role corruption long played in Shanghai's history. Though the city was famed early last century as the East's richest banking center, and opulent Art Deco buildings sprang up on the Bund, government-tolerated opium and prostitution rings also earned the city the label Whore of the Orient. Its very name came to stand for trickery, as in getting "shanghaied" into working on a ship. The Communist Party was founded in Shanghai and rose partly on a wave of resentment against the corruption of the ruling Nationalists.

Decades later, the city was identified with Mao's Cultural Revolution and then the policies of "capitalist roader" Deng Xiaoping. Mr. Chen arrived in Shanghai as its transformation to a futuristic city was beginning. After studying architecture at an army institute, he joined the Communist Party in 1980. It put him in charge of Shanghai Electric Group Co., a massive machinery maker sometimes called China's General Electric. Later, his party jobs included overseeing sports programs, old cadres' retirement and transforming the historic Bund district.

Mr. Chen was allied with Shanghai party secretary Jiang Zemin, one of the pioneers in opening Shanghai to foreign investment. When Mr. Jiang vaulted to Chinese president, a string of Shanghai leaders followed him to national office, enabling Mr. Chen to move up the ranks in Shanghai.

In 1992, Mr. Chen cut short a course in public policy at England's University of Birmingham to accept a promotion back in Shanghai. After a tour as mayor, he ascended in 2002 to the top party post in eastern China: Shanghai party secretary.

Tall, brainy and confident, Mr. Chen fit the part of a big-city boss. He conveyed a populist persona by riding the subway to work and having his spokeswoman hold regular news conferences, a first for a Chinese city.

As foreign money poured in, the city's economic engine seemed to be firing on all cylinders. Companies blazed their logos in neon along the riverfront. Magazine covers touted the skyline as a symbol of the new China.

Behind the scenes, the boom appeared less spontaneous. Mr. Chen's government was seeding big projects from its own coffers and steering city pension funds into deals, according to official reports and people close to the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0128578

Records show that to complete a 60-story Marriott hotel, featuring a triangular top and a Ferrari dealer at its base, the city used pension money despite China's prohibition on doing so. And in order to clear swaths of riverfront for still more apartment towers, the city government spent $1.7 billion to relocate its container handling docks to a distant island.

Public works got increasingly grandiose. In 2003, shortly after Mr. Chen revealed a passion for classical music, the city hoisted a 1930s opera house off its foundation and moved it 215 feet to a better location.

When Shanghai bid to be a host city for Formula One auto racing, Mr. Chen's brother-in-law took charge of building a billion-dollar track. The circuit was "unquestionably the finest in the world," marveled 27-time Grand Prix winner Jackie Stewart, who added that "no democracy could afford this."

The city government also sold assets in murky deals, according to brief stock-market disclosures and other official sources. In late 2004, Shanghai's State Asset Bureau sold 8% of Shanghai Electric, the $4.25 billion machinery maker Mr. Chen once headed. The local government also sold 20% of Hua An Fund Management Co., a mutual-fund group that manages $4.3 billion of assets.

The city gave no values for the deals or reasons for doing them. But according to the companies, the buyer in each case was a man named Zhang Rongkun, who earlier in 2004 had also built a toll highway to the Formula One track. Forbes estimated the obscure 33-year-old's worth at $605 million.

But tension with the central government was growing. The first signs of it had already arisen in 2002, soon after a new generation of officials with few Shanghai links rose to power in Beijing, led by President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao.

As Shanghai continued to pour money into megaprojects that underpinned property and commodity costs nationwide, the disconnect with Beijing's leadership widened. When the central government imposed a national tax in 2005 to squeeze property speculators, Shanghai diluted it with local exemptions.

In the middle of last year, the government stepped up a crackdown on excesses. For instance, a vice mayor of Beijing was ousted in June for "corruption and dissoluteness" in his job, which included overseeing construction for the 2008 Olympic Games.

Mr. Chen appeared bulletproof. His mentor, former President Jiang, still pulled strings from his retirement, in a Shanghai compound so exclusive that the streets around it aren't on maps. But in August, just as the former president was enjoying a last hurrah with publication of his memoirs, investigators from the Communist-run central government and military began detaining Shanghai officials.

First came the chief of the city pension fund and then Mr. Zhang, the wealthy young purchaser of parts of two state companies, Shanghai Electric and Hua An Fund Management. He couldn't be reached for comment. Detained shortly afterward were Mr. Chen's longtime secretary and people who ran Hua An, plus heads of the Shanghai asset bureaus that sold the stakes in the companies.

Mr. Chen's brother-in-law, boss of the Formula One speedway, was detained. The Communist Party dealt with them in a time-honored method of party discipline, with detention as the first step in what is usually a secretive trial process.

On Sept. 25, the party stunned Shanghai by announcing that Mr. Chen himself was out. Besides pension corruption, said the state-run Xinhua news agency, Mr. Chen had committed "other discipline violations," such as "helping further the economic interests of illegal entrepreneurs," protecting colleagues who "severely violated laws" and aiding family members "by taking advantage of his official posts."

Mention of Mr. Chen quickly vanished from government Web sites. Within hours, Shanghai party members were summoned to a ballroom at a state-owned newspaper company, Wenhui-Xinmin United News Group. There, says a person who was present, party members heard more specific accusations: that Mr. Chen had channeled cash to his family, including $125 million in city pension money to his son, Chen Weili.

The son was a figure in sports, as deputy manager of the city's professional soccer club and publisher of China's Tennis World magazine. He was an official of a company that bought control of a city-owned developer with prominent projects on the Bund, including one with New York-based Rockefeller Group International Inc. The son, detained, couldn't be reached for comment. Rockefeller, a unit of Japan's Mitsubishi Estate Co., says its project has been unaffected by the case.

Several books quickly appeared, anonymously purporting to tell more of the story of the Shanghai leader's downfall, such as tales of alleged carousing and mistresses.

The investigation has especially chilled the property industry. Across the Huangpu River from the Bund, Japan's Mori Building Co. is barred from leasing space in a 100-story skyscraper it's building until the city government signs off on the tower's name, say people familiar with the project. The city's plans for a similar-size skyscraper next door are on hold.

Vincent Lo, a Hong Kong magnate who used to boast about his political connections, has warned investors that his company faces legal risks for accepting pension money to try to build a Shanghai version of Silicon Valley. In contrast to the

U.S., China bars the investment of pension money in real estate, to keep retirees' money from being squandered in chancy projects.

Shanghai's mayor and acting party secretary, Han Zheng, says real-estate investors are still welcome. But now, extravagance is out, and "prominent use will be made of caps and ceilings" to control economic growth, he said in a recent address.

When the scandal broke, Mr. Lo of Hong Kong was in the midst of building the "Knowledge & Innovation Community," an ultramodern apartment and office complex adapted to high-tech tenants. Oracle Corp. and Cisco Systems Inc. called it Shanghai's version of Silicon Valley and agreed to help build it.

Among his financing: $190 million from the Shanghai pension fund. It had been funneled through Shanghai Pudong Development Bank Co., a local-government-run bank part-owned by Citigroup Inc., and masked as commercial lending, according to regulatory notices. Pudong Development and Citigroup had no comment.

Mr. Lo said he was returning the pension money and might be unable to finish the project but knew of no investigation targeting him. He replaced the pension money in part with a $113 million loan, but that came on tougher terms and needs to be repaid by March. Through a spokeswoman, Mr. Lo said he is arranging repayment and his projects remain on track. Oracle wouldn't say whether it remains involved. Cisco declined to comment on Mr. Lo's funding.

Market Leninism (WSJ)

By Ross Terrill

The Wall Street Journal, February 6, 2007

Mao Zedong, alone among major 20th-century dictators, enjoys a benign life-after-death. Taxi drivers in south China hang a Mao portrait on the steering wheel to ward off accidents. Nightclub singers in Beijing throb to lyrics from Mao's "Quotations." Urban youths relax in "Cultural Revolution-style" cafés at rough-hewn tables with Mao slogans on the wall, eating peasant dishes as they answer cell phones and chat about the stock market. Mao temples exist in some Buddhist villages, the altar adorned with a serene Mao image.

As President Hu Jintao tries to transcend communism forward to "market Leninism," Mao, now dead for 30 years, transcends communism backward to Chinese folk history. He floats into a nether zone as if he'd never been a political figure at all.

Where is Mao the totalitarian? Tens of millions of Chinese died in the forced collectivization of the Great Leap Forward of 1958 and '59, victims of Mao's utopianism and cruelty. Millions more died, and tens of millions had their lives ruined, during the Cultural Revolution of the 1960s.

The cab drivers, farmers, pop singers and rural worshippers are really only echoing the Chinese Communist Party, which does not quite know how to handle Mao's legacy. New history textbooks approved for initial use in Shanghai have largely brushed Mao out of China's story. Can a society that lived by Confucianism for two millennia, and later by Mao's leftist political faith, be content with amnesia about the Mao era and the absence of a believed public philosophy to replace communism?

Redeeming traits may help explain why Mao has been treated more gently than Stalin or Hitler. He wrote impressive essays and memorable poems. He was part monkey and part tiger, as he said of himself. The "tiger" knew how get from point A to point B, but the "monkey" felt doubt about the desirability of arriving at point B. Crucial, however, is the Chinese state's need for Mao. The CCP cannot simply denounce Mao as Nikita Khrushchev indicted Stalin in 1956. Mao, after all, was not only China's Stalin, but also its Lenin and even its Marx. President Hu is heir to the power seized by Mao in 1949. Mao's gun is his legitimacy.

Mao made history; at the same time, history made Mao. Were the hundreds of millions of Chinese who wept at the sight of him out of their minds? In addition to looking at Mao's major failings as a human being, we must look at the structures that turned Mao's whim into CCP tyranny. At the reasons for the evaporation of his youthful idealism and exactitude. At the social engineering ideas he sprayed over China.

"Jesus was dismembered for speaking out," Mao wrote to a friend at age 22, in 1915. "He who speaks out does not necessarily transgress, and even if he does transgress, this is but a small matter to a wise man." Yes, young Mao was an ardent individualist. At teachers' training college his credo became the self-realization of the individual. "Wherever there is repression of the individual," he wrote in the margin of a Chinese translation of Friedrich Paulsen's "System of Ethics," "wherever there are acts contrary to the nature of the individual, there can be no greater crime."

Mao's respect for individual freedom later collapsed. There were four reasons. One was the powerful current of nationalism in early-20th-century China; the cry to rescue the nation eclipsed individual self-realization. A second was the large role of war in China from the 1920s to the 1940s. Pervasive violence made political debate a luxury and favored repression. A third was Mao's embrace of Marxist ideas of class, economic planning and communist party organization. Fourth was the hangover in Mao's mind and Chinese society generally of an emperor mentality.

In the end, Mao, facilitated by Stalin, built a party-state that neatly combined Leninism, the paternalism of early Chinese sage-rulers and fascism Chinese-style. He sought to craft a "new man."

Mao's achievement was to unite China after foreign invasions and civil war, and to make China after 1949 a force with which to be reckoned. But his social engineering efforts were largely canceled by Deng Xiaoping after Mao's death in 1976. In subsequent years, the totalitarian state became an authoritarian state. Today, retention of CCP power, moneymaking for the folks below, national glory for all, and a veil over the past in the name of "good feelings" are the chief priorities. With Mao's "new" Chinese man gone, the "old" Chinese man of family values, entrepreneurial spirit and a belief in China as a religion reappears.

But the soft landing for Mao is not the final word. Some say Deng reversed Mao's revolution, but it is an important distinction that Deng dismantled Mao's thought yet retained Mao's state. Deng-ism (continued by President Hu) was a retreat from as much as possible of Maoism without endangering Leninist political power.

In late 2006 Beijing jailed three intellectuals on trumped-up charges behind which lie the sin of speaking indiscreet words. Ching Cheong, chief China correspondent of a Singapore newspaper, got five years for "spying," but really for getting a fee to speak at a seminar run by a think tank that Beijing dislikes. Zhao Yan, a researcher for the New York Times in Beijing, got three years for "fraud," but really for feeding the Times information on some mild political tensions within the Chinese government. Chen Guangchen, a blind self-taught lawyer, got 51 months for "gathering a crowd to disrupt traffic," but really for annoying officials in Shandong Province by representing victims of sterilizations and forced abortions carried out contrary to Beijing's own regulations. The intended intimidation in these three cases is an all-too-clear residue of the Mao era, when citizens never knew where they stood in relation to authority.

We return to the "solution" of having Mao float into folklore as a modern-day Yellow Emperor for an age of weapons in space and the WTO; a figure of dignity who can serve as a fashion model for green silk pajamas, as I recently noticed in a Shanghai department store. Such "Maoism" is the twitching of a society whose post-Mao leaders have offered economic advancement but political smoke and mirrors. It is easier and safer, of course, to domesticate Mao (the green silk pajamas), criticize him as an evil individual (as some do in private), or simply draw a veil over him (the CCP line), than to broach the problem of the political system he introduced to China.

Today, young pro-market Chinese who devour Hayek's "Road to Serfdom" and books on American business are embracing an antistate Chinese tradition (best known in the West through Taoism). They would like -- but will not get -- a China without politics. A new public philosophy, when it comes, as it must, will come from gestation below, not as a diktat from a father-figure or a paternalistic Communist Party.

"When societies first come to birth, it is the leader who produces the institutions," wrote Montesquieu. In China, that was the Mao era. "Later it is the institutions which produce the leaders," the French philosopher added. That is today's China, with its nine-man leading group (all engineers). Later still, in a democratic era, it will be the voting public that chooses among clusters of policies devised by politicians allowed only the short term authority to lead.

Mr. Terrill, a research associate at Harvard's Fairbank Center, is the author of "The New Chinese Empire" (Basic Books, 2004).

New Charges In Russia Against Oil Executives (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

New York Times, February 6, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 5 — Russian prosecutors brought new charges Monday against the imprisoned founder of the Yukos oil company and one of his business partners, opening a new line of legal attack against a Kremlin opponent.

The former executive, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, and his partner, Platon A. Lebedev, were charged with embezzlement and money laundering, which his lawyers said together could carry prison sentences of 15 years.

The two men have been held since their arrests in 2003, and are serving eight-year sentences for tax evasion and other charges. Their lawyers said they had potentially qualified for parole late this year, when they would have served half of their sentences.

The new charges, which accused the men of embezzling about $20 billion in Yukos revenues, appeared to destroy that possibility and opened a new chapter in the long saga of Yukos's legal troubles.

The men were brought to face the charges with little fanfare, though with substantial security, in the eastern Siberian city of Chita, to which they had been transferred in December from the separate penal colonies where they had been serving their sentences.

DOJ_NMG_0128581

Russian prosecutors remained largely quiet about the charges throughout the day and did not publicly release details of the charges or supporting documents. Essential details remained unknown even to the international defense lawyers for the men, including the dates and detailed accounts of the crimes of which they are accused.

Mr. Khodorkovsky and Mr. Lebedev's defense lawyers promptly denounced the new charges as baseless. They said they were a means to keep Mr. Khodorkovsky and Mr. Lebedev in prison beyond Russia's presidential election in early 2008 and throughout the remainder of the liquidation of Yukos, their former oil giant, which is in Russian receivership.

Robert Amsterdam, one of Mr. Khodorkovsky's lawyers, said from London in a conference call with Western reporters that the charges were a continuation of Russia's use of its prosecutors, courts and investigators in "a fraudulent system of assets theft."

"The present proceedings are a miscarriage of justice," he said.

Under the new charges, the two men are accused of embezzling roughly $20 billion in oil revenues using a series of internal transfers in Yukos and its subsidiaries, and then transfers through other accounts.
